THOMAS Lord LOVELL,

Baron LOVELL of Minsted-Lovell,

Knight of the most Honourable Order of the Bath.

My LORD,

WE might be justly deemed unpardonable, if, amongst the several illustrious Persons who have honoured this Work with their Patronage, we should neglect applying to Your Lordship for YOURS. That universal Knowledge of Men and Books, joined to a distinguishing Judgment and polite Manners, which is Your confessed Character, gives us a Kind of Claim to IT: History, beyond all other Sciences, deserves the Protection of the Great and Good, as its Utility is not of a confined Nature, but diffuses a general Benefit to all Mankind. This Consideration, my LORD, greatly justifies the Presumption of this Address, since Benevolence, and every amiable Virtue, eminently adorn and add a Lustre to Your Rank.

IT must be acknowledged, the following Sheets cannot appear abroad under a greater Recommendation, since Your LORDSHIP has given the Public SUCH early Proofs of a refined Taste for Antient History; particularly in Your Travels through Italy, where, at a large Expence, You enriched the Republic of Letters with a curious Account of the ETRURIA REGALIS; THAT this noble Example must animate the Youth of Genius and Quality to cultivate so useful a Branch of Learning, and at the same Time reflect no small Honour upon the Professors of it.

DEDICATION.

BUT what more immediately obliges us to ſhelter ourſelves under the Sanction of the Illuſtrious and the Great, and may, we hope, intitle us to the Favour of ſuch unqueſtionable Judges, is the Reſolution we have made of concealing our Names until the Whole is completed. Under this Obſcurity, My LORD, we have received ſeveral conſiderable Hints, (which we might otherwiſe have been deprived of) that have much contributed to the Improvement of our original Plan, and conſequently render the Undertaking more ſerviceable to the World. From hence ariſes the Neceſſity of our ſubmitting each Yearly Production to ſome Perſonage of avowed Candour and Judgment, and is the Motive that prevails upon us to ſolicit YOUR LORDSHIP'S favourable Acceptance of this preſent Volume. The Reputation that this Work has hitherto obtained in moſt Parts of Europe, we humbly truſt, will incline your LORDSHIP to indulge us in this Requeſt, and to pardon the Liberty we take in aſſuming the Honour of ſubſcribing ourſelves,

AN UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

CHAP. XI.

The history of Rome, from the first triumvirate to the death of Crassus.

THE first benefit Cæsar reaped from this association was, his promotion to the consulate, Pompey and Crassus employing all their interest in his favour. He had but two competitors, L. Luceius Hirrus and M. Calpurnius Bibulus. The former, a man of great learning (R), was but little versed in public affairs; and therefore Cæsar, well apprised that if he had him for his collegue, he should reign alone, did his utmost to get him elected. He was not ashamed openly to purchase the suffrages of the people with large ſums; but the ſenators, being reſolved to have him excluded and Bibulus choſen, agreed among themſelves to defeat Cæſar's meaſures in his own way, and to offer the people greater ſums than he had done. Cato himſelf, tho' a rigid ſtoic, was of opinion, that the laws, forbidding all ſort of bribery, ought to be diſpenſed with on this occaſion; ſo that it was reſolved, that Bibulus ſhould buy the ſuffrages of the people, and that each ſenator ſhould pay his ſhare towards raiſing the promiſed ſums. By this means Luceius was excluded, and Bibulus appointed to be Cæſar's collegue. The firſt thing Cæſar did, after entering upon his office, was, to confirm all Pompey's acts, purſuant to his promiſe. After this he made it his whole buſineſs to gain the affection of the people. With this view he drew up an agrarian law, with ſuch wiſe reſtrictions and proviſoes, that the ſenators themſelves could not juſtly find fault with it; for it enacted only, "that certain lands in Campania, belonging to the "public, ſhould be divided among ſuch of the poor citizens, as "had three children or more." Cæſar declared in the ſenate, that he would do nothing without the conſent of the conſcript fathers, nor propoſe any of his friends for commiſſioners, nor any perſon elſe, who might be liable to ſuſpicions; but that they ſhould be all men of unblemiſhed characters and known abilities. The fathers had nothing to object againſt the law itſelf; but as they were well appriſed of the legiſlator's ambitious view, they put off from day to day giving their aſſent to it. Cæſar complained of theſe delays; and then Cato told him in plain terms, that he did not diſapprove of the diſtribution of the lands as propoſed, but dreaded the conſequences of it: "We do not care, ſaid he, that you ſhould purchaſe the "favour and affections of the people at the expence of the pub-"lic treaſury." This open declaration piqued Cæſar, who ordered his lictors to carry Cato to priſon; but he ſoon after privately ordered the tribunes to releaſe him. The example of Cato was followed by the conſul Bibulus and moſt of the ſenators, who declared, that they had nothing to object againſt the law; but that they would ſuffer no innovations. Hereupon Cæſar had recourſe to the people, and having ſummoned them to aſſemble, appeared in the comitium, attended by Pompey and Craſſus. He mounted the roſtra, and directing his ſpeech to his two aſſociates, aſked them, Whether they did not approve of the law? It is eaſy to imagine, that two men of his own cabal would ſpeak the ſame language as he. They both anſwered, "That they would ſupport his motion, with all their "power, againſt the enemies of the people, who oppoſed it."

(R) If we may judge of his learning from the account Cicero gives of him, he was one of the best historians of Rome. Besides the history of the war of the allies, he wrote that of Cicero's consulship, at the request of the consul, who had himself already published one of his own in Greek and Latin.

Which is rejected by the ſenate.

Pompey

Pompey went further, adding, with more warmth than prudence, "If any one oppoſes this law with the ſword, I will reſiſt "him with ſword and buckler." Pompey, by this raſh anſwer, which was no-way ſuitable to his dignity and was contrary to his true intereſt, made himſelf odious to the ſenate, and at the ſame time gained no credit among the people, who thought themſelves indebted to Cæſar only for ſo beneficial a law. However, Bibulus oppoſed with great courage; but the people, loſing all regard for the conſular dignity, treated him with the utmoſt indignity, drove him out of the aſſembly, broke his faſces, wounded his lictors, &c. The ſenators, dreading the fury of the populace, held their peace; ſo that the law paſſed without any further diſturbance [u].

But paſſed by the people.

THIS victory over the ſenate and Bibulus made Cæſar in great meaſure abſolute in Rome. His collegue was ſcarce ever mentioned; no deference was paid to his orders; they all looked upon Cæſar as the only conſul, and called this year ironically the year of the conſulate of Julius and Cæſar. And now the ſuſpicions entertained of the confederacy between the triumvirs being confirmed by Cæſar's marrying his daughter Julia to Pompey, Cato, who was a ſincere friend to his country, loudly exclaimed againſt the arbitrary power uſurped by the triumvirs; and when the agrarian law was brought before the ſenate to be confirmed by them, he continued inflexible, oppoſing it with great warmth, tho' threatened with baniſhment; but at length Cicero telling him, That if Cato did not want Rome, Rome wanted Cato, upon this conſideration he acquieſced, and the law was eſtabliſhed in full force. And now Cæſar reſolved to gain the favour of the knights, as he had done that of the people. With this view he abated a third part of their rents which they paid annually into the public treaſury, and by this means attached them unalterably to his intereſt. Having thus ſecured to himſelf both the people and knights, he governed Rome with an abſolute ſway. Cicero exclaimed againſt the triumvirate, and, by ſome ſevere jeſts (S), provoked them to ſuch a de-

(S) Cicero, who was naturally ſevere and loved raillery, ſeized every opportunity that offered of ſhewing his wit, without regard either to decency or friendſhip. He was one of thoſe, who would rather loſe their friend, than their jeſt. If this ſatirical turn was not one of the chief cauſes of his misfortunes, it contributed at leaſt to ſtir up againſt him ſeveral powerful enemies. Tho' ſome of a degree, that they reſolved upon his ruin; and, in order to compaſs it the more effectually, they got his mortal enemy, P. Clodius, promoted to the tribuneſhip. We ſhall ſoon ſee the ſeditious Clodius, vent his rage againſt this great orator, and forward the ruin of the republic, by the baniſhment of one of the chief ſupporters of the public liberty [w]. Cæſar, having thus eſtabliſhed the power of the triumvirate, applied himſelf to his own private intereſt. Pompey had got two conſuls elected for the next year, who were perſonally devoted to him, viz. L. Calpurnius Piſo and A. Gabinius. Cæſar, fearing Pompey might attempt a ſuperiority over him during their adminiſtration, attached Piſo to himſelf, by marrying his daughter Calpurnia. Having thus ſecured his intereſt at Rome during the next conſulſhip, he applyed himſelf both to the ſenate and people, and, with the aſſiſtance of Pompey and Craſſus, procured the government of Tranſalpine and Ciſalpine Gaul, contrary to all law, for five years together, with the command of four legions.

P. Clodius promoted to the tribunate

UNDER the next conſulſhip of Calpurnius Piſo and A. Gabinius Nepos, the triumvirate ſtill continued to govern Rome by the conſuls themſelves, who were their creatures. As Cicero adhered ſteadily to the intereſts of the republic, the conſuls gave Clodius full liberty to vent on him all his fury. Cicero was looked on as the father and defender of his country, and the ſervice he had done the republic was yet freſh in every ones memory; the conſul therefore was obliged to have recourſe to craft and cunning to compaſs his ruin. His firſt ſtep was to gain the affections of the people, by paſſing ſeveral laws favourable to them; then he obliged both the knights and ſenators, by leſſening the power which the cenſors had of degrading them; and in the laſt place he paid his court to the conſuls, by aſſigning them provinces of a very great extent. The conſuls had hitherto choſen their provinces by lot; but Clodius pretended, that the right of aſſigning them was lodged in the people, who accordingly gave to Piſo Macedon, Achaia, of his jeſts were lively and poignant, yet he often brought himſelf into contempt by the low conceits and ſtale alluſions, which he put off for wit. He has dropt ſeveral things of this nature, even in his moſt eloquent diſcourſes. Macrobius tells us, that one of Cicero's freed-men was at the pains of collecting all his maſter's witticiſms, under the title of Ineptiæ. It is ſurpriſing, that a man of ſo much ſagacity ſhould not think ſuch puns and ridiculous conconceits unbecoming the gravity of a magiſtrate.

chaia, Theſſaly, and Bœotia; and to Gabinius Syria and moſt of the eaſtern kingdoms. Cicero, who had too much ſagacity not to ſee through the tribune's deſign, ſecured to himſelf a faithful friend in L. Ninnius Quadratus, another of the tribunes, who ſo effectually oppoſed all the attempts of Clodius, that he could not proceed. Hereupon Clodius, fearing Ninnius, or, as others call him, Mummius, might by his oppoſition overturn all his ſchemes, had recourſe to artifice, and aſſured Cicero, that he would undertake nothing to his prejudice, provided he would perſuade Ninnius not to oppoſe his meaſures. We are told that both Cæſar and Pompey baſely demeaned themſelves to aſſure the orator, that the tribune had no deſign to hurt him; and that Cicero, deceived by theſe falſe aſſurances, deſired Ninnius to wave his oppoſition, and ſlept in ſecurity. In the mean time, Clodius got another law paſſed, enacting, That when a tribune of the people ſhould propoſe any law in the comitia, no regard ſhould be had to the denunciations of the augurs. As moſt of that college favoured Cicero, the tribune was afraid, leſt they ſhould, under pretence of religion, prevail upon the people to reject the decree, which he had already drawn up againſt Cicero. And now the tribune, thinking himſelf in a condition to carry his point, mounted the roſtra, and propoſed the following law, at which all theſe preparations aimed, viz. "That whoever had been con" cerned in the death of a Roman [illegible], before the people " had paſſed ſentence on him, ſhould be deemed guilty of trea-
" ſon, and puniſhed as a ſtate criminal." Cicero, well appriſed that he was the perſon aimed at by this law, and ſeeing himſelf in ſo great danger, changed his habit, and, letting his beard grow, went about in deep mourning, ſoliciting the aſſiſtance of his friends. Many of the knights teſtified their regard for him, by changing their habits, and, in a negligent dreſs, ſupplicating in his behalf. Among theſe was the ſon of Craſſus the triumvir, who had been taught by Cicero the rules of eloquence, and had made an extraordinary proficiency under ſo great a maſter. This young patrician, at the head of twenty thouſand young Romans of his age, attended Cicero where-ever he went. Clodius on the other hand, attended by a numerous body of armed men, inſulted Cicero, where-ever he met him, reproached him with want of courage, and, interrupting him in his humble addreſſes to the people, encouraged his enemies, who were the dregs of the populace, to throw ſtones and dirt at the orator and his company, who dared not return the like treatment, for fear of violating the ſacred perſon of a tribune. The ſenate, affected with the unjuſt proſecution of a man, whom they looked upon as the chief ornament of their body, aſſembled, in order to decree, that the people ſhould put on mourning, as in a public calamity; but the conſuls, whom Clodius had gained over, oppoſed it, while he himſelf with a band of armed ſlaves beſet the place where the ſenate met, and with menaces deterred them from coming to any reſolution. It muſt be owned, that Cicero on this occaſion acted a part unworthy of his former conſtancy. He ran from houſe to houſe with ſorrow and conſternation in his face, imploring the protection of his friends, and cringing, with a ſhameful meanneſs of ſpirit, even to his enemies. The advice his friends gave him ſerved only to embarraſs him the more. Lucullus was for having recourſe to arms and repelling force by force. The knights declared for him, and with them the better part of the citizens; but Cato and Hortenſius adviſed him not to tarniſh his paſt glory, by filling Rome with ſlaughter, and exerciſing the ſame cruelties on his fellow-citizens, which he had ſo ſeverly condemned in Catiline. Cicero, greatly perplexed and not knowing how to eſcape the fury of the mad tribune, had at length recourſe to Cæſar, entreating him, that he would take him with him into Gaul as one of his lieutenants. This was, all things conſidered, the ſafeſt method he could have taken; and Cæſar who wanted nothing elſe but to get him out of Rome, where he might, by his eloquence, raiſe great diſturbances, readily conſented to his requeſt. Clodius was well appriſed, that, by this means, his prey would eſcape him; and therefore, in order to divert him from accepting the new employment, he feigned himſelf diſpoſed to a reconciliation, and ſent him word by ſome common friends, that he had been informed, that his wife Terentia had been the chief cauſe of his giving evidence againſt him in the affair of Pompeia, and that now he was determined to drop the proſecution, and live again in amity with him. Cicero, tho' a man in other reſpects of uncommon ſagacity, was ſo far impoſed upon by his enemy's fair words and promiſes, that he changed his mind, and refuſed to attend Cæſar into Gaul. This ſo provoked Cæſar, that he joined Clodius againſt him, and engaged Pompey not to intermeddle in his behalf. Hereupon Clodius reſumed his impeachment, and accuſed Cicero before the tribes, of having put Lentulus, Cethegus and other Roman citizens to death, without a lawful trial. Cicero, ſeeing himſelf thus expoſed anew to the rage of the furious tribune, had recourſe to Pompey, who was indebted to him for moſt of his employments, and had ever profeſſed a great friendſhip for him; but Pompey was retired to one of his country-houſes, for fear of being reproached with his unfaithfulneſs, if he did not ſtir in behalf of his friend. Cicero immediately diſpatched Piſo his ſon-in-law to him; and, upon his delaying to return, went himſelf; but Pompey, not able to bear the ſight of his old friend, who had done him ſo many good offices, and whom he had engaged his word with Cæſar not to aſſiſt, went out at a back-door, ordering his ſervants to tell Cicero, that he was returned to Rome. Cicero, no longer doubting but he was abandoned by him, having called together his true friends, aſked their advice, when Lucullus, who was an old experienced commander, was for taking up arms; but the reſt of his friends adviſed him to give way to the ſtorm and retire from Rome. As he could not bear the thoughts of ſhedding the blood of his fellow-citizens, he followed their advice, left Rome at midnight, and reſolved to retire to Sicily, where Vigilius was prætor, who owed his fortune to him; but the ungrateful governor refuſing him admittance into the iſland, he embarqued at Brunduſium, and ſailed to Dyrrachium, where he diſcovered ſo much dejection and meanneſs of ſpirit, as were a reproach to his great abilities and the philoſophy he profeſſed. He himſelf acknowledges that in the height of his grief, he was going to lay violent hands on himſelf; but was prevented by his friend Atticus [x] (S).

(S) Cicero came firſt to Vibo, called alſo Hipponium which ſtood on the coaſt of Brutium, and had choſen Cicero for its patron or protector; but one Vibius, on whom Cicero had conferred many favours, not only refuſed to admit him into his houſe, but would not even ſuffer him to come into the city. however, one Sica, who held a farm near Hipponium, received and entertained him, till he ſet out for Brunduſium. Thither the people of the country guarded him, the neighbouring country being infeſted by a troop of exiles of the Catilinarian faction, under the command of Autronius, whoſe reſentment Cicero had reaſon to fear. Before he embarqued at the port of Brunduſium, he ſpent ſome days with his friend M. Lænius Flaccus, who had a country-houſe near that city. He was then in a moſt deplorable condition, not knowing what place to chuſe for his reſidence during his exile. Greece and Epirus were beſet by a troop of robbers in the pay of Autronius, his ſworn enemy. The government of Macedon had been given to the conſul Piſo, an avowed friend to Clodius. Aſia only offered

In the mean time, Clodius got the decree of his baniſhment paſſed, confiſcated his effects, which, to the immortal honour of the exile, no-body would buy when expoſed to ſale, burnt to the ground his houſes in the country, and his fine palace in Rome, and ordered the pontifices to conſecrate the ground, on which his city-houſe ſtood, to the goddeſſes Peace and Liberty, to make the reſtitution of it in a manner impoſſible. Thus Clodius triumphed at Rome; but as Cato ſtill thwarted him in his pernicious attempts, he prevailed on the people to paſs the moſt unjuſt decree poſſible, purely to gratify a private reſentment of his own, and then, by another decree, obliged Cato to put the firſt in execution. Clodius had been taken in his youth by the pirates, while he was ſerving in the eaſt; and Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, a covetous prince, had refuſed to pay his ranſom. This Clodius took greatly amiſs, and now that he was the reigning tribune, he reſolved to be revenged on the king of Cyprus; and accordingly got a decree offered him a ſecure retreat; and therefore he embarqued at Brunduſium, reſolving to ſail to Cyzicus, a city of Myſia. This he himſelf declares in a letter, which he wrote before he embarqued, to his wife Terentia, and to his children Tullia and Cicero. "I have "ſpent thirteen days, ſays he, at Brunduſium, in the houſe of "M. Lænius Flaccus. This faithful friend is affected with my miſ-"fortunes, and, in ſpight of the furious Clodius, entertains me with "great civility. I am going to leave him and embarque for Macedon, "whence I intend to proceed to Cyzicus, and there finiſh my courſe." Accordingly, on the thirteenth of April, he took leave of his friend Flaccus, who, with his father and children, attended him to the port, where theſe illuſtrious friends parted, after having given each other reciprocal aſſurances of the moſt ſincere friendſhip. Cicero had at firſt a favourable wind; but a few hours after a violent ſtorm obliged the pilot to return to the ſame port. When the ſtorm was appeaſed, he put to ſea again, and landed at Dyrrachium, now Durazzo. There the inhabitants received him in ſuch a manner, as might have allayed his grief if he had been capable of any comfort; but he diſcovered a weakneſs on this occaſion, which could not have been expected from a man bred up in the ſtudy of philoſophy. He grew melancholy, was ever ſighing, and turning his eyes towards Italy. The Greeks, who came to viſit him, being quite tired with his complaints, were forced to invent dreams, and draw good preſages of his ſpeedy return from the moſt trifling events, in order to pacify him. So very different are ſometimes the greateſt men from themſelves in times of adverſity! Cicero, after a ſhort ſtay at Dyrrachium, repaired to Theſſalonica, and there reſided, till he was recalled from baniſhment.

a decree paſſed, depriving him of his dominions, under pretence that he had forfeited them by his ill conduct. Cato was charged with the execution of this ſcandalous decree, and that he might be kept the longer from Rome, he was ordered at the ſame time to reſettle ſome citizens of diſtinction in Byzantium, who had been driven from thence by the populace. When Cicero and Cato were gone, the furious tribune, and the triumvirs, whoſe tool he was, reigned without controul; but in the mean time, news being brought to Rome, that the Helvetians, having abandoned their country, and burnt down their towns and houſes, were preparing to enter Gaul by way of Geneva, Cæſar, whoſe province Gaul was, found himſelf obliged to leave Rome, and haſten to the defence of the country committed to his care. Accordingly he repaired thither in ſuch haſte, that he reached the banks of the Rhone in eight days. Upon his arrival, he broke down the bridge of Geneva; and as he found but one legion in the province, he deferred giving anſwer to the Helvetians, who deſired leave to paſs through the country of the Allobroges, till he had covered the frontiers of his province, by carrying on a wall from the lake Lemanus, or lake of Geneva, to mount Jura, now Mont S. Claude. This wall was nineteen miles in extent, ſixteen foot high, and defended by a deep ditch and caſtles at proper diſtances. As Cæſar did not ſet out from Rome till about the beginning of April and this work was completed before the ides, or the thirteenth, of the ſame month, it is manifeſt, that beſides the Roman legion, great numbers of the inhabitants were employed in it. When the deputies of the Helvetii returned at the time appointed for an anſwer, Cæſar told them, that the Romans never ſuffered foreign armies to march through their countries; and that, if they attempted to force a paſſage, he would repel force with force. Upon this, the whole nation of the Helvetians appeared in a body; and then Cæſar, perſuaded that he could not reſiſt them with the few troops he had, left Labienus, one of his lieutenants, to defend his lines, and haſtening back into Italy, brought from thence in a very ſhort time five legions. With theſe he fell upon the Helvetians, while they were embarraſſed in paſſing the Arar, now the Saone, cut in pieces thoſe who had not yet croſſed the river, and, throwing a bridge over it, advanced againſt the reſt. The Helvetians, ſomewhat diſheartened at the loſs they had ſuſtained, ſent deputies to the Roman camp to treat of an accommodation; but as they refuſed to give hoſtages, Cæſar detached his cavalry, with orders to haraſs them on their march. The Roman horſe, having having attacked them in narrow roads, were repulſed with no ſmall loſs, which raiſed the courage of the Helvetians, while the Romans began to be ſomewhat diſheartened for want of proviſions. Cæſar had none but the Ædui, the faithful allies of Rome, to depend on for a ſpeedy ſupply of corn. Their country lay between the Seine, the Loire, and the Saone, was extremely fruitful, and capable of ſupporting an army far more numerous than that of Cæſar; but the Roman general, to his great ſurpriſe, found the corn fail when he moſt wanted it. The Ædui indeed had promiſed to ſupply his troops with proviſions; but they poſtponed from day to day the ſending of the convoys which they had promiſed; ſo that the army was reduced to great ſtreights. Cæſar therefore, ſuſpecting the fidelity of the Ædui, reſolved to find out the true cauſe of theſe artful delays. In order to this he examined Liſcus, the chief magiſtrate of the Ædui, and a lord of the country named Divitiacus, who ſerved both in the Roman army. The former told him, that Dumnorix, younger brother to Divitiacus, deſigning to uſurp the ſovereign power, and depending on the aſſiſtance of the Helvetians, had, to gratify them, privately conveyed the corn out of the province, and raiſed the price of it, hoping by that means to make the Roman army periſh with famine. Divitiacus owned the ſame thing, but without naming his brother. Cæſar was inclined to puniſh Dumnorix with ſeverity; but pardoned him at the entreaty of his brother Divitiacuts [y].

Treachery of Dumnorix the Æduan.

And now Cæſar drew near Bibracte (T), the capital of the Ædui, to facilitate the conveyance of the corn, which thoſe faithful allies had promiſed. When the enemy ſaw him retreat, they purſued and attacked him; whereupon a bloody battle

(T) The modern geographers are divided in their opinions as to the ſituation of Bibracte, as Cæſar and Strabo call it. They all agree, that it was the moſt conſiderable of all the cities of the Ædui from the Doux to the Saone; but moſt of them pretend, that it ſtood where the city of Autun now ſtands. It was called firſt, according to them, Bibracte, and afterwards Auguſtodunum, from the emperor Auguſtus. The latter name it retained, ſay they, till the time of the emperors Conſtans and Conſtantine, by whom it was rebuilt, and from them took the name of Flavia, both thoſe princes being deſcended from the Flavian family. battle enſued, which laſted from noon till night. The Helvetians behaved with incredible bravery; but at length were forced to give way, and retire to a hill, where they had placed their baggage and their women, and ſurrounded them with their waggons as with a rampart. Thither Cæſar purſued them, made himſelf maſter of their baggage, and took a great many priſoners, among whom were the wife and daughter of the famous Orgetorix, the firſt author of the tranſmigration. After this overthrow, the Helvetians, diſheartened at the loſs they had ſuſtained, which amounted to one hundred and thirty thouſand of their people, had recourſe to the clemency of the conqueror; who, having obliged them to lay down their arms and give him hoſtages, ſent them back to their own country, with orders to rebuild their cities and villages. Only the Boii were allowed, at the requeſt of the Ædui, to ſettle in Gaul, whence they formerly came. This victory made the Roman name formidable throughout all Gaul; congratulations were brought to Cæſar from all parts, and the Ædui implored his protection againſt Arioviſtus king of the Germans, who, taking advantages of the differences which had long ſubſiſted between them and the Arverni (U), had joined the latter, made himſelf maſter of great part of the country of the Sequani (W), and obliged the Ædui to give him their children as hoſtages. Cæſar, pleaſed with this new opportunity of acquiring glory, promiſed them his aſſiſtance, and accordingly diſpatched embaſſadors to Arioviſtus, inviting him to an interview; which he declining, Cæſar ſent other deputies, deſiring him to reſtore to the Ædui their hoſtages, and to bring no more troops over the Rhine into Gaul. At the ſame time he put him in mind of the favour he had ſhewn him during his conſulate, ſince, by his means, he had been declared a friend and ally of the Roman people. Arioviſtus anſwered, That he had a right to make war when and where he pleaſed; that he

The Helvetians defeated anew, return to their own country.

Cæſar invites Arioviſtus to an interview,

[z] Cæſ. ibid. c. 18——55.

(U) The country of the Arverni lay, according to Strabo, between the ocean, the Pyrenees, and the Rhine. Lucan tells us, that the Arverni pretended to derive their origin from a colony of Trojans, who ſettled among the Gauls, under the conduct of Antenor. This fable Sidonius, to do honour to his nation, adopts for a certain truth. The Arverni, in antient times, were one of the moſt powerful nations of Gaul.

(W) The Sequani inhabited the country now called the Franche Comte, which reaches from the canton of Baſle to the neighbourhood of Stralſund.

he was not obliged to give any perſon an account, either of the victories he gained, or of the terms he preſcribed to the conquered; that he would not reſtore to the Ædui their hoſtages, &c. Cæſar no ſooner received this anſwer, than he marched to Veſontio now Beſançon, the capital of the Sequani, to prevent its being ſurpriſed by Arioviſtus. There the Romans received ſuch accounts of the formidable ſtature and looks of the Germans, as alarmed them. Cæſar therefore having called a council of war, reproached them in ſuch ſtrong terms with their fears, that they were aſhamed of the weakneſs they had diſcovered. He then led them againſt the enemy; but when they came within five miles of their camp, Arioviſtus ſent to deſire an interview with the Roman general; which was readily granted. Both commanders repaired to the place agreed on, which was a riſing ground in the midſt of a large plain.

Treachery of Arioviſtus.

During the conference, in which they treated each other with great haughtineſs, the horſe that attended the king drew near to thoſe of Cæſar, and diſcharged a ſhower of darts and ſtones at them. Cæſar reſtrained the ardour of his men; but immediately broke off the conference and retired to his camp, whither he was followed by deputies from the king, deſiring, that embaſſadors might be ſent him to treat in an amicable manner. Cæſar readily complied with his requeſt; but Arioviſtus, as ſoon as they arrived in his camp, treated them as ſpies, put them in irons, and, decamping the ſame day, poſted himſelf ſo as to intercept the Roman convoys. Cæſar followed him, and drawing up his men for five days together in a neighbouring plain, bid the enemy defiance; but Arioviſtus kept cloſe in his camp, and Cæſar was informed, that the women in the enemy's camp, who pretended to propheſy, had foretold, that they could not be victorious till after the new-moon.

Arioviſtus entirely defeated.

Upon this intelligence, the proconſul marched all his legions up to the German trenches, which forced Arioviſtus to come to a battle, in which he was entirely defeated, and moſt of his troops cut in pieces. The king, with much difficulty, eſcaped croſs the Rhine; but two of his wives and one of his daughters periſhed in the flight. Another of his daughters was taken priſoner, with many Germans of diſtinction. After this victory, Cæſar put his troops into winter-quarters, and, croſſing the Alps, returned into Ciſalpine Gaul, which was a part of his government, to make there the neceſſary preparations for the next year [z].

At Rome the tribune Clodius, who was entirely devoted to

to Cæſar, being ſenſible of the ſuperiority that general was gaining over Pompey, whoſe glory he had almoſt eclipſed in one campaign, began to inſult him, and even talked of diſ- annulling all his acts. He had already taken young Tigranes out of the hands of L. Flavius the prætor, to whoſe cuſtody Pompey had committed him, and ſent him back into Armenia, where it was feared, he would raiſe new troubles. This treatment rouſed Pompey, who now began to think of recalling his old friend Cicero, whom he had ſo baſely deſerted. As this could no otherwiſe be done, than by a decree of the ſenate, or of the people, and the latter was impracticable during the tribuneſhip of Clodius, he made it his buſineſs to engage the conſcript fathers in his behalf; but the conſuls, Piſo and Gabinius, rendered all their attempts abortive, ſo that nothing could be done this year in favour of the illuſtrious exile. The next year, the firſt thing the new conſuls, P. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Cæcilius Metellus, propoſed in the ſenate, was the recalling of Cicero, which met with a general approbation; but when the affair was brought before the people, Clodius appeared armed in the comitium, at the head of a company of gladiators, to oppoſe it with open violence. Then Milo, who was at the head of the tribunes, hired another company of gladiators to repel force with force. The conſcript fathers, depending on the protection of Milo, paſſed the decree in the moſt ſolemn and pompous manner; as did alſo the people when it was brought before them, notwithſtanding the warm oppoſition of Clodius. In the mean time, Cicero, informed of what paſſed at Rome, left Theſſalonica, where he reſided, and came to Dyrrachium, and from thence ſet ſail for Brunduſium, where his reception was a kind of triumph. From Brunduſium he ſet out for Rome, and had the pleaſure to ſee all Italy take part in his joy, every colony and municipium ſent deputies to congratulate him; and the nearer he came to Rome, the more the crowds encreaſed. As he was juſt ready to enter the city at the gate Capena, the whole ſenate met him in a body and conducted him, amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the people, to the capitol, from whence he was carried to his habitation, as he himſelf expreſſes it, "on the ſholders "of all Rome." After his return, he ſoon began to reaſſume his former aſcendant over the ſenate, and as corn was become exceeding dear at Rome, he procured for Pompey, his benefactor, the honourable commiſſion of ſupplying the city, with an unlimited power in all the ports of the Mediterranean for five years. After this he prevailed on the pontifices to put him again in poſſeſſion of the ground, on which his houſe had

DURING theſe tranſactions at Rome, Cæſar being informed by Labienus, whom he had left in Gaul, that all the nations of Belgium had conſpired againſt the republic, and had entered into an alliance againſt the Romans as a common enemy, raiſed two new legions in Inſubria, repaſſed the Alps early in the ſpring, and joining Labienus, immediately began to march, and in fifteen Days arrived on the confines of the Belgæ (X). Upon his approach the Rhemi ſubmitted; but the reſt of the Belgæ, appointing Galba, king of the Sueſſones, now the Soiſonnois, commander in chief of their united forces, which amounted to one hundred and fifty thouſand men, marched againſt the Rhemi, who had declared for the Romans, and laid ſiege to one of their cities called Bibrax, which ſome modern writers take to be Braine, a little city in the Soiſonnois, others to be Laon, called by the antients Mons Bibrax. Cæſar, upon this news, ſent a ſtrong detachment to the relief of the beſieged city. Whereupon Galba, leaving Bibrax marched directly to Cæſar and encamped about three miles from the Romans. After both armies had continued ſome days in ſight of each other, Galba attempted to paſs the Axona, now the Aiſne; which Cæſar no ſooner knew, than he marched his horſe and light-armed infantry over the bridge, which he had ſeized, and attacking the enemy while they were embarraſſed in croſſing the river, made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter of them, that the bed of the river was filled up with dead bodies; inſomuch that the Belgæ, who eſcaped the ſlaughter, marched over them to the oppoſite bank. The Belgæ were ſo diſheartened with this defeat, that they reſolved to diſperſe, and return every one to his own country. The next day Cæſar appeared before Noviodonum, now Noyon, a city of the Sueſſones, and ſo terrified the inhabitants with his machines, that they opened their gates to him. The Bellovaci, who inhabited the preſent Beauvaiſis, alſo gave way to the ſtorm, and implored the clemency of the conqueror, as ſoon as he appeared before their capital. The Ambiani, now the people af Amiens, followed the example of the Bellovaci, but the Nervii,

(X) Belgic Gaul comprehended that great country, which is bounded by the Britiſh ocean on one ſide, and the river Seine on the other.

Nervii, a fierce nation, who poſſeſſed the country now known by the name of Cambreſis, joined the Atrebates and Veromandui, that is, the inhabitants of the territory of Arras and of the Vermandois, and, having ſecured their wives and children in inacceſſible places, ſtood on their defence. In the mean time, Cæſar advanced, and arrived in the enemy's country; but while his legions were buſy in pitching their camp, the Nervii, who lay concealed in a neighbouring wood, ſallying out of their ambuſcade, attacked the Roman cavalry, put them to flight, and then fell on the legionaries with a fury not to be expreſſed. As this attack was unexpected, Cæſar had in a manner every thing to do at the ſame inſtant. The banner was to be erected, the charge ſounded, the ſoldiers at a diſtance recalled, the army drawn up, and the ſignal given. In this ſurprize Cæſar ran from place to place, exhorting his men to remember their former valour; and having drawn them up in the beſt manner he could, cauſed the ſignal to be given. The legionaries made a vigorous reſiſtance; but as the enemy ſeemed determined either to conquer or die, the ſucceſs was different in different places. In the left wing, the ninth and tenth legions did wonders, drove the Atrebates into a neighbouring river, and made a great ſlaughter of them. In another place, the eighth and eleventh legions repulſed the Veromandui, and drove them before them. But in the right wing, the ſeventh and twelfth legions ſuffered extremely. They were entirely ſurrounded by the Nervii, all the centurions in the fourth cohort being ſlain, and moſt of the other officers wounded. In this extremity, Cæſar, ſeizing the buckler of one of the private men, put himſelf at the head of his broken wing, renewed the attack, and being joined by the two legions, which he had left to guard the baggage, fell upon the Nervii already fa igued, with freſh vigour, and made a dreadful havock of them. However, that warlike nation did not give ground; as ſoon as one fell, another ſtood upon his body and ſupplied his place. In ſhort, they were almoſt all cut in pieces; and then their old men, with their women and children, ſurrendered to the conqueror, who left them in poſſeſſion of their cities and liberty. Then Cæſar advanced againſt the Aduatici (Y), who, upon his approach, pretended to give up their arms, and ſubmit; but treacherouſly treacherouſly concealed a third part of them, and made an attack on the Romans in the night. This ſo provoked the Roman general, that he broke down the gates of their city the next day, put a great number of them to the ſword, and ſold the reſt, to the number of fifty-three thouſand, for ſlaves. At the ſame time P. Craſſus, the ſon of the triumvir and one of Cæſar's lieutenants, ſubdued ſeven other nations (Z), and took poſſeſſion of their cities. The fame of theſe exploits brought the proconſul embaſſadors with offers of ſubmiſſion from ſeveral nations beyond the Rhine; but as the ſeaſon was far advanced, he put his troops into winter-quarters in the territories of the Andes, Taurones, and Carnutes, now the Anjovins, the Tourangeaux, and thoſe of Chartrain, and repaſſing the Alps, ſpent the winter in Inſubria [b]. By theſe conqueſts Cæſar effaced the remembrance of Pompey's victories in the eaſt, and at the ſame time by the prodigious ſums he heaped up in Gaul, chiefly by robbing the temples of their treaſures, he purchaſed himſelf many friends in Italy.

Several other nations ſubdued.

THE following year Marcius Philippus and Cornelius Lentulus were raiſed to the conſulate. During their adminiſtration, Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, who had been driven from the throne by the Alexandrians, was reſtored to it by Gabinius, proconſul of Syria, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of Egypt. In Gaul, Galba, one of Cæſar's lieutenants was attacked in his winter-quarters at Octodurus now Martaignac in Lower Valais, by a great body of Gauls, whom he defeated, killed above ten thouſand of them, and then, after having burnt Octodurus, marched into the country of the Allobroges, to ſpend the reſt of the winter there in more peaceable quarters. In the mean time, Cæſar, who was in Illyricum, which was part of his province, being informed, that the Veneti, that is, the antient inhabitants of Vannes in Bretagne, with ſome other nations near them, had endeavoured to recover their hoſtages, and were making great preparations for war, ſent orders for building a fleet on the Loire, and made all haſte to the army. Upon his arrival, he appointed Brutus admiral of the fleet, which he found ready equipped; and the new admiral putting to ſea, engaged the enemy's fleet, and

(Z) Theſe ſeven nations were the Veneti, Unelli, Oſymii, Curioſolitæ, Seſuvii, Aulerci, and Rhedones, that is, according to the modern geographers, the inhabitants of Vannes, Coutance Treguier, Cornouaille, Sees, Maine, and Rennes.

and gained a complete victory over them. Hereupon the Veneti immediately ſubmitted; but Cæſar put their chief men to death, and ſold the reſt for ſlaves. At the ſame time Tituriius Sabinus, whom he had detached againſt the Unelli, defeated Veridorix their chief, and ſubdued them, with the Aulerci and Lexovii (A). Craſſus, whom he had ſent into Aquitaine, beſieged the capital of the Sotiates, and reduced it; but the reſt of the Aquitani ſtill refuſing to ſubmit, Craſſus marched againſt them, and killed near thirty thouſand of them in one battle. The conſequence of this victory was the reduction of all Aquitaine. And now all the nations in Gaul being diſarmed, except the Morini and Menapii, that is, the antient inhabitants of the territory of Teroüenne, of Guelders, Juliers, and Cleves, Cæſar himſelf marched againſt them; but, as they retired to inacceſſible faſtneſſes, all he could do was to burn and ravage their country; after which he put his troops into winter-quarters in the countries of the Aulerci and Lexovii, and repaſſing the Alps, as uſual, ſpent ſome months in Ciſalpine Gaul. From thence he influenced all affairs at Rome, and encouraged his chief agent Clodius to pull down Cicero's new houſe; but Milo oppoſed the furious tribune, and prevented the execution of his deſign. And now Pompey began to be extremely jealous of Cæſar, whoſe victories in Gaul entirely eclipſed the glory he had acquired in the eaſt. Cæſar likewiſe took umbrage at Pompey's joining Cicero; however, they both kept up the appearance at leaſt of friendſhip, being apprehenſive, that Craſſus would leave them, if they came to a quarrel. Beſides Cæſar ſtood in great need of Pompey's aſſiſtance, to get Domitius Ahenobarbus excluded from the conſulate, who had declared; that he would, if raiſed to that dignity, ſhorten the time of Cæſar's proconſulate. To exclude Ahenobarbus was no eaſy matter, he being ſupported by Cato who was returned from Cyprus, and by all the enemies of the triumvirate, who were very numerous. Among all the well-wiſhers of the republic, Cicero was the only perſon who kept meaſures with the triumvirs, the remembrance of his baniſhment having made him more circumſpect. As it was the common intereſt of the triumvirate, that Ahenobarbus, a ſincere friend to his country, ſhould be ſet aſide at the next election, Pompey and Craſſus agreed to ſtand in competition tition with him; but as they deſpaired of ſucceſs without the concurrence of Cæſar, they both went to Luca, where he ſpent the winter, to propoſe their ſcheme to him, and engage his intereſt. There they found ſo many prætors and proconſuls making their court to him, that one hundred and twenty bundles of rods were ſeen at a time. Pompey and Craſſus no ſooner informed him of their deſign, than he came heartily into their meaſures. He was indeed ſenſible, that a ſecond conſulate would encreaſe the power of Pompey and Craſſus; but it was more for his intereſt, that they ſhould ſucceed, than that the conſulſhip ſhould be conferred on Ahenobarbus, who was entirely under the influence of Cato. Cæſar therefore cloſed with the propoſal, and ordered his agents and emiſſaries at Rome to ſpare no expence in purchaſing the ſuffrages of the tribes. As all this was kept ſecret, Ahenobarbus, not ſuſpecting that the two triumvirs would be his competitors, went very early on the day appointed for the election to ſolicit the ſuffrages of the people. He was attended by Cato, who was to preſent him to the tribes, and by a ſlave, who, as it was yet dark, carried a flambeau before him; but he had not gone far, before ſome aſſaſſins, who lay in wait for him, killed the ſlave, and falling on the candidate and his friend, would have diſpatched them likewiſe, had they not ſaved themſelves by flight. Ahenobarbus eſcaped unhurt; but Cato was wounded in the arm. This notorious act of violence rouzed the zeal of the ſenate; but the furious Clodius, at the head of an armed mob, oppoſed all their meaſures; and at the ſame time Caius Cato, another tribune, proteſted againſt holding the comitia; ſo that the conſular year being expired, the republic fell into an interregnum; which ſo grieved the ſenators, that they went into mourning, as in a time of public calamity. As the fathers were well apprized, that theſe diſturbances were occaſioned by Pompey and Craſſus, they aſked them in full ſenate, whether they aſpired to the conſular dignity? They owned they did; and then the other candidates deſiſting, through fear of the triumvirs, the comitia were held without the leaſt diſturbance, and Pompey and Craſſus unanimouſly choſen [c].

They are choſen.

Cæsar, now under no apprehenſion of being recalled from Gaul, haſtened thither to oppoſe the Uſipetes and Tenchtheri (B), who being driven out of their own country by the Suevi, had croſſed the Rhine, with a deſign to ſettle in Belgic Gaul. As

As ſoon as he appeared, the Germans ſent him a deputation, offering to join him, if he would aſſign them lands. Cæſar anſwered, that there was no room in Gaul for new-comers; but that he would deſire the Ubii, the people of Cologne, to give them leave to ſettle in their territories. Then they deſired time to treat with the Ubii; and in the mean while, falling treacherouſly upon ſome Roman ſquadrons, killed about ſeventy men. Cæſar, exaſperated at this perfidiouſneſs, immediately marched after them, and coming up with them, when leaſt expected, made a dreadful ſlaughter of the unhappy wretches, who were but indifferently armed. They fled in the utmoſt confuſion; but Cæſar purſued them to the conflux of the Rhine and the Maeſe, where the ſlaughter was renewed with ſuch fury, that of four hundred thouſand ſouls very few eſcaped. After this, being reſolved to break into Germany, and ſpread the terror of the Roman name among thoſe barbarous nations, he ordered a bridge to be built over the Rhine; which wonderful undertaking being completed in ten days, he entered Germany, plundered and ſacked the country of the Sicambri (C), terrified the Suevi (D), and having made them ſenſible that there was a more formidable nation in the world than themſelves, he returned into Gaul, and broke down the bridge he had built. This expedition into Germany was finiſhed in eighteen days [d].

And now Cæſar, having reduced all Gaul, and ſtruck terror into the German nations bordering on the countries which he had ſubdued, reſolved to paſs over into Britain, and puniſh thoſe iſlanders for ſending continual ſupplies to the Gauls againſt the Romans. This was a dangerous enterprize; and therefore, before he embarqued in it, he carefully enquired of the merchants, who traded to the Britiſh iſlands, what ſort of people they were; in what manner they made war; under what ry of Relinchuſen in Germany; others in the neighbourhood of Zutphen. It is certain that they had no fixed ſettlement; for in Tacitus's time, they inhabited the country bordering on the territory of Baſile (26).

(C) We cannot give any account of the country of the Sicambri. All we know of them is, that they lived near the rivers Lyppe and Iſel, and that they poſſeſſed a pretty large territory in Germany.

what laws they lived, and which were their beſt ports. After this, he ſent Voluſenus over into Britain, to view the coaſt, while he himſelf, croſſing the country of the Morini, came to the place where the paſſage from the continent to the iſland is narroweſt. Thither he ordered all the ſhips to repair, which he had made uſe of againſt the Veneti. In the mean time, the Britains, informed of theſe preparations, diſpatched deputies to him, offering to ſubmit to the republic and to give hoſtages. Cæſar ſent the embaſſadors back with fair promiſes, and with them one Comius of Atrebatum, a man well known in Britain, charging him to gain over to the Roman intereſt as many cities as he could, and to perſuade them to ſend him hoſtages; but Comius, not caring to truſt the inhabitants, continued five days on the coaſt; and then, without ſo much as landing, returned to make his report to Cæſar of what he had obſerved. Cæſar, leaving Sulpicius Rufus in Gaul to guard the ports, put to ſea with two legions, and made the Britiſh coaſt the next morning, which he found lined with men to oppoſe his landing. As he could not conveniently make a deſcent in that place, the eminences, which the inhabitants had ſeized, being ſo near the ſhore, that they could from thence haraſs the Romans with their darts, without being expoſed themſelves to any danger, he ſailed eight miles farther, and there met with ſuch a vigorous oppoſition, that he was in danger of being obliged to return to ſea, till the ſtandard-bearer of the tenth legion, leaping boldly into the water, encouraged, by his example, the others to follow him. They all leaped out of their ſhips, through fear of leaving a Roman eagle in the hands of the enemy, and, advancing through a ſhower of darts, gained the ſhore, engaged the Britains on firm ground and put them to flight. The Britains were ſo terrified with the ſucceſs of the Romans, that they deſired a peace; which was granted them, upon their delivering ſome hoſtages; but in the mean time, Cæſar's tranſports being, for the moſt part, ſhattered by a violent ſtorm, and proviſions growing ſcarce in his camp, the Britains, inſtead of ſending him the reſt of the hoſtages, drew together what troops they could, and falling on the ſeventh legion, which Cæſar had ſent to get proviſions, would have cut them all off, had not the general come very ſeaſonably to their aſſiſtance and diſengaged them. In this extremity Cæſar loſt no time in refitting his ſhips, procuring proviſions, and ſecuring his camp. However, the Britains attacked him anew, and fought with great bravery and intrepidity; but, being defeated a third time, they had recourſe to the clemency of the conqueror, who who was glad to grant them a peace, upon their delivering up to him double the number of hoſtages which he had required before. With theſe hoſtages, as the ſeaſon was far advanced, he put to ſea, and returned to Gaul, without the loſs of one ſhip. There he put his troops into winter-quarters, and, repaſſing the Alps, returned to Inſubria [c].

And returns to Gaul.

WHILE Cæſar was thus employed in Gaul, Pompey and Craſſus governed Rome very arbitrarily, without any regard either to the ſenate or people. C. Trebonius, tribune of the people, in order to put the conſuls upon a level with Cæſar, propoſed a law, appointing Craſſus governor of Syria, Egypt, and Macedon, and Pompey of the two Spains, for five years. Cato oppoſed this dangerous propoſal, till he was ſeized by the tribune's orders and ſent to priſon. As Cæſar's commiſſion was near expiring, and by this law all power would be veſted in Pompey and Craſſus, Cæſar's friends oppoſed it, till the tribes agreed to continue him in his government of Gaul for five years longer. Then the Trebonian law paſſed by a great majority, enacting, that they ſhould have the above-mentioned governments; that it ſhould not be in any one's power to recal either from his province, till five years were expired; that they might raiſe as many troops as they judged neceſſary; and laſtly, that they might draw what ſupplies of men and money they thought proper from the kings and ſtates in alliance with Rome. This law plainly tended to the total deſtruction of the republican ſtate, and made the triumvirs ſole maſters of the government. Pompey choſe to ſtay in Rome; but Craſſus, extremely deſirous of making war upon the Parthians, embarqued at Brunduſium, before his conſulate expired, and ſet ſail for Aſia. Pompey, the to more engage the people in his intereſt, built a ſtone theatre at a vaſt expence, and diverted the multitude with moſt magnificent ſhews, in which five hundred lions and eighteen elephants appeared in the arena.

The Trebonian law

THE next year Domitius Ahenobarbus and Claudius Pulcher were raiſed to the conſulate. The former was an avowed enemy to the triumvirate; and Cato, now prætor, was in a condition to aſſiſt him: but as the triumvirs were at the head of three great armies, they feared nothing either from the conſul or the prætor. Cæſar and Craſſus were indeed at a great diſtance from Rome; but Pompey, without any regard to law or precedents, having raiſed an army, to put himſelf, as he ſaid, upon a level with the other two, kept it at the very gates of Rome; ſo that the moſt zealous republicans durſt durſt not attempt any thing againſt the triumvirs, or in favour of the publick liberty. While Pompey was thus keeping the capital in awe, Cæſar was intent on another expedition to the Britiſh iſlands. This was firſt retarded by Indutiomarus, a chief of the Treviri, who raiſed an inſurrection among his countrymen, but ſubmitted as ſoon as Cæſar drew near him; and afterwards by the revolt of Dumnorix the Æduan, who was killed by the Roman cavalry, whom Cæſar ſent againſt him. Theſe obſtacles being removed, Cæſar embarqued with five legions and two thouſand horſe, and landing in Britain without oppoſition, forced one of the enemy's intrenchments, and afterwards defeated Caſſivelaunus, general of all the Britiſh forces; which ſo terrified the enemy, that they never after appeared in the field with any conſiderable body. Whereupon Cæſar advanced farther into the country, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, paſſed the Thames, his men wading up to the neck in the water. However, Caſſivelaunus, with only four thouſand of his chariotecrs, haraſſed the Romans to ſuch a degree that Cæſar would probably have found it very difficult to have reduced him, had he not been aſſiſted by Mandubratius, prince of the Trinobantes, who, out of hatred to Caſſivelaunus, by whom his father Immanuentius, had been killed, prevailed on his countrymen to join Cæſar. Then Caſſivelaunus, after ſome unſucceſuful attempts in Cantium or Kent, ſubmitted to the conqueror, and gave hoſtages. Whereupon Cæſar, fearing ſome new tumults in Gaul, embarqued his troops, and returned to the continent before the autumnal equinox [f] (E).

The death of Julia.

On his return, he received letters from Rome. acquainting him with the death of his daughter Julia, who was, we may ſay,

(E) Cæſar, notwithſtanding the great advantages he gained, according to his account, in Britain, abandoned the iſland, without leaving any troops in it, or fortifying any ſingle place; which inclines us to believe, that the reputation he acquired in theſe two expeditions, was not near ſo great as it is repreſented in his commentaries. The poet Lucan tells us in expreſs terms, that he turned his back to the Britains: "Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga "Britannis, ſays he." Dion writes, that, in one action, the Britains entirely routed the Roman infantry; but were afterwards put in diſorder by the cavalry. Horace and Tibullus inſinuate, in ſeveral places of their works, that, in their time, the Britains were not looked upon as a conquered nation. Whence it is pretty plain, that his expedition into Britain was not ſo ſucceſsful, as he repreſents it to have been ſay, the great cement of peace between her father and huſband, and had, by her good offices, hitherto prevented them from coming to an open rupture. She was buried in the Field of Mars, an honour allowed only to the greateſt heroes of the republic [g].

A general inſurrection in Gaul.

Cæſar on his return to Gaul, found a famine in the country which obliged him to divide his troops, and put them into different quarters, for their better ſubſiſtence. This gave the Eburones, now the people of Liege, an opportunity of taking arms againſt Sabinus and Cotta, whom Cæſar had poſted in their country with only one legion and five cohorts. At the ſame time Ambiorix, a leading man among the Gauls, pretending friendſhip, told Sabinus and Cotta, while they were beſieged in their camp, that all the Gauliſh nations were marching againſt them, and offered to conduct them ſafe through his dominions to Cæſar or Labienus, The Romans in this diſtreſs accepted the offer; but were by the treacherous Ambiorix led into an ambuſcade, and moſt of them cut in pieces. Ambiorix elated with this ſucceſs, proclaimed it in the neighbouring nations; and then the Aduatici, falling unexpectedly upon Quintus Cicero, whom Cæſar had poſted among them with one legion, reduced him to great ſtreights; but the brave Roman defended himſelf with great gallantry, till Cæſar, whom he found means to acquaint with his danger, came to his relief and defeated the enemy. The news of this victory ſoon reached Labienus, who was likewiſe attacked by the Rhemi, among whom Cæſar had quartered him with one legion. Indutiomarus, being joined by the Senones, came and inſulted him in his camp; but the Roman, after pretending fear for ſome time, made a vigorous ſally, put the enemy to flight, and killed Indutiomarus, the chief author of the revolt. This victory gave Cæſar a little more quiet during the reſt of the campaign, which was the moſt difficult, as well as the moſt glorious of any he had made in Gaul; but after all, he loſt ſo many men this ſummer that he was forced to have recourſe to Pompey, who was weak enough to ſpare him two legions out of the army, which he kept for oſtentation only near Rome. Pompey was blind to Cæſar's deſigns; but Cato foreſaw the evils he was bringing on the republic, tho' it was out of his power to prevent them. All he could do was, to attempt the rooting out of bribery and corruption. In order to this, he enacted a law, forbidding the buying of votes at elections; and thereby incurred the hatred both of the rich, whom he endeavoured to deprive of a ſure way of obtaining honours, and of the poor, whom he would have excluded from a means of living without labour; neither did the law put a ſtop to the evil. When the election of new conſuls came on, the candidates bought no more ſingle votes of the people, but with large ſums purchaſed the protection of the triumvirs, or of the preſent conſuls; and thoſe who offered moſt would have been choſen, had not Q. Mutius Scævola, one of the tribunes and a true republican, by raiſing difficulty upon difficulty, got the aſſembly diſſolved as often as it was called, till at length the conſular year expired before the election was made, and then a long inter-regnum enſued [h].

Cato endeavours in vain to prevent bribery.

Great diſorders occaſioned in Rome by Pompey.

Pompey, who commanded an army in the neighbourhood of Rome, fomented diſcord in the capital, and, by his private intrigues, got the election of conſuls put off for ſeven months; during which time his friends, to ſound the diſpoſition of the people, ſaid in all places, that it was neceſſary, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, that Rome ſhould be governed by one man; nay, the tribune C. Luceius went ſo far, as to propoſe to the people the raiſing of Pompey to the dictatorſhip, but Cato oppoſed the motion with ſuch elequence and reſolution, that he had like to have got the tribune deprived of his office. Then Pompey, fearing to diſguſt the people whoſe favour he courted, and in order to remove all ſuſpicions, ſuffered Domitius Calvinus and Valerius Meſſala to be choſen conſuls; but this did not reſtore peace to the city. The five remaining months of the conſular year were ſpent in factions and maſſacres. Thoſe who ſtood candidates for the curule offices brought their money openly to the place of election, where it was without ſhame diſtributed among the heads of the factions; and thoſe who received it employed force and violence in favour of the perſons who paid them: ſo that ſcarce any office was diſpoſed of, but what had been diſputed ſword in hand, and had coſt the lives of many citizens [i].

five hundred horſe, either cut in pieces, or taken priſoners. His death gave riſe to the civil war, which ſoon after broke out between the two ſurviving triumvirs; for, while he lived, he was a check to them both, and balanced their intereſts: but he being taken off, an open field was left for their ambition and emulation to contend in. Pompey would bear no rival, and Cæſar no ſuperior; and hence thoſe diſturbances, which ended at length in the ruin of Pompey, and the utter deſtruction of the republican ſtate, as we ſhall ſee in the following chapter.

CHAP. XII.

The Hiſtory of Rome, from the death of Craſſus to the death of Pompey.

ONE of the triumvirs being dead, and another at a great diſtance from Rome; Pompey, who continued in the capital, raiſed great diſturbances there, hoping by that means to get himſelf promoted to the dictatorſhip. The city was now, in a manner, a ſeat of war between the candidates for offices; inſomuch, that the people being afraid to meet in the Campus Martius, the comitia were deferred, and another inter-regnum enſued. Theſe diſturbances were greatly encreaſed by the death of Clodius, who was killed by his mortal enemy Milo. This event, which Cicero endeavours to diſguiſe with all the art of eloquence, is thus related by hiſtorians: As Milo was going from Rome to Lanuvium, with his uſual guard of domeſtics, he met Clodius on the road, who was returning from his country-houſe. Milo was in a chariot, with his wife and other women; but Clodius on horſe-back, and well attended. They met near Bovillæ, and, tho' their looks were not very cordial, they paſſed each other without any inſult. But the maſters were ſcarce paſſed, when their ſlaves began to quarrel, and exchanged ſeveral blows with each other. Hereupon Milo, alighting out of his chariot, fell upon Clodius's ſlaves ſword in hand; and his attendants, encouraged by the example of their maſter, wounded many of Clodius's retinue. In this ſcuffle, Clodius himſelf, being dangerouſly wounded with a blow on the head, one of his ſlaves carried him to a neighbouring inn, or, as ſome ſay, to his own houſe. Thither Milo followed him, and, thinking

ing it more eaſy to eſcape condemnation by killing his enemy, than by ſuffering him to live after he had been wounded, completed the work, which one of his ſlaves had begun. Some writers tell us, that Milo, finding his rival ready to expire of the wound he had received before, left him in that condition, and returned with all ſpeed to Rome, to prevent what might be related and exaggerated there to his prejudice. However that be, the bloody body of Clodius was brought to the city by his brother Appius, which raiſed a general commotion among the people, who looked upon the deceaſed tribune as their boldeſt protector, and the moſt reſolute enemy of the ſenate and nobility. They ran to Milo's houſe to ſet fire to it; but he repulſed them at the head of his ſlaves, and killed ſeveral of the mutinous multitude in the fray. Then they carried the dead body to the ſenate-houſe, and there pulling to pieces all the ſeats of the ſenators, they made a funeral pile of them, on which they placed the body, and then ſet fire to it, which burnt with ſo much fury, that the ſtately building, where the ſenate uſed to aſſemble, was ſoon reduced to aſhes. In the mean time, Milo, having ſent for a great number of his ſlaves out of the country to guard his perſon, made uſe of an artifice with reſpect to the murder, which he imagined muſt be effectual. He gained M. Cæcilius, one of the tribunes, who, having called an aſſembly of his own creatures, ordered Milo to appear at his tribunal with a deſign to acquit him. But the people, more tranſported than ever, fell upon Milo and his tribune, who narrowly eſcaped being killed, diſperſed the aſſembly, and, under pretence of ſeeking for Milo's friends, committed all ſorts of violences; inſomuch, that no-body durſt appear in the ſtreets, unarmed and unguarded. During theſe diſturbances, Pompey's friends revived the old propoſal of nominating him dictator. The ſenate aſſembled, but while they were conſulting about raiſing him to that dignity, Cato, who was always watchful over the public liberty, inſinuated, that it would be more proper to chuſe him ſole conſul, ſince a conſul was bound, when called upon, to give an account of his adminiſtration to the ſenate and people, whereas a dictator was accountable to no-body for his conduct. Cato's expedient was approved of, and Pompey declared ſole conſul, a thing never known in Rome before. At the ſame time new troops were allotted to him, a thouſand talents, that is, 193750l. ſterling, allowed him yearly for their maintainance, and he continued in the government of Spain for four years longer, with a power to govern that province by his deputies. Pompey no ſooner entered upon his new office, than he ordered Milo to be tried for the murder of Clodius. On the day appointed for the trial, Appius Claudius, brother of the deceased, appeared against him, and was heard with great attention. Cicero undertook the defence of the accused, but was so terrified by Pompey's presence and the soldiers about him, that he could scarce open his mouth; so that Milo was condemned to banishment. He chose Marseilles for the place of his abode, whither Cicero sent him the speech, which he had composed in his defence. We are told, that Milo, in reading it, cried out, "It is lucky for me that "Cicero could not pronounce this harangue; for if he had, I "should not have eat so good fish as I now do."

Milo tried and condemned.

While Pompey was ruling arbitrarily at Rome, Cæsar was securing his conquests in Transalpine Gaul. Ambiorix, the Nervii, Aduatici, and Menapii, had revolted at the instigation of the Treviri, and the revolt had spread to other nations. He therefore first reduced the Menapii, and then marched against the Treviri and Eburones. The former he found already subdued by Labienus, and the latter at his approach retired, under the conduct of Ambiorix, to the woods and marshes, whither no army could follow them. In the mean time, winter approaching, Cæsar retired to Insubria, that he might be within reach of the capital. He was afraid lest Pompey, who was no longer attached to him by ties of blood, or by the regard he had for Crassus, should gain such a superiority over him, as it would not be easy for him to conquer. To prevent this, he sent immense sums to Rome to be distributed by his agents among the populace, paid the debts of some, lent money to others without interest; and in short, after having conquered the Gauls, as one of the antients expresses it, with the Roman steel, subdued the Romans with the Gaulish gold. But he had not been long in Insubria, when news was brought him, that the Gauls had taken up arms in his absence, that they had made Vercingetorix, a young and brave prince, their generalissimo, and that almost all the nations bordering on the ocean had joined in the revolt. Hereupon the proconsul repassed the Alps, flew with incredible expedition to Narbonne, from thence through deep snows to the country of the Nervii, where he gathered together his scattered troops, and then laid siege to Noviodunum, a city of the Bituriges, which brought Vercingetorix to its defence. But he was defeated and obliged to retire. Cæsar, having made himself master of Noviodunum, led his troops against Avaricum, now Bourges, one of the strongest cities in Gaul; took it by storm, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the garriſon, and made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Gauliſh troops, that of forty thouſand men, ſcarce eight hundred eſcaped. His next attempt was on Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, which he beſieged in ſight of Vercingetorix. But, while he was purſuing the ſiege, he received advice, that the Nithiobriges, now the people of Agenois, had revolted, and that ſome of the chief men among the Ædui had formed a treacherous ſcheme of carrying off to Vercingetorix ten thouſand men, whom they were to ſend to the Romans. Upon this advice, Cæſar, leaving Fabius to guard his camp before Gergovia, went to meet the Ædui, who begged for mercy, and were incorporated among the Roman auxiliaries. But ſoon after the whole nation of the Ædui ſhook off the Roman yoke, and murdered all the Italians in their capital. This made Cæſar uncertain what meaſures to purſue. At length he reſolved to attack the enemy's camp, which he did with good ſucceſs, till his men, contrary to his orders, abandoning the attack of the camp, fell unexpectedly on the town in hopes of ſurpriſing it. But Vercingetorix defended it ſo effectually, that Cæſar, after the loſs of ſeven hundred men, was forced to raiſe the ſiege. From thence he haſtened to Noviodunum, where he had left his military cheſt, baggage, and proviſions; but the revolted Ædui had ſeized all and ſet fire to the city. Then Cæſar, reſolving to join, if poſſible, his lieutenant Labienus, marched to Agendicum, now Sens, and at the ſame time Labienus, upon a report of Cæſar's diſtreſs, haſtened to the ſame place; and conducted his march through the enemy's country with great ſkill and dexterity. Camulogenus, a Gauliſh general, attacked him with great courage; but the Roman defeated him, reached Agendicum, where he had left his heavy baggage, and from thence went to meet Cæſar. Notwithſtanding this defeat, almoſt all the nations of Celtic Gaul joined in the revolt; and, having appointed Vercingetorix their generaliſſimo had the reſolution to come and attack Cæſar, who defeated them, and obliged them to retreat to Aleſia, a town of the Mandubii, now as is commonly believed, Aliſe in Burgundy. Thither Cæſar purſued them, and laid ſiege to the place. As it was very advantageouſly ſituated, Vercingetorix, after he had ſent meſſengers into all parts to raiſe new forces, ſhut himſelf up in it with eighty thouſand men. Cæſar immediately inveſted the place, ſurrounded it with a double circumvallation, and fortified his camp with all poſſible art and care, intending to reduce the enemy by famine. As the garriſon was very numerous, they were ſoon reduced to great diſtreſs for want of proviſions, proviſions; and then Vercingetorix drove out of the city all the uſeleſs mouths; but Cæſar, refuſing to accept of their ſurrender, inhumanly ſuffered them to periſh within the circumvallation. At length the deſired ſuccours arrived to the number of a hundred and ſixty thouſand men, under four Gauliſh generals, the chief of whom was Comius, prince of the Atrebates, on whom Cæſar had beſtowed many favours. They made ſeveral attacks on Cæſar's trenches, and fought three battles; but being always defeated and repulſed with great loſs, Vercingetorix, deſpairing of ſucceſs, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Cæſar reduced all the Gauls in the place to ſlavery, except the Arverni and the Ædui, whom he ſpared, hoping to gain over the two chief nations of Celtic Gaul by the diſtinction he ſhewed them. His expectations were not fruſtrated; the Arverni immediately ſubmitted, and the Ædui received him into their capital, where he ſpent the winter in tranquillity, after he had placed his army in different quarters to keep the provinces in awe. Thus ended a campaign, in which Cæſar gained more glory, for his conduct as general, and his bravery as a ſoldier, than any Roman commander had ever done before him.[1] At Rome twenty days of public prayers were ordered, to return thanks to the gods for this extraordinary ſucceſs.

Defeats the united forces of the Gauls, and takes the place.

At Rome, Pompey, to ſtrengthen himſelf with a new alliance, married Cornelia, the daughter of Cæcilius Metellus, a ſenator of great intereſt and highly eſteemed by the patricians. As Cæſar was greatly beloved by the people, Pompey now made it his whole buſineſs to eſtabliſh his intereſt among the nobility. With this view he aſſociated his father-in-law with him in the conſulate, though that dignity had been conferred on him without a collegue; which moderation gained him the affection of the ſenate. When the time came for the electing new conſuls, Cato, actuated only by a zeal for the public good, appeared among the candidates; but the tribes preferred to him Claudius Marcellus and Sulpicius Rufus, who were both in Pompey's intereſt. During their adminiſtration, Cicero was obliged to exchange the robe for the ſword, in virtue of a law made by Pompey during his late conſulſhip, which required all thoſe who had been conſuls or prætors for ſome years, to repair to ſuch provinces as ſhould fall to their lot, and exerciſe there their reſpective offices of proconſuls and proprætors. Cilicia and the iſland of Cyprus fell to Cicero's lot, who immediately embarqued at Brunduſium ſium with two legions, and arriving in Cilicia, encamped near Iconium, where he was informed by Antiochus, king of Comagene, that the Parthians had paſſed the Euphrates. Upon this, Cicero, croſſing Cappadocia, came to Cybiſtra, in the ſtreights of mount Taurus, in order to prevent the enemy from making incurſions into his province. Upon his arrival he received certain advice, that the Parthians were aſſembling about mount Amanus. Hereupon he haſtened thither, ſurprized the enemy; made a great ſlaughter of them, and recovered many caſtles which they had ſeized. But what gained him moſt glory was, the taking of Pindeniſſum, a ſtrong town in Cilicia, which he reduced after a ſiege of fifty-ſeven days. In ſhort, though he was more of an orator than a ſoldier, he ſupported his character in this new employment with great dignity, and performed ſuch military exploits as induced his ſoldiers to ſalute him imperator [m]. His brother Quintus Cicero, who attended him in this expedition, and had ſerved in Gaul under Cæſar with great reputation, had, no doubt, his ſhare in the glory of this campaign.

In the mean time, Cæſar ſpent the winter at Bibracte, the capital of the Ædui, his cares being divided between the important buſineſs he had to tranſact at Rome, and the neceſſary preparations for finiſhing the war with the Gauls the next campaign. At Rome his party prevailed in the comitium, and the people, whom he had artfully gained by his bounties, openly declared for him. But the ſenate ſeemed to favour Pompey's intereſt more than his. The conſul Marcellus, who was entirely and blindly devoted to Pompey, propoſed in the ſenate the recalling of Cæſar before his time expired; and becauſe this motion was rejected, he did all that lay in his power to diſgrace and expoſe the proconſul of Gaul. Among other things, he ordered a ſenator of Novocomum, which Cæſar had declared a Roman colony and preſented with the freedom of Rome, to be whipt, telling him, that he laid that mark upon him to let him know he was no citizen of Rome, and bidding him, when he went back, ſhow his ſhoulders to Cæſar. Soon after Cæſar moved the ſenate for the prolongation of his proconſulate; but, as Pompey and his agent Marcellus had a much greater aſcendant over the conſcript fathers, his requeſt was rejected. When news of this refuſal was brought him into Gaul, he is ſaid to have clapt his hand on his ſword, crying out in the preſence of his officers, "What

" Pompey refuſes me, this ſhall give me." Plutarch puts theſe words in the mouth of an officer, whom Cæſar had ſent to Rome, and who waited for the reſult of the debate at the door of the ſenate-houſe [n].

THE proceedings of the Roman ſenate engaged Cæſar to uſe all poſſible expedition in putting the laſt hand to his conqueſt. The Gauls, after the Battle of Aleſia, reſolved to act ſeparately, and raiſe, in defence of the poor remains of their liberty, as many different armies as they had provinces. This Cæſar knew, and notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon, he marched againſt, and ſucceſſively ſubdued, the Bituriges, Carnutes, and Rhemi. He then turned towards the country of the Bellovaci, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, killed Correus, one of their chief commanders, and by this ſingle victory quieted all Belgic, and the provinces bordering on Celtic, Gaul. After this he entered the country of the Eburones and laid it waſte, while Labienus did the ſame in the country of the Treviri. In the mean time Dumnarus, general of the revolted Andes, beſieged Limonum, now Poitiers, in the country of the Pictones; but Caninins and Fabius, two of Cæſar's lieutenants, advancing to the relief of the place, Dumnarus raiſed the ſiege in order to return into his own country. Fabius purſued him, and, coming up with him, defeated his army, killed twelve thouſand of them on the ſpot, and having diſperſed the reſt, entered the territories of the Carnutes, and ſubdued both them and the nations bordering on the ocean, whom Cæſar calls Armorici. And now the only Gauliſh generals, who kept the field, were Drapes the Senonian and Luterius the Cadurcean, who retired to a ſtrong place called Uxellodunum (E). Thither Caninius followed them, and defeated the two generals; but as the place was well garriſoned and ſtored with proviſions, he could not reduce it. As it was the only city which now held out, Cæſar haſtened thither from the fartheſt part of Belgic Gaul; and having ſoon reduced the place by depriving it of water, he cut off the right hands hands of all thoſe who were fit to bear arms, to terrify other cities from the like revolt. And now Cæſar, having ſubdued all Gaul from the Pyrenees and Alps to the Rhine, reduced his conqueſts to a Roman province under the government of a prætor. During his ſeveral expeditions into Gaul, he is ſaid to have taken eight hundred cities, to have ſubdued three hundred different nations, and to have defeated in ſeveral battles three millions of men, of which one million were killed and another taken priſoners; circumſtances which would ſeem greatly magnified, were they not vouched by Plutarch and other unexceptionable hiſtorians, both Greek and Roman.

(E) Sanſon takes Uxellodunum for Cahors in Quercy; wherein he ſeems to be miſtaken, ſince the antients give Cahors the name of Devona, Dibona, and Divona. Beſides, Hirtius, in his continuation of Cæſar's commentaries, places Uxellodunum on the confines of Quercy, whereas Cahors, was, according to all the modern geographers, in the center of that province. Whence father Briet and Cellarius are of opinion, that the antient city of Uxellodunum ſtood near Uſſeldun, or, as others call it, Uſſelon, near the borders of Limouſin.

AFTER Cæſar had put his troops into different quarters, in order to preſerve peace in all parts of Gaul, he went to ſpend the winter at Nemetocenna in the centre of Belgium. There he governed the vaſt continent he had ſubdued, with ſuch mildneſs and prudence, as ſhewed him equally qualified to preſide over nations and to command armies. In the mean time, Pompey got two of Cæſar's moſt avowed enemies, Claudius Marcellus and Æmilius Paulus, promoted to the counſulſhip, and Scribonius Curio, another of his creatures, put at the head of the tribunes. Curio, was a young patrician of extraordinary talents and great eloquence, but one of the moſt vicious and debauched young men in Rome. His father, who had been diſtinguiſhed by a conſulate and a triumph, had given him a great example; but the ſon only abuſed the gifts of nature and fortune. We are told, that young as he was, he had contracted debts to the amount of ſix hundred thouſand great ſeſterces, that is, 4,843,750l. ſterling. Appius Clodius Pulcher, who was generally thought an enemy to Cæſar, and Calpurnius Piſo, were choſen cenſors. So that of all the chief magiſtrates, Calpurnius, Cæſar's father-in law, was the only one on whom he could depend; but neither his character nor his office were ſuch at preſent as gave him any great weight. His collegue was indeed more bold; he degraded ſeveral of the Roman knights and ſenators, and among the reſt Salluſt the hiſtorian, whoſe enormous debauchery was branded with infamy [a]. The two cenſors took the laſt cenſus under the republic, in which they computed three hundred and twenty thouſand citizens fit to bear arms, and ended it with a luſtrum.

SUCH was the ſtate of affairs at Rome when Cæſar, after having ſpent the winter in Tranſalpine Gaul, repaſſed the mountains, in order to obſerve more narrowly the ſteps which Pompey and his enemies were taking againſt him at Rome. During his ſtay in Ciſalpine Gaul, he was informed, that the two two conſuls had ſworn his deſtruction; and that, to compaſs it with more eaſe, the tribune Curio was preparing a law, depriving him of his government and of the command of the army in Gaul. But in a few days he overturned all the ſchemes, which his competitor had been forming againſt him for ſeveral years. The riches he had heaped up in Gaul were immenſe. He had indeed diſtributed vaſt ſums among perſons of all ranks, and even among the ſlaves at Rome; but he had ſtill reſerved vaſt treaſures for himſelf. With theſe he endeavoured to draw off from Pompey thoſe very friends whom he had raiſed to the magiſtracy. Marcellus was proof againſt all temptation; but his collegue Æmilius Paulus was bought at the price of fifteen hundred talents, that is, 310,625l. ſterling. With this money he built that ſtately edifice, which was afterwards called the Baſilica of Paulus. As the tribune Curio was over-ran with debts and devoted to his pleaſures, Cæſar, by enabling him to ſatisfy his creditors and plentifully ſupplying him with money for his debaucheries, ſecured him in his intereſt. Nevertheleſs Curio did not diſcover at once the change which Cæſar's money had wrought in him, but gradually and with circumſpection. Pompey continued to repoſe an entire confidence in him, and was continually preſſing him to propoſe his law for the recalling of Cæſar. But the crafty tribune poſtponed it, from month to month, under frivolous pretences; and when he was at length forced to act, Cæſar's laſt year being near expired, he found means to do Cæſar the moſt important ſervice without declaring for him. He made a motion both to the ſenate and people, that they would either continue both generals in their commands or reduce both; and left it to them to take their choice. The tribune foreſaw, that Pompey would never conſent to lay down the government of Spain, or part with the command of the army; and therefore made this motion, that Cæſar might draw from Pompey's refuſal a pretence for continuing himſelf in his province at the head of his troops. Cornelius Scipio, one of Pompey's friends, remonſtrated, that in the preſent caſe a great difference was to be made between the proconſul of Spain and the proconſul of Gaul, ſince the term of the former was not yet expired, whereas that of the latter was. To this Curio replied, that in the preſent criſis, when the republic was in a manner ſubject to two abſolute ſovereigns, there was no medium. Both ought to be diſcharged, ſaid he, or both continued in their office. Who-ever continues alone in arms, will become the tyrant of Rome. If they continue both armed, the power of the one will balance that of the other; and we ſhall be ſe-

cured by their mutual fears. The ſenate were for recalling Cæſar and continuing Pompey in his office; but the people were inclined to favour Curio's motion. Pompey himſelf, being greatly embarraſſed, left Rome, under pretence of going to his government; but went no farther than to a country-houſe at a ſmall diſtance from Rome, whence he wrote a very artful letter to the ſenate, acquainting them, that he was ready to reſign all his employments and diſband his army, provided Cæſar did the ſame. Curio, well appriſed that Pompey's view was to induce the ſenate to recall Cæſar, told Pompey, on his return to Rome, that it was his duty to begin what he propoſed, and aſſured him, that his example would be followed by Cæſar. Pompey inſiſted upon Cæſar's reſigning the firſt, ſince his term was expired. Whereupon Curio propoſed, that both ſhould be ordered to lay down their commiſſions, and declared enemies to the republic if they refuſed to comply with the order. The fathers all inclined to recall both rivals; but were for obliging Cæſar to reſign the command of his army before Pompey gave up his. Whereupon Curio, who repreſented the people at the head of the tribunes, would not ſuffer them to deliberate any longer about the diſmiſſion of either. Then they only decreed, that one legion out of each army ſhould be ſent into Syria, where Bibulus wanted a reinforcement againſt the Parthians. Pompey at the ſame time demanded of Cæſar the legions which he had formerly lent him. Cæſar knew the reaſon of this order and of Pompey's deſign, which was to weaken his army; but nevertheleſs he delivered up the two legions to Appius Clodius, whom the ſenate had ſent to receive them and conduct them into Italy. Cæſar, on their quitting his army, loaded the officers with preſents, and gave each private man two hundred and fifty drachmas, that is, about five pounds of our money. When the two legions arrived in Italy, inſtead of being ſent into the eaſt, they were both, by an order from the conſul Marcellus, added to Pompey's troops. Cicero, at this time returned to Rome from his government of Cilicia, and demanded a triumph for his victory over the Parthians. His abſence had prevented him from joining either party, and his preſent pretenſions obliged him to ſtand neuter. He therefore took upon him the office of mediator; but Pompey would now hearken to no terms of accommodation, Appius having, on his return from Gaul, to flatter Pompey's ambition, ſpread abroad, that Cæſars's troops were diſſatisfied with their general, for having engaged them in ſo many dangerous expeditions; that they ſuſpected him of aiming at abſolute authority; and therefore, on their firſt entering Italy, would all to a man a man declare for him and the ſenate. This falſe repreſentation gave Pompey great confidence, and made him neglect the neceſſary preparations to oppoſe ſo powerful a rival. Cicero, amazed to find him deaf to all terms of accommodation, and at the ſame time neglecting to ſtrengthen his army with new levies, aſked him, with what forces he deſigned to make head againſt Cæſar? To this Pompey proudly anſwered, "that he "needed but ſtamp with his foot, and an army would ſtart out "of the ground." He ſpoke with ſo much confidence, becauſe he flattered himſelf, that, in caſe of an open rupture, Cæſar's army would abandon him. In the mean time, Pompey having got two of his friends, Clodius Marcellus and Cornelius Lentulus, choſen to the conſulate, Cæſar, before they entered upon their offices, wrote to the ſenate, deſiring them to continue him in his government, as they had continued Pompey. But his requeſt being rejected, he repaſſed the Alps with the third legion, and advanced to Ravenna, whence he wrote a letter to the new conſuls, wherein, after an honourable mention of his conqueſts and exploits, he declared, that he was willing to reſign all his power, provided Pompey did the ſame. Hereupon warm debates aroſe in the ſenate; but it was at length almoſt unanimouſly decreed, that Cæſar ſhould give up his government and the command of the army; and that he ſhould be treated as an enemy to his country, if he did not, within a limited time, comply with this decree. Caſſius Longinus, Marc Antony, and Curio, three of the tribunes, proteſted againſt the proceedings of the ſenate. But the conſuls, having firſt attempted in vain to make them deſiſt from their oppoſition, drove them out of the ſenate with diſgrace. Cæſar, informed of all theſe tranſactions, that he might have the appearance of juſtice on his ſide, wrote again to the ſenate with a great deal of temper, deſiring, that ſince they were determined to deprive him of his government of Gaul and the command of the army, they would at leaſt continue him in the government of Illyricum and allow him two legions. It is probable, he would never have made theſe propoſals, if he had believed the ſenate would have complied with them. But he was well appriſed, that the oppoſite faction had reſolved to reduce him to the ſtate of a private perſon. He therefore affected a great deal of moderation, though he was all the while determined, neither to part with the command of the army, nor his government. At length the three tribunes, his friends, not thinking themſelves any longer ſafe in Rome, where the conſuls threatened to degrade them, retired in the night in the diſguiſe of ſlaves to take ſhelter in Cæſar's camp at Ravenna. Upon their departure, the fatal decree was iſſued, which put the republic in a flame, and brought it to its deſtruction: "Let the conſuls for the "year, the proconſul Pompey, the prætors, and all thoſe in "or near Rome, who have been conſuls, provide for the "public ſafety by the moſt proper means." This was proclaiming war. So that two powerful parties were ſeen to take up arms, both pretending to have nothing in view but the defence of their common laws and liberty, while their chiefs aimed only at eſtabliſhing their own power and authority on the ruins of that liberty, which they affected to defend. Pompey's party had a more ſpecious outſide; he covered his deſigns with the awful name of the commonwealth, which acknowledged him for her general, and the whole ſenate with the conſuls followed his enſigns. On the other hand, the people and their tribunes were with Cæſar; ſo that in reality the two legiſlative powers were divided between theſe two mighty rivals. The above-mentioned decree was no ſooner paſſed, than the conſul Marcellus went with his collegue Lentulus a little way out of town to a houſe, where Pompey then was, and, preſenting him with a ſword, "We "require you, ſaid he, ſpeaking in the name of both, to take "upon you with this the defence of the republic and the "command of her troops." Pompey declared he would obey their orders; adding th a feigned modeſty, "Unleſs a more "happy expedient be firſt found out." By the ſame decree, which deprived Cæſar of his government and the command of the army, Lucius Domitius was appointed to ſucceed him, and impowered to raiſe four thouſand new levies to enable him to take poſſeſſion of his government [p].

Pompey and the ſenate prepare for war.

After the ſenate had taken this fatal reſolution againſt Cæſar, they met daily to conſult about the moſt proper meaſures for carrying on the war, in caſe Cæſar refuſed to comply with their decree. Pompey lodged in the ſuburbs, not being allowed, as general, to enter the city; and there the ſenate aſſembled to hold their conſultations. They firſt conſidered what name they ſhould give the enterpriſe, and determined to call it a tumult, which was ranking it among thoſe ſudden commotions which are raiſed and ſuppreſſed in an inſtant. So that Rome either did not know, or did not dread, the enemy ſhe was bringing on herſelf. In the next place, they ordered Pompey to aſſemble thirty thouſand Roman troops, troops, and take into the ſervice as many foreign forces as he ſhould think proper. Levies were made accordingly in all haſte, and money taken out of the public treaſury to defray the expences of one campaign. As for Pompey, he was wholly intent on appointing ſuch governors for the provinces as were moſt firmly attached to him. He gave Syria to Cæcilius Metellus Scipio, his father-in-law, who immediately ſet out with young Pompey to aſſemble a fleet on the coaſt of Aſia. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus was nominated to ſucceed Cæſar, purſuant to the decree of the ſenate, in the government of Tranſalpine Gaul; but he imprudently ſhut himſelf up in Corfinium before he left Italy. Cato was appointed prætor of Sicily, Cotta of Sardinia, and L. Ælius Tubero of Africa. M. Calpurnius Bibulus and Cicero were charged to guard the coaſts of Italy. The other provinces, viz. Pontus, Bithynia, Cyprus, Cilicia, Macedon, &c. were all beſtowed on Pompey's friends, who from this time aſſumed the character of generaliſſimo of the republic, and governed with as abſolute a ſway as if he had been king of Rome [q].

Cæſar exhorts his ſoldiers to ſtand by him.

In the mean time, the three tribunes, Curio, Antony, and Longinus, who had been driven from Rome, arriving in Cæſar's camp, diſguiſed like ſlaves, he ſhewed them in that condition to the legion he had then with him, exaggerating the violence which had been offered them by the ſenate, and the unwarrantable ſteps the patricians had taken againſt himſelf; in the cloſe of his ſpeech, he exhorted his men to defend the honour and character of their general, under whom they had made war with ſucceſs for nine years together. When he had done ſpeaking, they all cried out, that they were ready to maintain the rights of their general and of the tribunes of the people, and revenge the injuries which had been done them. When he found he could depend on his ſoldiers, he reſolved to begin hoſtilities without delay, and, entering Italy properly ſo called, to make himſelf maſter of Ariminum, a city bordering on Ciſalpine Gaul, which was part of his province. As this was a bold ſtep, and an open declaration of war, he carefully concealed his deſign, and ſent a detachment towards the Rubicon, ordering the officer who commanded it, to wait for him on the banks of that river. The next day he aſſiſted at a ſhew of gladiators, and made a great entertainment. Towards the cloſe of the day he roſe from table, deſiring firing his guests to stay till he came back, which, he said, would be very soon; but instead of returning to the company, he immediately left Ravenna, where he then was, after he had ordered some of his most intimate friends to follow him, thro' different roads, to avoid being observed. He himself travelled in a hired chariot, and drove first another way, but at some distance from the town turned towards Ariminum. When he reached the banks of the Rubicon, which parted Cisalpine Gaul, his province, from Italy, all the misfortunes of the succeeding war offered themselves to his mind, and kept him some time in suspence. He often changed his opinion without speaking a word, being one minute determined to cross the river, and another to go back, computing with himself how many calamities his passing it would bring upon the republic, and what an account of it would be transmitted to posterity. As he had been brought up in the bosom of a commonwealth, he could not look on the approaching ruin of his country without concern; and therefore turning to Asinius Pollio, "If I do not cross the river, said he, I am undone; and, if I do cross it, how many calamities shall I by this step bring upon Rome!" Having thus spoke, he mused a few minutes on the hatred and inveteracy of his enemies, and then crying out, "The die is cast," he threw himself into the river, and crossing it, marched with all possible expedition towards Ariminum, which he reached and surprised before daybreak (F). From thence, as he had but one legion with him, he immediately dispatched orders to the great army he had left in Gaul to cross the mountains, and join him [r].

Rome in the utmost consternation.

It is impossible to express the terrour and fear all Italy and Rome herself was in, upon the unexpected news of this enterprise.

(F) Some authors, and among the rest Suetonius (27), tell us, that while Cæsar was yet in suspence and undetermined, there appeared all on a sudden a man of an extraordinary stature, playing on a flute of reeds; which uncommon sight drew many of the legionaries to him, and among the rest a trumpet, from whom the unknown man snatched his instrument, and sounding the charge, threw himself into the river, and crossed it. Hereupon, Cæsar without further consideration, followed him, crying aloud, "Let us go whither the Gods call us, and the fury of our enemies "drives us; the die is cast.

terpriſe. They imagined this renowned commander already at the gates of the city, with the formidable army he commanded in Gaul. Nothing was ſeen but terror and confuſion, the country people crouding into the city for ſafety, and the citizens flying into the country. The ſenate met ſeveral times without coming to any reſolution. Several ſenators, without propoſing any thing themſelves, only contradicted the advice of others. Pompey himſelf was no leſs alarmed than the other ſenators; as he had not yet drawn together his troops, who were quartered in different provinces at ſome diſtance from the capital, he was no-ways in a condition to make head againſt Cæſar. But nothing gave him greater uneaſineſs, than the reproaches which many of his own party threw out againſt him, ſome charging him with indiſcretion in arming Cæſar againſt himſelf and the government, and others blaming him for having neglected the neceſſary preparations. M. Favonius, alluding to the rhodomantade mentioned above, deſired him "to ſtamp with his foot, and "make armies ſtart up, as he had promiſed." Every ſenator thought himſelf privileged to reproach and adviſe him. In this confuſion, Pompey, ſeeing himſelf in Rome without troops, and fearing, if he ſhould arm the people, they would declare againſt him, reſolved to retire to Capua, where the two legions were encamped which Cæſar had ſurrendered to Appius. He communicated his deſign to the ſenate, and at the ſame time declared, that if any ſenator or magiſtrate refuſed to follow him, he ſhould be treated as a friend to Cæſar, and an enemy to his country. Upon this declaration the conſuls, the ſenators, and all the magiſtrates, left Rome in great haſte, and attended Pompey into Campania [s]. Pompey abandons Rome.

In the mean time, Cæſar, having raiſed new troops in Ciſalpine Gaul, ſent Marc Antony with a detachment to ſeize Aretium, and other officers to ſecure Piſaurum and Fanum, while he himſelf marched at the head of the thirteenth legion to Auximum, which opened its gates to him. From Auximum he advanced into Picenum, where he was joined by the twelfth legion from Tranſalpine Gaul. As Picenum readily ſubmitted to him, he led his forces againſt Corfinium, the capital of the Peligni, which Domitius Ahenobarbus defended with thirty cohorts. But Cæſar no ſooner inveſted it, than the garriſon betrayed their commander, and delivered Cæſar ſeizes Aretium, Piſaurum, &c.

delivered him up with many ſenators, who had taken refuge in the place, to Cæſar, who, to ſhew his great moderation in the midſt of victory, granted them their lives and liberty (G). Domitius, fearing the reſentment of the conqueror, had ordered one of his ſlaves, whom he uſed as a phyſician, to give him a doſe of poiſon. When he came to experience the humanity of the conqueror, he lamented his misfortune, and blamed the haſtineſs of his own reſolution. But his phyſician, who had only given him a ſleeping draught, comforted him, and received his liberty, as a reward for his affection [t].

Pompey

[t] Plut. Appian. Cæſar. ibid.

(G) Domitius, as ſoon as Corfinium was inveſted, found means to convey a letter to Pompey, wherein he preſſed him to march directly to the defence of a place of ſuch importance. "Loſe "no time, ſaid he, but lay hold of the favourable opportunity "which fortune now offers you of ſurrounding Cæſar. If you "make haſte the war will be at an end. Conſider, your credit "is at ſtake. You cannot in honour reject the requeſt of the "many ſenators and Roman knights, who are ſhut up in this "place. They have recourſe to you, as to their deliverer, and "take it for granted, that you will not abandon thirty three "cohorts of the beſt of your troops to the mercy of the enemy, "who haſtens to his own deſtruction." But Pompey's anſwer was very different from what Domitius expected He told him, "that he could not in his preſent ſituation hazard a battle, the loſs "of which would infallibly bring with it the ruin of the repub-"lic." He reproached him with having undertaken the defence of Corfinium, and ſhut himſelf up in that place contrary to his opinion. He adviſed him to abandon the place, and join the conſular army, with all poſſible expedition. But as this was not now in his power, he prepared to ſuſtain a ſiege, provided his machines, aſſigned his troops their poſts, and, in order to encourage them, promiſed each ſoldier four acres of land. Cæſar, on the other hand, provided his camp with all things neceſſary for a ſiege; and in the mean time, the eighth legion joined him with twenty cohorts of Gauls and three hundred German horſe. For theſe he formed a new camp, and appointed Curio to command in it, Domitius, though he expected no ſuccours, did all that lay in his power to perſuade his men, that all the forces of the republic were marching to his relief. But a report being ſpread, that he deſigned to eſcape privately, they mutinied, ran to his quarters, and, having ſeized him, opened the gates to the enemy. As this tumult happened in the night, Cæſar, leſt the darkneſs ſhould encourage his men to plunder and commit violences, de-

Pompey, thinging himſelf no longer ſafe at Capua, after the reduction of Corfinium, retired to Brunduſium, with a deſign to carry the war into the eaſt, where all the governors were his creatures. Cæſar followed him cloſe croſs Apulia, and arriving with his army before Brunduſium, inveſted the place on the land-ſide, and undertook to ſhut up the port by a ſtaccado of his own invention. But before the work was completed, the fleet, which had conveyed the two conſuls with thirty cohorts to Dyrrachium, now Durazzo, being returned, Pompey reſolved to make his eſcape, which he conducted with all the experience and dexterity of a great officer. He kept his departure very ſecret; but at the ſame time made all neceſſary preparations for the facilitating of it. In the firſt place he walled up the gates, then dug deep and wide ditches croſs all the ſtreets, except only thoſe two that led to the port; in the ditches he planted ſharp-pointed ſtakes, covering them with hurdles and earth. After theſe precautions, he gave expreſs orders that all the citizens ſhould keep within doors, leſt they ſhould betray his deſign to the enemy, and then in the ſpace of three days embarqued all his troops, except the light-armed infantry, whom he had placed on the walls; and theſe likewiſe, on a ſignal given, abandoning their poſts, repaired with great expedition to the ſhips. Cæſar, perceiving the walls unguarded, ordered his men to ſcale them and make what haſte they could after the enemy. In the heat of the purſuit, they would have fallen into the ditches, which Pompey had prepared for them, had not the Brunduſians warned them of the danger, and by many windings and turnings led them to the haven, where they found all the fleet under ſail, except two veſſels, which had run a-ground in going out of the harbour. Theſe Cæſar ſeized, took the ſoldiers on board priſoners, and brought them aſhore. Cæſar, ſeeing himſelf by the flight of his rival maſter of all Italy from the Alps to the ſea, was deſirous to follow and attack him, before he was joined by the ſupplies which he expected from Aſia. But being deſtitute of ſhipping, he ferred entering the town till the next morning. At break of day Lentulus Spinther, one of the ſenators who were ſhut up in the place, waited on Cæſar, who received him with great marks of friendſhip, which induced the others to ſubmit and ſurrender the place at diſcretion. Cæſar not only gave Domitius his liberty, but reſtored to him the money which he had taken out of the treaſury for the paying of his troops, and was lodged in the hands of the magiſtrates of Corfinium.

he reſolved to go firſt to Rome and ſettle ſome ſort of government there, and then paſs into Spain to drive from thence Pompey's troops, who had taken poſſeſſion of that great continent under the command of Afranius and Petreius. Before he left Brunduſium he ſent Scribonius Curio with three legions into Sicily, and ordered Q. Valerius, one of his lieutenants, to get together what ſhips he could, and croſs over with one legion into Sardinia. Cato, who commanded in Sicily, upon the firſt news of Curio's landing there, abandoned the iſland, and retired to the camp of the conſuls at Dyrrachium: and Q. Valerius no ſooner appeared with his ſmall fleet off Sardinia, than the Caralitani, now the inhabitants of Cagliari, drove out Aurelius Cotta, who commanded there for the ſenate, and put Cæſar's lieutenant in poſſeſſion both of their city and iſland. In the mean time, the general himſelf advanced towards Rome, and that with the more confidence, becauſe he had made himſelf maſter of all Italy, without ſhedding one drop of blood. On his march he wrote to all the ſenators then in Italy, deſiring them to repair to the capital, and aſſiſt him there with their counſel. Above all, he was deſirous to ſee Cicero; and therefore, after having preſſed him in vain by Oppilus and Cælius, their common friends, to come and meet him, he turned out of the road, and went to his country houſe, where he had a long conference with him, but could not prevail upon him to return to Rome (H). As Cæſar drew near the capital, he quartered his

(H) In this conference Cæſar earneſtly preſſed Cicero to return to the capital. "I have ſeen Cæſar, ſays he, in one of his "letters to Atticus (28). who earneſtly preſſed me to return to "Rome; but I withſtood his deſire. He looked upon my abſence as a tacit condemnation of his proceedings againſt Pompey, "and is perſuaded, that moſt of the ſenators are induced to retire "into the country by my example." Cæſar, in order to prevail upon Cicero to come to Rome, told him, that he had nothing elſe in view, but to employ him in bringing about a laſting accomodation between him and Pompey. To this Cicero replyed, "that "he would readily attend him to the capital, upon condition that "he ſhould be at full liberty to declare his opinion concerning the "preſent ſtate of affairs." But Cæſar not liking this condition, "You muſt not then take it amiſs, replyed Cicero, that I perſiſt, "in my reſolution of not going to Rome; if I am not allowed "to ſpeak my mind, I ought not to appear in the ſenate." Cæſar, little ſatisfied with this anſwer, took his leave of Cicero, after having entreated him in a friendly manner not to take any ſtep in ſo nice an affair, without mature deliberation.

his troops in the neighbouring municipia; and then advancing to the city, out of a pretended reſpect to the antient cuſtoms, he took up his quarters in the ſuburbs, whither the whole city crouded to ſee the famous conqueror of Gaul, who had been abſent from Rome near ten years. And now ſuch of the tribunes of the people as had fled to him for refuge, reaſſumed their functions, mounted the roſtra, and endeavoured by their ſpeeches to reconcile the people to the head of their party. Marc Antony particularly and Caſſius Longinus, two of Cæſar's moſt zealous partizans, moved, that the ſenate ſhould meet in the ſuburbs, that the general might give them an account of his conduct. Accordingly, ſuch of the ſenators as were at Rome aſſembled, when Cæſar, with that dignity and eloquence, which were natural to him, made a ſpeech in juſtification of all his proceedings, encouraged the timorous, gave great hopes to the wavering, and concluded his harangue with propoſing a deputation to Pompey, with offers of an accommodation in an amicable manner. He even deſired the conſcript fathers, to whom in appearance he paid great deference, to nominate ſome of their venerable body to carry propoſals of peace to the conſuls and the general of the conſular army. But not one of the ſenators would take upon him that commiſſion, ſome being afraid of Pompey, who had declared all thoſe enemies who ſhould ſtand neuter, and others plainly ſeeing that Cæſar did not mean what he ſaid (I). He then began to think of providing himſelf with the neceſſary ſums for the carrying on of the war, and had recourſe to the public treaſury. But Metellus, one of the tribunes, oppoſed him, alledging a law, forbidding any one to open the treaſury, but in the preſence, and with the conſent, of the conſuls. To which Cæſar replied, "Arms and "laws do not well agree; when I ſhall have laid down my "arms, then I will hearken to laws, and let you make as long "harangues

The ſenate aſſembles.

(I) Cæſar tells us, that he attempted ſeveral times to make up matters with Pompey in an amicable manner. On his march to Brunduſium he ſent Cn. Magius, one of Pompey's chief officers, whom he had taken priſoner, to invite his rival to an interview. But, as the conſuls had already ſet ſail for Dyrrachium, Pompey anſwered, that he could do nothing in their abſence In the firſt days of the ſiege he attempted once more to draw Pompey to a conference, and with this view ſent Caninius Rebilius, one of the chief officers of his army, to mediate an accommodation, together with P. Scribonius Libo, Pompey's particular friend. But he returned

" harangues as you pleaſe; but at preſent I adviſe you to re-

" for me to ſay than to do." Theſe words ſo terrified Metellus, that he withdrew; and then Cæſar took out of the treaſury, which was ever after at his command, an immenſe ſum, ſome ſay three hundred thouſand pounds weight of gold. With this ſupply of money he raiſed troops all over Italy, and ſent governors into all the provinces ſubject to the republic. He made Marc Antony commander in chief of the armies in Italy, ſent his brother C. Antonius to govern Illyricum, aſſigned Ciſalpine Gaul to Licinius Craſſus, appointed M. Æmilius Lepidus governor of the capital, and having got together ſome ſhips to cruiſe in the Adriatic and Mediterranean ſeas, he gave the command of one of his fleets to P. Cornelius Dolabella, and of the other to young Hortenſius, the ſon of the famous orator. As Pompey had ſent governors into the ſame provinces, by this means a general war was kindled in all the parts of the known world. However, Cæſar would not truſt any of his lieutenants with the conduct of the war in Spain, which was Pompey's favourite province, but took it upon himſelf; and, having ſettled his affairs in great haſte at Rome, returned to Ariminum, aſſembled his legions there, and, paſſing the Alps entered Tranſalpine Gaul. There he was informed, that the inhabitants of Marſeilles had reſolved to refuſe him entrance into their city, and that L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, whom he had generouſly pardoned and ſet at liberty after the reduction of Corfinium, had ſet ſail for Marſeilles with ſeven gallies, having on board a great number of his clients and ſlaves, with a deſign to raiſe the city in favour of turned the ſame anſwer, viz. that he could not come to an agreement in the abſence of the conſuls. Cæſar in his firſt ſpeech to the ſenate ſhewed a great inclination to compoſe matters in an amicable manner, and deſired the conſcript fathers to depute ſome of their body, with propoſals of an accommodation, both to Pompey and the conſuls. But men of penetration plainly ſaw, that Cæſar was more averſe to any ſort of accommodation than Pompey himſelf, and that he talked of it only to leſſen the odium of his proceedings, and throw the whole blame of the war on Pompey and his party.

of Pompey. Cæsar, thinking it dangerous to let the enemy take possession of such an important place, sent for the fifteen chief magistrates of the city, and advised them not to begin a war with him, but rather follow the example of Italy and submit. The magistrates returned to the city, and soon after sent Cæsar the following answer: since the Roman people are divided into two parties, we will not take upon us to determine on which side the right lies. We have great obligations, and an equal affection for both competitors; they are both our patrons, both our benefactors; and therefore that we may not help one against the other, our port and the gates of our city shall be shut to both. In the mean time, Domitius arriving with his small squadron was received into the city, and declared general of all their forces. Hereupon Cæsar, justly provoked at such unfair dealings, immediately invested the town with three legions, and ordered twelve gallies to be built at Arelas, now Arles, in order to block up the port. But as the siege was like to detain him too long, he left C. Trebonius to carry it on, and D. Brutus to command the fleet, while he continued his march into Spain, where he began the war with all the valour, ability, and success of a great hero. Pompey had three generals in this great continent, which was divided into two Roman provinces. Varro commanded in Further Spain; and Petreius and Afranius, with equal power and two considerable armies, in Hither Spain. Cæsar, while he was yet at Marseilles, sent Q. Fabius, one of his lieutenants, with three legions, to take possession of the passes of the Pyrenees, which Afranius had seized. Fabius executed his commission with great bravery, entered Spain, and left the way open to Cæsar, who soon followed him. As soon as he had crossed the mountains, he sent out scouts to observe the situation of the enemy; by whom he was informed, that Afranius and Petreius, having joined their forces, consisting of five legions, twenty cohorts of the natives, and five thousand horse, were advantageously posted on an hill of an easy ascent in the neighbourhood of Ilerda, now Lerida in Catalonia. Upon this advice he advanced within sight of the enemy, and encamped in a plain between the Sicoris and the Cinga, now the Segro and the Cinca. Between the eminence, on which Afranius had posted himself, and the city of Ilerda, was a small plain, and in the middle of it a rising ground, which Cæsar attempted to seize, in order to cut off by that means the communications between the enemy's camp and the city, from whence they had all their provisions. This occasion'd a sharp dispute between three of Cæsar's legions and an equal number of the enemy; which lasted five hours with equal success, both parties claiming the victory. But after all, Afranius's men, who had first seized the post, maintained themselves in possession of it in spight of Cæsar's utmost efforts. Two days after this battle continual rains, with the melting of the snow on the mountains, so swelled the two rivers, between which Cæsar was encamped, that they overflowed, broke down his bridges, and laid under water the neighbouring country to a great distance. This cut off the communication between his camp and the cities that had declared for him, and reduced him to such straights, that his army was ready to perish for famine, wheat being sold in his camp at fifty Roman denarii per bushel, that is, 1 l. 12 s. 3 d ½. sterling. He tried to rebuild his bridges, but in vain, the violence of the stream rendering all his endeavours fruitless [u].

In great danger.

Upon the news of Cæsar's distress, Pompey's party at Rome began to take courage. Several persons of distinction went to congratulate Afranius's wife on the success of her husband's arms in Spain. Many of the senators, who had hitherto stood neuter, hastened to join Pompey, taking it for granted, that Cæsar was reduced to the last extremity, and all the hopes of his party lost. Of this number was Cicero; who, without any regard to the remonstrances of Atticus, or the letters Cæsar himself wrote to him (K), desiring him to join neither party, left Italy and landed at Dyrrachium, where Pompey received him with great marks of joy and friendship. But Cicero soon repented of the little regard he had paid to the advice of his friends, and could not forgive himself his having too easily given credit to the reports that were brought from Spain. He ever appeared gloomy, thoughtful, and uneasy, and even vented his ill humour in severe

(K) In one of these letters he expresses himself thus: "It will "not be believed, that the justice of my enemy's cause has in-"duced you to declare against me. Every one will think that you "have been displeased at some action of mine, which would most "sensibly grieve me. A man of honour who loves the peace and "welfare of his country, ought to avoid taking any side in a civil "war. ſevere jeſts on Pompey (L). The offenſive things he threw out on all occaſions, and his unſeaſonable jeſts, led ſome to ſuſpect, that he kept a correſpondence with Cæſar. However that be, Pompey would neither truſt him with any command, nor impart to him his deſigns; nay, he went ſo far as to bid him be gone to Cæſar's camp, where he would have leſs reaſon to jeſt, and more to be afraid. Neither did his old friend Cato give him a very favourable reception. He was diſpleaſed at his having ſo unſeaſonably declared for a party, which he might have ſerved more effectually, by keeping an exact neutrality. Cicero was ſo ſtrongly affected with theſe reproches, that he left the camp, and did not appear even at the battle of Pharſalia.

BUT the joy of Pompey's party was not long-lived. For Cæſar, after having attempted ſeveral times in vain to rebuild his bridges, cauſed boats to be made with all poſſible expedition; and while the enemy were diverted by endeavouring to intercept the ſuccours that were ſent him from Gaul, he laid hold of that opportunity to convey his boats in the night on carriages twenty-two miles from his camp; where, with wonderful quickneſs, a great detachment paſſed the Sicoris, and, encamping on the oppoſite bank unknown to the enemy, built a bridge in two days, opened a communication with the neighbouring country, received the ſupplies from Gaul, and relieved the wants of his ſoldiers. Cæſar, being thus delivered from all danger, purſued the armies of Afranius and Petreius with ſuch ſuperior addreſs and conduct, that he forced them to ſubmit without coming to a battle, and by that means became maſter of all Hither Spain. The two generals diſbanded their troops, ſent them out of the province, and returned themſelves to Italy, after having ſolemnly promiſed never to aſſemble forces again or make war upon Cæſar [x]. Upon the news of the reduction of Hither Spain, the Spaniards in Further Spain, and one Roman legion deſerted from Varro, Pompey's governor in that province, which obliged him to ſurrender der his other legion and all his money. Cæsar, having thus reduced all Spain in a few months, appointed Cassius Longinus to govern the two provinces with four legions, and then returned to Marseilles, which city was then just upon the point of surrendering, after a most vigorous resistance. Though the inhabitants had by their late treachery deserved a severe punishment, yet he granted them their lives and liberty, but stripped their arsenals of their arms, and obliged them to deliver up all their ships. From Marseilles Cæsar marched into Cisalpine Gaul, and from thence hastened to Rome where he laid the foundations of his future grandeur. He found the city in a very different state from that in which he had left it. Most of the senators and magistrates were fled to Pompey at Dyrrachium. However, there were still prætors there, and among them M. Æmilius Lepidus, who was afterwards one of the triumvirs with Octavius and Marc Antony. The prætor, to ingratiate himself with Cæsar, nominated him dictator, of his own authority and against the inclination of the senate. Cæsar accepted the new dignity, but neither abused his power as Sylla had done, nor retained it so long. During the eleven days he held the dictatorship, he governed with great moderation, and gained the affections both of the people and patricians. He recalled all the exiles, except Milo, who had murdered Clodius. He granted the rights and privileges of Roman citizens to all the Gauls beyond the Po, and, as pontifex maximus, filled up the vacancies of the sacerdotal colleges with his own friends. Though it was expected, that he would have absolutely cancelled all debts contracted since the beginning of the troubles, he only reduced the interest to one fourth. But the chief use he made of his dictatorship was to preside at the election of consuls for the next year, when he got himself and Servilius Isauricus, one of his most zealous partisans, promoted to that dignity. And now, being resolved to follow Pompey and carry the war into the east, he set out for Brundusium, whither he had ordered twelve legions to repair with all possible expedition. But on his arrival he found only five there. The rest, being afraid of the dangers of the sea and unwilling to engage in a new war, had marched leisurely, complaining of their general for allowing no respit, but hurrying them continually from one country to another. "When at "last, said they, and where will this Cæsar suffer us to "enjoy some quiet? He carries us from place to place, and "uses us as if we were not to be tired out, or had no sense "of labour. "plates, are worn out. Does not Cæsar gather from our "wounds that we are mortal men, and subject to the same "calamities and diseases as other mortals are?" Such was their dicourse as they marched from their quarters to Brundusium; and as their march was slow, they did not arrive at the time appointed. However, Cæsar did not wait for them, but set sail with only five legions and six hundred horse, in the beginning of January. When the legions found he had embarqued without them, they changed their sentiments, and, looking upon themselves as traitors to their general, blamed their officers for marching so slowly. While they were waiting at Brundusium for ships to transport them over into Epirus, Cæsar arrived safe with his five legions in Chaonia, the northern part of Epirus near the Ceraunian mountains. There he landed his troops, and sent the ships back to Brundusium to bring over the legions that were left behind. The war he was now entering upon was the most difficult he had yet undertaken. Pompey had for a whole year been assembling troops from all the eastern countries. When he left Italy he had only five legions; but, since his arrival at Dyrrachium, he had been reinforced with one from Sicily, another from Crete, and two from Syria. Three thousand archers, six cohorts of slingers, and seven thousand horse had been sent him by princes in alliance with Rome. All the free cities of Asia had reinforced his army with their best troops; nay, if we give credit to an historical poet, succours were brought him from the Indus and the Ganges to the east, and from Arabia and Æthiopia to the south; at least it is certain, that Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and all the nations from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates took up arms in his favour. He had almost all the Roman knights, that is, the flower of the young nobility, in his squadrons, and his legions consisted mostly of veterans inured to dangers and the toils of war. Pompey himself was a general of great experience and address, and had under him some of the best commanders of the republic, who had formerly conducted armies themselves. As for his navy, he had above five hundred ships of war, besides a far greater number of small vessels, which were continually cruising on the coasts, and intercepting such ships as carried arms or provisions to the enemy. He had likewise with him above two hundred senators, who formed a more numerous senate than that at Rome. Cornelius Lentulus and Claudius Marcellus, the last year's consuls, presided in it, but under the direction of Pompey their protector, who ordered them to aſſemble at Theſſalonica, where he built a ſtately hall for that purpoſe. There in one of their aſſemblies, at the motion of Cato, it was decreed, that no Roman citizen ſhould be put to death but in battle, and that no city ſubject to the republic ſhould be ſacked. At the ſame time the conſcript fathers aſſembled at Theſſalonica decreed, that they alone repreſented the Roman ſenate, and that thoſe, who reſided at Rome, where encouragers of tyranny and friends to the tyrant. And indeed, as the flower of the nobility was with Pompey, and the moſt virtuous men in the republic had taken refuge in his camp, he was generally looked upon as the only hope and ſupport of the public liberty. Hence many perſons of eminent probity, who had hitherto ſtood neuter, flocked to him from all parts. Among theſe were young Brutus, who afterwards conſpired againſt Cæſar, Tidius Sextius, and Labienus. Brutus, whoſe father had been put to death in Galatia by Pompey's orders, had never ſpoke to him, or ſo much as ſaluted him ſince that time. But, as he now looked upon him as the defender of the public liberty, he joined him, ſacrificing therein his private reſentment to the intereſt of the public. Pompey received him with great joy, and was willing to confer upon him ſome command; but he declined the offer, deſiring Pompey to beſtow ſuch marks of diſtinction on others, who better deſerved them, both in conſideration of their age and employments. Tidius Sextius, though extremely old and lame, yet left Rome, and went as far as Macedonia to join Pompey there. Labienus likewiſe forſook his old benefactor, under whom he had ſerved during the whole courſe of the Gauliſh war, and went over to his rival, though Cæſar had appointed him commander in chief of all the forces on the other ſide of the Alps (M). In ſhort, Pompey's party grew into ſuch reputation, that his cauſe was generaly called "th

Cæſar takes Oricum and Apollonia.

BUT to return to Cæſar, as ſoon as he landed, he marched to Oricum the neareſt city to him in Epirus, and made himſelf maſter of it without oppoſition, L. Torquatus, who was governor of the place for Pompey, having abandoned it at his approach. From thence he advanced to Apollonia, which ſtood on the confines of Macedon. This important place likewiſe ſurrendered, as ſoon as Cæſar appeared before it, Staberius, Pompey's governor, not being in a condition to ſtand a ſiege. By theſe two conqueſts, Cæſar opened himſelf a way to Dyrrachium, a city on the confines of Macedon, where Pompey had fixed his magazines of arms and proviſions. In the mean time, news was brought to Cæſar, that his fleet, which he had ſent back to Brunduſium, to tranſport the reſt of his toops, had been attacked by a ſquadron of Pompey's fleet under the command of Bibulus, who had taken thirty of them, and inhumanly burnt them with the ſeamen on board. This gave Cæſar great uneaſineſs, the more becauſe he was at the ſame time informed, that Bibulus, with a hundred and ten ſhips of war, had taken poſſeſſion of all the ports and harbours between Salonium and Oricum; ſo that the legion at Brunduſium could not venture to croſs the ſea, without manifeſt danger of falling into the enemy's hands.

Makes new propoſals of an accommodation.

Hereupon Cæſar, being greatly embarraſſed, made new propoſals of an accomodation, ſending Vibullius Rufus, an intimate friend of Pompey's whom he had twice taken priſoner, viz. at Corfinium and in Spain, to propoſe to him the following terms; viz. that they ſhould both diſband their armies in three days, renew their former friendſhip with ſolemn oaths, and return together to Italy. With theſe propoſals Rufus, who was in pain for Dyrrachium, haſtened to Pompey's camp travelling night and day, without allowing himſelf any reſt till he reached it. Upon his arrival he found, that Pompey had not yet received advice of Cæſar's arrival; but he no ſooner informed him of the taking of Oricum and Apollonia, than he immediately decamped, and by long marches reached Dyrrachium before Cæſar, and encamped under the walls of the city. In the mean time, Cæſar was likewiſe advancing towards Dyrrachium, in hopes of ſurpriſing that important place; but, upon the unexpected news of Pompey's arrival, he halted on the other ſide of the river Apſus, and intrenched himſelf there, having having but a ſmall number of troops with him, if compared with Pompey's formidable army. However, as Pompey durſt not croſs the river in Cæſar's ſight, the two armies continued ſome time quiet in their reſpective poſts. As to the propoſals of an amicable accommodation, Pompey, ſuſpecting Cæſar's ſincerity, anſwered, that he would not hearken to any terms, leſt it ſhould be ſaid, that he owed his life and return to Italy to Cæſar's favour. Nevertheleſs, Cæſar, either to gain time, his troops not being yet arrived, or to caſt all the blame of a civil war on his rival, ſent Vatinius to treat with Pompey in his name. Labienus was deputed to receive his propoſals. But while they were conferring together, a party of Pompey's men coming up to them, diſcharged a ſhower of darts at Vatinius and thoſe who attended him. Some of the centurions of his guard were wounded, and Vatinius himſelf narrowly eſcaped with his life [z].

As Cæſar had not a ſufficient force with him to engage the enemy, he wrote letter after letter to Marc Antony, who commanded the legions he had left in Italy, preſſing him to haſten their embarquation. But Antony, either becauſe he wanted tranſports, or was afraid of the enemy's numerous ſquadrons, which almoſt covered the ſea, ſtill continued at Brunduſium, which filled Cæſar with many uneaſy reflections. Sometimes he accuſed Antony of cowardice, and ſometimes ſuſpected him of treachery, as if he deſigned to revolt from him and make a third party in the republic. At length his impatience and uneaſineſs put him upon a bold attempt, which nothing could excuſe, but the extraordinary confidence he always had in his good fortune (N). He diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a ſlave, and with all imaginable ſecrecy went on board a fiſherman's bark, which lay in the river Anius, or, as Strabo calls it, Aous, with a deſign to go over to Brunduſium, though the enemy's fleet was cruiſing on the coaſts both of Greece and Italy. The veſſel weighed anchor in the beginning

(N) Moſt hiſtorians blame this as a raſh action; and he himſelf in his commentaries makes no mention of this, or of another as dangerous an attempt, which is related by Suetonius. While he was making war in Gaul, upon advice that the Gauls had ſurrounded his army in his abſence, he dreſſed himſelf like a native of the country, and in that diſguiſe paſſed through the enemy's centinels and troops to his own camp.

beginning of the night, and fell down the river without any difficulty. But it happened unluckily, that a ſtrong wind from the ſea ſprung up all on a ſudden, ſo that the rowers, after having ſtruggled a long time in vain with the waves and winds, which continually drove them back into the river, began to deſpair of getting out to ſea. Then Cæſar, who had hitherto never opened his mouth, ſtarting up, diſcovered himſelf to the maſter of the veſſel, who was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee him, and taking him by the hand, "Go on boldly, "my friend, ſaid he, and fear nothing; thou carrieſt Cæſar "and his fortune along with thee." The mariners, encouraged by Cæſar's preſence, uſed extraordinary efforts, and got out to ſea; but the ſtorm was ſo violent, that Cæſar himſelf, deſpairing of being able to get to Italy, ſuffered the pilot to return to the coaſt, where his ſoldiers met him, and expreſſed, with a great deal of tenderneſs and reſpect, their concern to ſee him ſo uneaſy for want of more troops, as if he could not gain a victory with them alone [a].

CÆSAR was no ſooner landed, than he diſpatched Poſthumius, one of his lieutenants, with moſt preſſing orders to Marc Antony, Gabinius, and Calenus, to bring the troops to him at all adventures. Gabinius, unwilling to expoſe all the hopes of his general to the hazards of the ſea, thought it ſafer to march a great way about by Illyricum, and therefore engaged all the legionaries he could to follow him by land. But the Illyrians, who had, unknown to him, declared for Pompey, fell unexpectedly upon him, and killed him and his men, not one eſcaping. Marc Antony and Calenus, who went by ſea, were in the greateſt danger from one of Pompey's admirals; but had the good luck to bring their troops ſafe to ſhore at Nymphæum, in the neighbourhood of Apollonia. As ſoon as it was known that Antony was landed, Pompey marched to prevent his joining Cæſar. On the other hand, Cæſar inſtantly decamped, and haſtening to the relief of his lieutenant, joined him before Pompey came up. Then Pompey, not caring to engage them when united, retired to an advantageous poſt in the neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, known by the name of Aſparagium, and there encamped. Cæſar, having thus at length got all his troops together, reſolved to finiſh the war by one general action, and determine the fate of the world, either by his own death or by that of his rival. To this end he offered Pompey battle, and kept his army a great while drawn up in ſight of the enemy. But

[a] Plut. in Cæſare.

Pompey declining an engagement, he decamped and turned towards Dyrrachium, as if he deſigned to ſurpriſe it, hoping by this means to draw Pompey into the plain. But Pompey, looking upon the taking of Dyrrachium as a chimerical project, followed Cæſar at ſome diſtance, and letting him draw near to the city, encamped himſelf on a hill called Petra, which commanded the ſea, whence he could be ſupplied with proviſions from Greece and Aſia, while Cæſar was forced to bring corn by land from Epirus, at a vaſt expence and through many dangers. This inconvenience put Cæſar upon a new deſign, which was to ſurround an army far more numerous than his own, and by ſhutting them up within a narrow tract of ground, diſtreſs them as much for want of forage, as his troops were diſtreſſed for want of corn. Purſuant to this deſign, he drew a line of circumvallation from the ſea quite round Pompey's camp, and kept him ſo cloſely blocked up, that though his men were plentifully ſupplied with proviſions by ſea, yet the horſes of his army began ſoon to die in great numbers for want of forage. Cæſar's men, though in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of corn, yet bore all with incredible chearfulneſs, proteſting, that they would rather live upon the bark of trees, than ſuffer Pompey to eſcape, now they had him in their power (O). At length Pompey, alarmed at the diſtempers which began to reign in his army, made ſeveral attempts to break through the barriers that incloſed him, but was always repulſed with loſs. One day Pompey himſelf attacked one of the enemy's caſtles; on which occaſion M. Caſſius Scæva, a ſoldier of fortune, at that time centurion, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the defence of the caſtle in a very eminent manner. He withſtood the efforts of the enemy almoſt alone, made a great ſlaughter of them, and though he was wounded on the head, had loſt an eye, and was run quite through the body, yet he maintained the fight, till Sylla, one of Cæſar's lieutenants, brought two legions from the camp to his relief, and then Pompey was forced to retire. This caſtle was defended by one cohort only

(O) Cæſar tells us, that in this extremity ſuch of the army as had been in Sardinia, found out the way of making bread of a certain root called Clæra, which they ſteeped in milk; and that when the enemy inſulted them on account of the ſtarving condition which they were in, they threw ſeveral of theſe loaves among them, to put them out of all hopes of ſubduing them by famine, "So "long as the earth produces ſuch roots, ſaid they, we will not let "Pompey eſcape."

only of the ſixth legion, which held out againſt the utmoſt efforts of Pompey at the head of four complete legions. Every ſoldier of the cohort was wounded, Pompey's men having diſcharged at them, during the attack, above thirty thouſand arrows, of which the brave Caſſius received two hundred and thirty on his ſhield. Cæſar therefore made him a preſent of two hundred thouſand ſeſterces, raiſed him to the poſt of primipilus, or firſt centurion of the legion, and allotted the whole cohort double pay and double allowance of proviſions ever after [b].

AND now Pompey, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity for want of forage, and in great danger of loſing all his forces, which for ſome time had had no other provender but leaves of trees, reſolved at all events to force the enemy's lines and eſcape. With the aſſiſtance therefore, and by the advice of two deſerters (P), he embarqued his archers, ſlingers, and light-armed infantry, and, marching himſelf by land at the head of ſixty cohorts, went to attack that part of Cæſar's lines which was next to the ſea, and not yet quite finiſhed. He ſet out from his camp in the dead of the night, and arriving at the poſt he deſigned to force by break of day, he began the attack by ſea and land at the ſame time. The ninth legion, which defended that part of the lines, made for ſome time a vigorous reſiſtance; but being attacked in the rear by Pompey's men, who came by ſea and landed between Cæſar's two lines, they fled with ſuch precipitation, that the ſuccours Marcellinus ſent them from a neighbouring poſt could not ſtop them. The enſign, who carried the Roman eagle at the head of the routed legion, was mortally wounded; but

(P) Theſe were two brothers Roſcillus and Ægus, Allobroges, and men of great diſtinction in their own country. They commanded the auxiliaries, whom they had brought to the aſſiſtance of Cæſar, but defrauded them of their pay, and uſed them with great rigour, which obliged them to carry their complaints to Cæſar, who thereupon privately reprimanded them. The two chiefs, offended at this diſgrace, took what money and horſes they could with them, and deſerted to Pompey. As they had narrowly obſerved all Cæſar's circumvallation, and knew the weak parts of it, they directed Pompey in this enterprize, and proved very ſerviceable to him (29)

but nevertheleſs, before he died, had preſence of mind enough to conſign the eagle to the cavalry of his party, deſiring them to deliver it to Cæſar. Pompey's men purſued the fugitives, and made ſuch a ſlaughter of them, that all the centurions of the firſt cohort were cut off except one. And now Pompey's army broke in upon the poſts Cæſar had fortified, like a torrent, and were advancing to attack Marcellinus, who guarded a neighbouring fort; but Marc Antony coming very ſeaſonably to his relief with twelve cohorts, they thought it adviſeable to retire. Soon after Cæſar himſelf arrived with a ſtrong reinforcement, and poſted himſelf on the ſhore in order to prevent ſuch-like attempts for the future. From this poſt he obſerved an old camp, which he had made within the place where Pompey was encloſed, but afterwards abandoned. Upon his quitting it Pompey had taken poſſeſſion of it, and left a legion to guard it. This poſt Cæſar reſolved to reduce, hoping to repair the loſs he had ſuſtained on this unfortunate day, by taking the legion which Pompey had poſted there. Accordingly, he advanced ſecretly at the head of thirty-three cohorts in two lines, and arriving at the old camp, before Pompey could have notice of his march, attacked it with great vigour, forced the firſt intrenchment, notwithſtanding the brave reſiſtance of Titus Pulcio, and penetrated to the ſecond, whither the legion had retired. But here his fortune changed on a ſudden. His right wing, in looking for an entrance into the camp, marched along the outſide of a trench, which Cæſar had formerly carried on from the left angle of his camp about four hundred paces to a neighbouring river. This trench they miſtook for the rampart of the camp, and being led away, by that miſtake from their left wing, they were ſoon after prevented from rejoining it by the arrival of Pompey, who came up at the head of a legion and a large body of horſe. Then the legion, which Cæſar had attacked, taking courage, made a brisk ſally, drove his men back to the firſt intrenchment, which they had ſeized, and there put them in great diſorder, while they were attempting to paſs the ditch. Pompey, in the mean time falling upon them with his cavalry in flank, completed their defeat; and then flying to the enemy's right wing, which had paſſed the trench mentioned above, and was ſhut up between that and the ramparts of the old camp, made a moſt dreadful ſlaughter of them. The trench was filled with dead bodies, many falling into it in that diſorder, and others paſſing over them and preſſing them to death. In this diſtreſs Cæſar did all he could to ſtop the flight of his legionaries, but to no purpoſe; the

the ſtandard-bearers themſelves threw down the Roman eagles, when Cæſar endeavoured to ſtop them, and left them in the hands of the enemy, who on this occaſion took thirty-two ſtandards; a diſgrace which Cæſar had never ſuffered before. He was himſelf in no ſmall danger of falling by the hand of one of his own men, whom he took hold of when flying, bidding him ſtand and face about: but the man, apprehenſive of the danger he was in, drew his ſword and would have killed him, had not one of his guards prevented the blow by cutting off his arm. Cæſar loſt on this occaſion nine hundred and ſixty of his foot, four hundred of his horſe, five tribunes, and thirty-two centurions. Had Pompey attacked Cæſar's camp, during this panic, he might have eaſily made himſelf maſter of it, and put an end to the war at one blow. But, being afraid of ſome ambuſcade, he purſued the enemy to the gates of their camp, and then marched back without making any further attempts; which made Cæſar ſay, that "he had been loſt without redreſs, had Pompey known how "to make uſe of his victory. This loſs and diſgrace greatly mortified Cæſar, but did not diſcourage him. After he had by his lenity and eloquent ſpeeches, ſuited to his preſent circumſtances, recovered the ſpirits of his troops, he decamped and retired in good order to Apollonia, where he paid his troops, and left his ſick and wounded. From thence he marched into Macedon, where Scipio Metellus, Pompey's father-in-law, was encamped. He hoped either to draw his rival into ſome plain, or to overpower Scipio, if not aſſiſted. He met with great difficulties on his march, the countries through which he paſſed refuſing to ſupply his army with proviſions; to ſuch a degree was his reputation ſunk ſince his laſt defeat. On his entering Theſſaly he was met by Domitius, one of his lieutenants, whom he had ſent with three legions to reduce Epirus. Having now got all his forces together, he marched directly to Gomphi, the firſt town of Theſſaly, which had been formerly in his intereſt, but now declared againſt him. Whereupon he attacked it with ſo much vigour, that, though the garriſon was very numerous and the walls of an uncommon height, he made himſelf maſter of it in a few hours. From thence he marched to Metropolis, another conſiderable town of Theſſaly, which immediately ſurrendered; as did all the other cities of the country, except Lariſſa, of which Scipio had made himſelf maſter.

Pompey purſues him.

On the other hand, Pompey, being continually importuned by the ſenators and officers of his army, left his camp at Dyrrachium, and followed Cæſar, firmly reſolved not to give him battle, but rather to diſtreſs him by keeping cloſe at his heels, ſtreightening his quarters, and cutting off his convoys. As he had frequently opportunities of coming to an engagement, but always declined it, his friends and ſubalterns began to put ill conſtructions on his dilatorineſs, to his face. Some reproached him with ſpinning out the war, in order to continue his authority over the Roman ſenate and the foreign kings under his command. Domitius Ahenobarbus was continually calling him, in deriſion, Agamemnon, and king of kings, inſinuating thereby, that he had no mind to lay down his ſovereign authority, but was pleaſed to ſee ſo many kings and great commanders pay their attendance at his tent. Favonius, who affected Cato's free way of ſpeaking, complained in a ſcoffing manner, that by reaſon of Pompey's ambition they ſhould eat no figs that year at Tuſculum. Theſe reflections, together with the complaints of his ſoldiers, made him at length reſolve to venture a general action. With this deſign he marched into a large plain near the cities of Pharſalia and Thebes, which latter was alſo called Philippi, from Philip, king of Macedon and the father of Perſes, who, having reduced the Thebans, placed a colony of Macedonians in their city. This plain was watered by the Enipeus, and ſurrounded on all ſides by high mountains; and Pompey, who was ſtill averſe from venturing an engagement, pitched his camp on the declivity of a ſteep mountain, in a place altogether inacceſſible. There he was joined by Scipio, his father-in-law, at the head of the legions which he had brought with him from Syria and Cilicia. But, notwithſtanding this reinforcement, he was ſtill irreſolute, and unwilling to put all to the iſſue of a ſingle action, being ſtill convinced of the wiſdom of his maxim, that it was better to deſtroy the enemy by fatigues and want, than to engage an army of brave veterans, who were, in a manner, reduced to deſpair. As he put off from day to day, under various pretences, deſcending into the plain, where Cæſar was encamped, his officers forced him to call a council of war, when all to a man were for venturing a general action the very next day. Thus was Pompey obliged to ſacrifice his own judgment to the blind ardor of the multitude; and the neceſſary meaſures were taken for a general engagement. Plutarch and Cæſar tell us, that Pompey's officers were ſo confident of victory, that Domitius Spinther and Scipio quarrelled as if they had already conquered, five thouſand foot, ſeven thouſand horſe well mounted and armed, and a great number of dart-men and ſlingers; whereas Cæſar had at moſt twenty-two thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe [c].

When the day came, on which the fate of the world was to be decided, Pompey, having aſſembled his troops, made them the following ſpeech, which is recorded by ſeveral writers. "As I have been induced by your ardor to venture a battle, contrary to my own judgment, let me ſee you behave in it with bravery. As you ſurpaſs the enemy in numbers, ſtrive to do ſo in courage and reſolution. Look back with pleaſure on the glorious battle of Dyrrachium; maintain the glory you there acquired, and ſuffer not the beſt cauſe to ſink under the deſperate attempts of one, whoſe main aim is to deprive you of your liberty, and change the republic into a monarchy. Remember, that Pompey leads you, that the authority of the ſenate ſupports you, and the gods protect you." Having thus ſpoke, he cauſed the gates of the camp to be opened, and marched out at the head of his army. Cæſar was ſo far from expecting to engage that day, that he had already given the ſignal for decamping, with a deſign to march towards Scotuſa, his army being reduced to great ſtreights for want of forage and proviſions.

proviſions. But while his ſoldiers were buſy in taking down their tents and ſending away their cattle, ſervants, and baggage before them, word was brought him by his ſcouts, that they had ſeen arms carried to and fro in the enemy's camp, and that they had heard a noiſe and buſtle as of men preparing for battle. Not long after other ſcouts came in with further intelligence, that the enemy were marching out of their intrenchments, and that the firſt ranks were already drawn up in the plain. Cæſar, tranſported with joy at this news, told his men, "that the ſo much wiſhed-for day was come at "laſt, when they ſhould fight with men, not with hunger and "famine." Then he ordered the red ſtandard, the uſual ſignal of battle among the Romans, to be ſet up before his tent; which was no ſooner obſerved by the ſoldiers, than they left their tents, and with loud ſhouts of joy repaired to their arms. The officers drew up their reſpective corps, every man falling into his proper rank, without any trouble or noiſe. When he had drawn up his men, he ordered three legions to level the ramparts, and fill up the ditches of his camp, telling them with great confidence, that they ſhould lodge that night in Pompey's camp. This he ſaid not from a dependence on the vain aſſurances of the augurs and the preſages of victory, which were brought him from all parts (Q); but on his own addreſs and the experienced valour of his veterans. After he had levelled his trenches, he harangued his troops according to cuſtom, but with ſuch an air of confidence and ſatisfaction, as was ſufficient to have inſpired cowards with courage. "Fellow ſoldiers, ſaid he, the worſt "part of our labour is now paſt. To-day we are not to "fight with hunger and want, but with men; nay, with "thoſe

Pompey prepares for battle.

(Q) He had three days before purified his army by a ſacrifice, according to cuſtom, when the augur, upon the death of the firſt victim, told him, that within three days he ſhould come to a deciſive action. Cæſar asked him, whether he ſaw any thing in the entrails, which promiſed an happy event? "That, anſwered the "augur, you can beſt tell yourſelf; for the gods promiſe a great "alteration from the preſent poſture of affairs; if therefore you "think yourſelf happy now, expect worſe fortune; if unhappy, "hope for better." The night before the battle, as he went the rounds about midnight, he ſaw a light in the heaven very bright and flaming, which ſeemed to paſs over his camp and fall into Pompey's; and when Cæſar's men came to relieve the guard in the morning, they perceived a panic among the enemy (30).

(30) Plut. in Pomp. & Cæſare.

" thoſe very men who left Italy, becauſe they could not ſtand " before us, and who would deprive us of the honours that " are due to us for a long courſe of victories. If therefore " you have any grateful ſenſe of my benevolence and bounty, " let it now exert itſelf; and remember your promiſes at " Dyrrachium. You there vowed, that you would conquer " or die; and it is no difficult matter for veterans to conquer " raw ſoldiers, eſpecially when they fight under a general, " who, I know, is driven to a battle contrary to his own " judgment. This I ſay of the Italians only; as for the A- " ſiatics, give yourſelves no concern about them; their own " fears will diſperſe them. Exert therefore all your valour " againſt the Roman legions and Italian cohorts. I have " levelled your trenches, that you may have no reſourſe but " in victory, and that the enemy may ſee, we are determined " to lodge in their camp by our deſtroying our own." This ſaid, he marched into the plain, and obſerving the diſpoſition of the enemy, as he drew near them, regulated his own by it. (R) Pompey was on the left wing, with the two legions which Cæſar had returned to him at the beginning of the war. Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, was in the centre, with the legions he had brought from Syria, and the reinforcements ſent by ſeveral kings and ſtates of Aſia. The Cicilian legion and ſome cohorts, which had ſerved in Spain, were in the right under the command of Afranius (S). As Pompey's right wing was covered by the Enipeus, he ſtrengthened the left with his ſlingers, archers, and the ſeven thouſand Roman horſe, on whom chiefly his party founded their hopes of victory. The whole army was drawn up in three lines with very little ſpaces between them. In conformity to this diſpoſition, Cæſar's army was drawn up in the following order: The tenth legion, which had on all occaſions ſignalized themſelves above all the reſt, was placed in the right wing, and the ninth in the left; but as the latter had been conſiderably weakened in the action at Dyrrachium, the eighth legion was poſted ſo near it, as to be able to ſupport and reinforce it upon occaſion.

The diſpoſition of the two armies

(R) Cæſar and Appian agree, that Pompey poſted himſelf in his left wing; but Plutarch places him in the right.

occaſion. The reſt of Cæſar's forces filled up the ſpace between the two wings. Marc Antony commanded the left wing, Sylla the right, and Cneius Domitius Calvinus the main body. As for Cæſar, he poſted himſelf on the right over-againſt Pompey, that he might have him always in ſight. His army was likewiſe drawn up in three lines, but with larger ſpaces between the corps. Pompey, as we have hinted above, placed his whole body of horſe in his left wing, in order to diſtreſs and cut of the tenth legion, at the head of which Cæſar always fought in perſon. Hereupon Cæſar, who had only a thouſand horſe to oppoſe the enemy's ſeven thouſand, ſupplied that defect with a body of choice infantry, which he picked out of the legionaries of the third line, and formed into ſix cohorts. Theſe he placed behind the tenth legion, commanding them to advance to the front as ſoon as the enemy's cavalry ſhould charge, and together with the legionaries ſuſtain the firſt onſet of the cavalry. He likewiſe commanded them not to diſcharge their javelins at a diſtance, but firſt to cloſe with the enemy, and then aim only at the faces of the horſemen, who were for the moſt part young patricians, and therefore, as he rightly imagined, would be more ſolicitous about preſerving their beauty than gaining a victory. Thus was the whole plain covered from Pharſalia to the Enipeus with two armies, dreſſed and armed after the ſame manner, and bearing the ſame enſigns, the Roman eagles. Pompey obſerving how well the enemy kept their ranks, expecting quietly the ſignal of battle; and on the contrary how impatient and unſteady his own men were, running up and down in great diſorder for want of experience, began to be afraid, leſt his ranks ſhould be broke upon the firſt onſet; and therefore commanded the foot in the front to keep their ground, and quietly wait for the enemy (T). The two armies, though within

(T) Cæſar in his third book of the civil war blames this conduct. We ſhall give the reader a tranſlation of the whole paſſage from his own words; for every thing ſpoken by ſuch a man as Cæſar ought to be kept entire: "There was juſt as much ſpace between "the two armies, ſays he, as was ſufficient for both to meet and "charge. But Pompey had ordered his men to receive the "enemy's onſet without ſtirring, and keep their poſts, till Cæſar's "army by charging firſt ſhould be diſordered. This he is ſaid to "have done by the advice of Triarius, to the end, that the firſt "force and impetuoſity of thoſe troops might abate and be weak-"ened, and their ranks thinned; and that then thoſe, who had "remained firm in their poſts, might attack them with better "ſucceſs within reach of each other, kept for ſome time a mournful ſilence, which might poſſibly proceed from the melancholy reflections of both parties. For what could be more affecting, than to conſider, that the ſon had taken arms againſt the father, brother againſt brother, citizen againſt citizen, and friend againſt friend? At length the trumpets ſounded the charge, and Cæſar's army advanced in good order to begin the attack, being encouraged by the example of one Caius Craſtinus, a centurion, who at the head of an hundred and twenty men, threw himſelf upon the enemy's firſt line with incredible fury. This he did to acquit himſelf of a promiſe he had ſolemnly made to Cæſar, who, meeting him as he was going out of his tent in the morning, aſked him after ſome diſcourſe, What his opinion was touching the event of the battle? To which, he, ſtretching out his hand, replied aloud, "Thine is the victory, Cæſar; thou ſhalt conquer glorioufly, "and I myſelf this day will be the ſubject of thy praiſe, either "dead or alive." In purſuance of this promiſe he broke out of his rank, as ſoon as the trumpet ſounded, and at the head of his company ran in upon the enemy, and made a great ſlaughter of them. But while he was ſtill preſſing forward, forcing his way through the firſt line, one of Pompey's men ran him in at the mouth with ſuch violence, that the point of the ſword came out at the hind part of his neck. Upon his death Pompey's ſoldiers took courage, and with great bravery ſtood the enemy's onſet. While the foot was thus ſharply engaged

"ſucceſs, when they were thus broken and diſperſed. Beſides, "he was in hopes that their javelins would do leſs execution, if "they received them in their poſts, than if they advanced to meet "them, and that Cæſar's ſoldiers, running the whole void or "ſpace, inſtead of meeting them in the middle of it, would come "up out of breath and wearied. But, in my opinion, this was "founded upon no manner of reaſon, becauſe there is a natural "vehemence and alacrity implanted in every man, which is kin-"dled in the mind by an eagerneſs and impatience to begin the "onſet, which ſhould not be checked, but rather encouraged, by "the general. Our anceſtors therefore wiſely ordained, that "trumpets ſhould ſound on every ſide, and all the ſoldiers raiſe a "ſhout, conceiving that thoſe were the moſt proper means to "animate and encourage their own troops, and daunt the enemy "(31)." engaged in the centre, Pompey's horſe in the left wing marched up confidently, and, having firſt widened their ranks with a deſign to ſurround Cæſar's right wing, charged his cavalry, and forced them to give ground (U). Hereupon Cæſar ordered his horſe to retreat a little, and give way to the ſix cohorts, which he had poſted in the rear as a body of reſerve. Theſe, upon a ſignal given coming up, charged the enemy's horſe with that reſolution and good order, which is peculiar to men who have ſpent all their lives in camps. They remembered their inſtructions, not ſtriking at the legs or thighs of the enemy, but aiming only at their faces. This unexpected and new manner of fighting had the deſired effect. For the young patricians, whom Cæſar contemptuouſly calls the pretty young dancers, not being able to bear the thoughts of having their faces deformed with ſcars, turned their backs, and, covering their faces with their hands, fled in the utmoſt confuſion, leaving the foot at the mercy of the enemy. Cæſar's men did not purſue the fugitives, but charging the foot of that wing now naked and unguarded, ſurrounded them, and cut moſt of them in pieces. Pompey was ſo tranſported with rage in ſeeing the flower of his forces thus put to flight, or cut in pieces, that he left his army, and retired ſlowly towards his camp, looking more like a man diſtracted and beſide himſelf, than one who by his exploits had acquired the ſurname of The Great (W). When he had reached the camp, he retired to his tent, without ſpeaking a word to any, and continued there, like one whom the gods had deprived of his ſenſes, till his whole army was defeated. Cæſar no ſooner ſaw himſelf maſter of the field, than he marched to attack the Pompey retires to his camp, and his army is defeated.

(U) Cæſar himſelf owns, that his cavalry gave way and were in danger of being cut in pieces, when the ſix cohorts advanced to ſupport them. Plutarch therefore muſt be miſtaken, when he ſays, that theſe cohorts attacked Pompey's cavalry before they had time to charge that of Cæſar. The memoirs he followed in his account of this battle ſeem not to have been the moſt exact.

(W) Plutarch applies to Pompey, as he is retiring before Cæſar, a paſſage in the eleventh Iliad, where Homer ſpeaks in a lofty manner of the flight of Ajax before Hector.

" But partial Jove eſpouſing Hector's part,
" Shot heav'n-bred horror through the Grecian's heart;
" Confus'd, unnerv'd in Hector's preſence grown,
" Amaz'd he ſtood, with terrors not his own.
" O'er his broad back his moony ſhield he threw,
" And glaring round with tardy ſteps withdrew." Pope.

he enemy's intrenchments, that Pompey might not have time o recollect himself. When Pompey was informed that his ival was advancing to attack his intrenchments, he then first eemed to have recovered his senses, and cried out, "What! nto my camp too?" He said no more; but immediately laying side the marks of his dignity, and putting on such a garment as night best favour his flight, he stole out at the decuman gate, nd took the road to Lariſſa, which city had hitherto shewn great attachment to him. In the mean time, Cæsar began the ttack on the enemy's camp, which was vigorously defended by he cohorts Pompey had left to guard it; but they were at length orced to yield (X). Cæsar was not a little surprised, when, after having forced the intrenchments, he found the enemy's ents and pavilions richly adorned with carpets and hangings, heir couches strewed with flowers, their tables ready spread, and side-boards set out with abundance of plate, bowls, and glasses, and some of them even filled with wine. So great was the confidence of Pompey's party, that they made preparations before-hand for pleasures to be enjoyed after the victory, which they thought certain. In Pompey's tent Cæsar found the box in which he kept his letters; but, with a moderation and magnanimity worthy of himself, he burnt them all without reading one, saying, that he had rather be ignorant of crimes, than obliged to punish them [d].

(X) Cæsar tells us, that the cohorts appointed to defend the camp made a vigorous resistance; but being at length overpowered, fled to a neighbouring mountain, where he resolved to invest them. But before he had finished his lines, want of water obliged them to abandon that post, and retire towards Lariſſa. Cæsar pursued the fugitives at the head of the fourth legion, and after six miles march came up with them. But they, not caring to engage a victorious legion led on by Cæsar, fled for refuge to a high hill, the foot of which was watered by a little river. Though Cæsar's men were quite spent, and ready to faint with the excessive heat and fatigue of the whole day, yet by his obliging manner he prevailed upon them to cut off the conveniency of the water from the enemy by a trench. This obliged the unfortunate fugitives to come to a capitulation, throw down their arms, and implore the clemency of the conqueror. This they all did, except some senators, who, as it was now night, escaped in the dark. Cæsar received those who surrendered with all the clemency and kindness imaginable, forbidding his soldiers to offer them the least insult, or even to plunder their baggage.

THE next day, when the dead were numbered, it appeared that Cæſar had ſcarce loſt two hundred men, among whom were about thirty centurions, whom Cæſar cauſed to be buried with great ſolemnity. He did particular honours to the body of Craſtinus, who had begun the battle, and ordered his aſhes to be depoſited in a tomb, which he erected to his memory. On Pompey's ſide the number of the dead amounted to fifteen thouſand according to ſome, and to twenty-five thouſand according to others (Y). Aſinius Pollio, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us, that Cæſar when he ſaw the field of battle covered with many dead bodies, cried out with a deep ſigh; "This they would have; they "brought me, by their obſtinacy, to the ſad neceſſity of "conquering them to ſecure myſelf." Among the dead were found the bodies of ten ſenators and forty knights. One of the ſenators was Domitius Ahenobarbus, who fled from the camp when Cæſar attacked it; but being exhauſted with fatigue, a body of horſe came up with him, and left him dead on the plain of Pharſalia. Cæſar took twenty-four thouſand priſoners, eight eagles, and a hundred and eighty enſigns. All the Roman citizens were immediately by his orders ſet at liberty; and it muſt be owned, that no conqueror ever took more pleaſure than Cæſar in acts of clemency. Some writers aſcribe his moderation to policy; but it is manifeſt from his whole conduct before, as well as after, the battle of Pharſalia, that he was endowed with a great fund of good-nature and humanity. He had always ſhewn a particular affection for young Marcus Brutus, whom he believed to be his ſon (Z); and therefore, as he had ſided with Pompey and fought under his banners, he was under the utmoſt concern in not ſeeing him appear after the battle; nor was his pleaſure leſs when he ſaw him ſafe, ſurrendering himſelf to him, and imploring his clemency. He received him with inexpreſſible joy and marks of the moſt tender and ſincere friendſhip, not ſuſpecting then, that he would one day become an accomplice of his death.

His clemency and moderation.

CÆSAR

(Y) Appian quotes ſome writers, who made Cæſar's loſs amount to twelve hundred legionaries. Aſinius Pollio, who was preſent in this action and fought in Cæſar's army, reduces the number of the ſlain on Pompey's ſide to ſix thouſand men. But he is contradicted by all the antients.

(Z) Cæſar was paſſionately in love with Servilia the mother of Brutus, who gave herſelf up entirely to him; whence Cæſar, as Plutarch obſerves, had reaſon to believe that Brutus was his ſon.

Cæsar resolves to pursue Pompey

CÆSAR, though victorious, could not think the work complete so long as his rival lived. His fleets were still masters of the sea. Lælius, who commanded one of them had lately besieged Vatinius, Cæsar's lieutenant, in Brundusium, and Caius Cassius had burnt above forty of his galleys in the streights of Messana. Besides, the remains of his troops might unite again, and, by the help of new levies and auxiliaries from foreign kings, make as formidable an army as the former; since Egypt, Africa, Numidia, Pontus, Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Galatia, seemed to have espoused his cause with great zeal. Cato, whom Pompey had left at Dyrrachium with fifteen cohorts and three hundred galleys, might follow him, and renew the war in some other country. So that Pompey's party, though weakened, was not entirely destroyed. Cæsar therefore, in order to complete the work, either by the death or captivity of his competitor, resolved to set all other things aside, and pursue Pompey into what part soever of the world he should retire. Pursuant to this resolution, after he had stayed two days at Pharsalia, to return thanks to the gods for the victory he had gained, and to refresh his soldiers, he set out on the third with his cavalry, advancing every day as far as he possibly could, while one legion followed him by more easy marches [e].

Pompey's flight and adventures.

As for Pompey, he took the rout, as we have hinted above, to Larissa. When he had got a little way from the camp, he dismounted, and finding the enemy did not pursue him, walked on leisurely with his small retinue, wholly taken up with such thoughts as were natural to a person of his condition and circumstances. He had been for the space of thirty-four years together accustomed to conquest and victory, and was then at last in his old age beginning to know the calamities of war in slaughter and flight. He considered, with the greatest concern imaginable, that he had lost in one hour all the glory and power, which he had been gaining for so many years in innumerable battles; and that he, who a little before was guarded by a mighty army and attended by kings, was now flying in so mean a condition, and with so small a retinue, that his very enemies could not know him. Thus he came to Larissa, but would not enter the city, notwithstanding the pressing invitations of the inhabitants, lest their kindness to him should provoke Cæsar and bring them into trouble; nay, he exhorted them to submit to the conqueror, and have timely recourse to his clemency.

From Lariſſa he purſued his rout with L. Lentulus, the laſt year's conſul, P. Lentulus, and the ſenator Favonius, and in the evening reached the vale of Tempe in Theſſaly, greatly fatigued and deſtitute of all neceſſaries of life. There, as he was very thirſty, he kneeled down, and drank out of a river, which watered that fruitful plain. Then riſing up, he croſſed the valley, and, coming to the ſea-ſide, betook himſelf to a poor fiſherman's cottage, where he paſſed the remainder of the night. How dreadful this night muſt have been, not ſo much on account of the inconveniencies of the place, as of his own tormenting reflections, we leave the reader to judge. The next morning by break of day, he went into a ſmall boat on the river Peneus, and, taking his freemen along with him, diſmiſſed his ſlaves, adviſing them to go boldly to Cæſar, and not be afraid. As he was going in the boat along the ſhore, he happened to ſpy a great ſhip of burden, riding at anchor and juſt ready to ſet ſail. The maſter of the ſhip, by name Peticius, a Roman citizen (A), knowing Pompey, took him into his ſhip, together with the two Lentuli, Favonius, and ſuch of his attendants as he thought fit. Soon after they had got aboard, they diſcovered Deiotarus, tetrarch of Galatia, who had ſerved under Pompey and made his eſcape after the battle, flying full ſpeed towards the ſhore. At the requeſt of Pompey, Peticius ſtayed and took him in likewiſe. Cicero tells us, that this prince had joined Pompey before the battle, depending on the flight of birds, which he thought, promiſed his arms good ſucceſs. As the illuſtrious Roman had diſmiſſed his attendants, Favonius performed the meaneſt offices about him, not ſcruppling to wait upon him at table and help to undreſs him. The ſhip

(A) Plutarch tells us, that Peticius had dreamt the night before, that he ſaw Pompey in a deſpicable condition, and that, while he was telling his dream to the paſſengers, one of the mariners acquainted him, that he ſaw a little boat putting off from the ſhore, and that the perſons in it held out their hands, as if they deſired to be taken into his veſſel. Hereupon Peticius ſtanding up, obſerved a man in the ſame dreſs, in which Pompey had appeared to him in his dream; and not doubting but it was he, he expreſſed with tears his concern for him; and ordering the mariners to let down the ſhip's boat, he called him by his name, as he drew near, and took him in with all his attendants, ready to convey him to what part of the world he pleaſed (32).

ſhip purſued her courſe, touched at Amphipolis, on the confines of Thrace and Macedon, where Pompey took ſome money of his friends for his neceſſary expences, and in a few days made one of the ports of the iſland of Leſbos, with a deſign to take in Cornelia, Pompey's wife, and his ſon Sextus, whom in the beginning of the war he had ſent to Mitylene, the capital of the iſland. He no ſooner arrived in the port, than he ſent a meſſenger into the city, not caring to come himſelf aſhore, with news very different from what Cornelia expected. For ſhe, having heard no news from her huſband ſince his ſucceſs near Dyrrhacium, believed that the war was near ended, and that there was nothing more remaining for Pompey, than to purſue Cæſar and diſperſe the few troops he had ſtill with him. The meſſenger, finding her ſtill in this perſuaſion, informed her of the misfortune of her huſband with his tears, before he could deliver her any meſſage; and the unfortunate Cornelia no ſooner heard of his defeat and forlorn condition, than ſhe fell down in a ſwoon, and continued a long time ſenſeleſs. When ſhe came to herſelf, ſhe ſtarted up and haſtened to the ſea-ſide, where the ſight of Pompey renewed her grief. She fainted away a ſecond time in his arms, and, as ſoon as ſhe recovered her ſpeech, ſhe vented her paſſion in the following words; "It "is the effect of my cruel deſtiny, not of yours, that I ſee "you thus dejected and reduced to one poor veſſel, who, "before your marriage with the unfortunate Cornelia, were "attended by a fleet of five hundred ſail. Why therefore "ſhould you come to ſee me, or why rather ſhould you "not have left her to a ſeverer fate, who has been the cauſe "of all your misfortune? How happy a woman had I been, "if I had breathed out my laſt, before I received the fatal "news from Parthia of the death of Craſſus? Or how "prudent, if I had followed his deſtiny as I deſigned? But "I was reſerved for a greater miſchief, for the ruin of Pom-"pey the Great." Pompey is ſaid to have anſwered her thus: "Dear Cornelia, you have been hitherto accuſtomed "only to the ſmiles of fortune, which perhaps has deceived "you in this, that ſhe has been conſtant to me beyond her "cuſtom; but it behoves us, who are mortals, to bear with "theſe afflictions, and try our fortune once again: neither "ought we to deſpond; for it is as poſſible for us to "retrieve our former happineſs, as it was to fall from "it into our preſent calamity." All the Mitylenians, who ran to the port to pay their homage to their old protector, were witneſſes of this interview, and, being touched with compaſſion, invited Pompey into their city. But he returning them thanks for their kind invitation, anſwered, that he would by no means enter their gates, leſt he ſhould draw upon them the reſentment of the conqueror, to whom he adviſed them to ſubmit, ſince he was a man of great goodneſs and clemency. Then turning to Cratippus the philoſopher, who then lived at Mitylene and came among the reſt to pay his reſpects to his old friend, he began to repine and argue with him, touching the diſpenſations of providence. But Cratippus modeſtly declined the diſpute for fear of heightening his ſorrow, and only encouraged him to bear with conſtancy his preſent misfortunes. Plutarch obſerves here, that the philoſopher might have eaſily anſwered his objections, by ſhewing, it was neceſſary, on account of the diſorders which reigned in the republic, that the government ſhould be lodged in the hands of a ſingle perſon, and by aſking him, what grounds men had to believe that he, if conqueror, would have uſed his good fortune better than Cæſar. But the diſpenſations of providence, adds Plutarch, are in the hands of the Supreme Being, and there we muſt leave them [f].

He arrives at Attalia.

POMPEY, having taken his wife and friends aboard, ſailed from Mitylene, ſteering his courſe towards Cilicia. The firſt place he touched at was Attalia, a city of Pamphylia, where he found ſixty ſenators of his party, ſeven or eight ſhips of his fleet, and ſome bands of ſoldiers. Here he was informed, that Cato had rallied a conſiderable body of troops, and was paſſed with them over into Africa. From Pamphylia he ſailed with his ſmall fleet for the iſland of Cyprus, where he received advice, that the Rhodians had refuſed to admit into their ports one of the Lentuli and his attendants, and that Antioch, the capital of Syria, had, at the inſtigation of the Roman citizens who traded there, declared for Cæſar. Hereupon being at a loſs whither he ſhould ſteer his courſe next, he ſummoned a council of the few faithful friends who followed him, to conſider with them what place would yield him the ſafeſt refuge and retreat, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs. Some adviſed him to paſs over into Africa, and there join Juba king of Mauritania, who had eſpouſed his cauſe and exerted himſelf in it with great zeal. Pompey himſelf was for retiring into Parthia, as the only country that was fit to protect him in his preſent diſtreſs, and ſupply him with a ſufficient force to make head againſt his competitor.

He deſigns to retire into Parthia.

petitor. But this was looked upon by all his friends as the project of a man overwhelmed with grief and reduced to deſpair: they repreſented to him, that the Parthians were the moſt inveterate enemies of the Roman name; that they had hitherto ſtood neuter, and declared, that they would not eſpouſe either party; that they were overjoyed to ſee the republic weakening herſelf by her own forces, and laſtly, that it was dangerous to expoſe the young and beautiful Cornelia to the brutalities of a diſſolute court. This laſt motive, which was of more weight with him than all the reſt, induced him to drop the deſign of ſeeking protection among the enemies of Rome, though he was much perplexed where to find a ſafe retreat among her friends and allies. Among thoſe who attended the the illuſtrious Roman in his flight was Theophanes, a native of Mitylene, who, as he was famous for the extent of his knowledge, had a great influence over Pompey; and this he made uſe of on the preſent occaſion, perſuading him to retire to Egypt, which was but a voyage of three days ſailing, where he had reaſon to expect from young Ptolemy, his pupil, all poſſible aſſiſtance, ſince he had lately reſtored his father to his kingdom, which favour the young prince had gratefully acknowledged, by ſending him a fleet to be employed againſt Cæſar. As ſoon as the advice of Theophanes prevailed, Pompey and Cornelia with their attendants weighed anchor, and, leaving Cyprus, ſteered towards Egypt, ſome in gallies, others in ſhips of burden [g].

Theophanes perſuades him to fly into Egypt.

In the mean time, Cæſar wholly intent on purſuing his rival, arrived at the Helleſpont, which he ventured to croſs with a ſmall number of galleys, but was met in his paſſage by Pompey's fleet under the command of Caius Caſſius. Cæſar did not avoid him, though the fleet he commanded conſiſted, according to Appian, of ſeventy ſhips; but boldly making towards him, ſummoned him to ſurrender. Caſſius was ſo ſtruck with the boldneſs of Cæſar, and ſurpriſed at his intrepidity and good fortune, that he readily obeyed the ſummons, and joined Cæſar with his numerous fleet [h]. Cicero ſeems to inſinuate [i], that Caſſius did not join Cæſar, till after the war of Alexandria, when the conqueror was ſailing from Egypt to Pontus, to make war upon Pharnaces who had declared for Pompey. tify Theopompus, who had made a collection of fables, enfranchiſed the Cnidians his country-men, and remitted one third of the taxes of all the Aſiatics. He likewiſe received under his protection the Ionians, Æolians, and other nations of Aſia Minor, who came to ſubmit to him and implore his protection. As he could have no certain account of the rout Pompey had taken, he reſolved to make what haſte he could to Egypt, fearing his rival ſhould get poſſeſſion of that rich and wealthy kingdom, rally his forces there, and, with the aſſiſtance of young Ptolemy, a prince highly obliged to him, renew the war. With this deſign he ſailed for Rhodes, ſtayed there till he was joined by two legions from the continent, and then ſet ſail for Egypt, without communicating his reſolution to any but M. Brutus, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence [k].

Pompey arrives on the coaſt of Egypt.

But Pompey arrived in Egypt before Cæſar; and being informed, that Ptolemy was at war with his ſiſter and encamped in the neighbourhood of Peluſium, he ſteered his courſe that way, and ſent a meſſenger before to acquaint the king with his arrival, and implore his protection. The king himſelf, who was very young, returned no anſwer to the meſſenger; but Photinus, Achillas, and Theodotus, who were the young prince's chief counſellors and had the greateſt influence over him, conſulted among themſelves about the reception of Pompey. Photinus was the chief miniſter of ſtate, Achillas the general of the armies, and Theodotus a mercenary teacher of rhetoric, but one who was in great eſteem with the king, as being his preceptor. While theſe three were conſulting, Pompey, riding at anchor at a great diſtance from the ſhore, was forced to wait the reſult of their deliberations; that Pompey, as Plutarch obſerves, who thought it beneath him to owe his ſafety to Cæſar, a Roman and his father-in-law, ſtooped ſo low as to lie at the diſcretion of three unworthy favourites. Photinus and Achillas were for receiving Pompey, thinking it would be a reproach to the Egyptian nation to abandon one in his diſtreſs, who had been guardian, friend, and zealous benefactor to their king; but Theodotus undertook to prove, that it was equally dangerous in that juncture of affairs to admit and refuſe him admittance.

The Egyptians conſult about the receiving of Pompey.

The advice of Theodotus.

"If we receive him, ſaid he, we ſhall make Cæſar our "enemy, and Pompey our maſter: if we diſmiſs him, we "ſhall render ourſelves obnoxious to Pompey for that in-"hoſpitable expulſion, and to Cæſar for letting him eſcape." He concluded, "that the ſafeſt expedient was to ſend for "him

[k] Plut. in Bruto. Appian, p. 483. Cæſ. ibid.

" him and put him to death; for by that means they would " ingratiate themſelves with the one, and have no reaſon to " fear the other;" adding with a ſmile, " a dead man cannot " bite." This cruel advice was approved of, and the execution of it committed to Achillas, who, taking with him L. Septimius and Salvius, the former once a tribune and the latter a centurion in the Roman armies, and three or four officers more, went on board a ſmall veſſel, and made up towards Pompey's galley, while the whole Egyptian army ſtood in battle array on the ſhore. The chief men, who attended Pompey, alarmed at the meanneſs of this reception, adviſed him to weigh anchor without delay and launch into the main; but the hero encouraged them, and in the mean time the Egyptian boat drawing near, Septimius, ſtanding up firſt, ſaluted Pompey in Latin, giving him the title of imperator. Achillas complimented him in Greek, and invited him on board his veſſel, telling him, that the ſea was ſo ſhallow near the ſhore, that his galley could not avoid ſtriking upon ſome ſhelve. Pompey, obſerving ſeveral of the king's galleys well manned, and the ſhore covered with ſoldiers, began to ſuſpect ſome treachery; but nevertheleſs, without betraying the leaſt diſtruſt, he took his leave of Cornelia, who already bewailed his death, and commanding two centurions, with Philip one of his freed-men and a ſlave called Scenes, to go on board the Egyptian boat before him, he himſelf followed, repeating to his wife and ſon as he went into the boat, the following iambics of Sophocles: Pompey's reception.

He that once falls into a tyrant's power,
Becomes a ſlave tho' he was free before.

As thoſe who were in the boat kept a profound ſilence, without paying the leaſt civility or ſpeaking a kind word to him all the way, in order to begin a converſation with Septimius, Pompey, looking earneſtly upon him, addreſſed him thus. " Methinks I ſhould know you " friend; have we not been formerly fellow-ſoldiers? But Septimius anſwered with a nod only, without ſhewing any manner of civility. Since therefore they all continued ſilent, Pompey took a little book in his hand, wherein he had wrote a Greek oration, which he intended to ſpeak to Ptolemy, and began to read it. When the boat drew near the ſhore, Cornelia, who never loſt ſight of her husband, and was very impatient to ſee the event, obſerved ſeveral perſons of diſtinction running to the ſea-ſide to meet him. Upon this the diſconſolate Cornelia took courage, imagining they were coming to wait upon Pompey and conduct him to the king; but but in that inſtant, as Philip his freed-man lent him his hand to help him out of the boat, Septimius coming behind him, ran him through with his ſword: at the ſame time Achillas and Salvius falling upon him with their drawn ſwords, the unfortunate Roman, having no means of defending himſelf or making his eſcape, took up his gown with both hands, and covering his face, neither ſpoke or did any thing unworthy of himſelf; but giving a groan, patiently received, without ſtirring, all their thruſts. Cornelia, who had kept her eyes fixed on her husband the whole time, ſeeing the ſwords of the aſſaſſins glitter about him, gave ſuch a ſhriek as was heard on the ſhore; but the mariners on board her galley ſeeing the Egyptian fleet under ſail, immediately weighed anchor, and being favoured by a brisk gale, ſaved the virtuous Cornelia and her ſon Sextus, from captivity and the cruel outrages they had reaſon to fear from ſuch barbarous and inhuman aſſaſſins. Cornelia and her ſon were conveyed ſafe to Cyprus; but ſome of the other veſſels were taken by the Egyptians, and all thoſe who were on board moſt cruelly murdered [1].

Pompey the Great cruelly murdered, &c.

THE head of Pompey was cut off, in order to be embalmed for a preſent to Cæſar; but the body was thrown naked upon the ſhore, and there expoſed to public view. Philip the freed-man ſtayed by it, watching it till the multitude had ſatisfied their curioſity; and then waſhing it with ſea-water, he wrapt it up in a garment of his own, and finding ſome rotten planks of a little fiſher-boat, he gathered them together for a funeral pile. While he was laying them together, an old Roman, who had ſerved from his youth under Pompey, came and helped him to perform the funeral rites (B). Such was was the end of an hero, who in his youth had acquired the ſurname of Great, and had triumphed over three parts of the world; but having unfortunately embarqued in a civil war, more out of a deſire of becoming ſole maſter of the republic, than a zeal for her preſervation when on the brink of ruin, he periſhed in it through his own ill conduct (C). The next day Lucius Lentulus, the laſt year's conſul, who had left the iſland of Cyprus, and was ſailing along the coaſt, obſerving a funeral pile, and Philip, whom he did not know, ſtanding by it, from ſome ſecret apprehenſion of Pompey's misfortune, came aſhore, and being told by Philip, that his apprehenſions were too true, he ſaid ſighing, "Alas! is this the fate of "Pompey the Great!" and continuing immoveable, expreſſed his grief with a flood of tears. While he was thus bewailing the death of Pompey, he himſelf was ſeized by the king's guards and thrown into a dark priſon, where he was ſoon after put to death. [m]

Cæſar arrives in Egypt.

In the mean time Cæſar, purſuing Pompey the ſame way he fled, ſteered his courſe towards Egypt, and arrived at Alexandria juſt as the news was brought thither of his death. Soon after he landed and entered the city, when the head of his rival was preſented to him, ſome ſay by Theodotus, others by Achillas, wrapt up in a veil, together with his ſeal, on which was engraved a lion holding a ſword in his paw; but Cæſar with the utmoſt horror, turned his eyes from ſo diſmal an object; and, reflecting on his former friendſhip with the deceaſed, the inconſtancy of fortune, and the calamities which often attend the greateſt men, burſt into tears, and with a thundering voice ordered the meſſenger immediately to be gone. He kept the ſeal; but ordered the head

Aurelius Victor adds, that Codrus, having burnt the body, buried the aſhes, and on the tomb wrote the following words: "Here "lies Pompey the Great."

(C) Had he continued in his camp at Dyrrachium, and near the ſea, of which he was maſter, he might have forced his rival to wander from province to province in ſearch of proviſions, and deſtroyed his army either by gradual loſſes, or uſeleſs conqueſts; but he ſuffered himſelf to be drawn into Theſſaly, and engaged his rival, when he might have conquered him without ſtriking a blow, Cæſar's army being then reduced to the utmoſt extremity for want of neceſſaries. 'Tis true indeed, that his army forced him, in a manner, to quit his firſt camp; but this want of authority over his troops is juſt matter of blame in a general, who bore the ſurname of the Great.

head to be buried with great solemnity in the suburbs of Alexandria, where he erected a temple to Nemesis the goddess of revenge. At the same time he prevailed upon Ptolemy to set at liberty all the friends of the illustrious deceased, who had been taken as they were straggling in those parts, and by his orders thrown into prison. These all joined their benefactor, who received them with marks of the most sincere friendship, signifying in all the letters he wrote to his friends at Rome, that the greatest advantage and pleasure he reaped from his victory was his saving every day the lives of some Roman citizens, who had taken arms against him [n].

Cæsar being detained at Alexandria by the Etesian winds (D), which continue in those parts during the dog-days, in the beginning of which he entered that port, spent his time in demanding the money which the present king's father owed him, and in hearing and deciding the controversy between young Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra. Auletes, as we have related in the history of Egypt, had engaged Cæsar, during his first consulate, by a promise of ten thousand talents, to get him confirmed in his kingdom by the Roman senate and people, and accounted among the friends and allies of that powerful state. Part only of this sum was then paid; and Cæsar, wanting money to maintain his army, exacted the rest with rigour; which Photinus, who was Ptolemy's prime minister, by several artifices made appear to the people to be greater than it was: for he stripped the temples of all their silver and gold vessels, and ordered the king's table to be served in wooden and earthen dishes, giving out, in order to stir up the mutinous populace of Alexandria

[n] Plut. Appian. Cæs. ibid.

(D) By Etesian winds are meant such as blow at stated times of the year, from what part soever of the compass they come. They are so called from the Greek word ετος a year, being yearly or anniversary winds, such as our sea-men call monsoons and trade-winds, which, in some parts of the world, continue constantly blowing for certain stated seasons of the year. Thus the north winds, which during the dog-days, constantly blow upon the coasts of Egypt, and hinder all ships from sailing out of Alexandria for that season, are called Etesiæ, in Cæsar's commentaries. In other authors the west and east winds are called Etesiæ, when they continue blowing for certain seasons of the year (33).

andria againſt Cæſar, that he had ſeized all the ſilver and gold belonging to the temples of the gods and to the king. He alſo meaſured out to Cæſar's ſoldiers, with a deſign to pick a quarrel with him before he was joined by the reſt of his troops, muſty and unwholſome corn, telling him, when he complained, that he muſt take it and be contented, ſince his army was maintained at the coſt of another. This contemptuous treatment made Cæſar, tho' he had then only three thouſand two hundred foot and eight hundred horſe with him, exact with more rigour the ſum owing him; but Photinus, inſtead of paying it, preſſed him every day to be gone, adviſing him to look after his other affairs, which were of greater conſequence than ſuch a paltry debt. Cæſar anſwered, That he was not come into Egypt to aſk counſel, but to exact the money which the late king owed him, and to compoſe the differences between the preſent king and his ſiſter Cleopatra, who were then at war. Accordingly ſoon after he iſſued out a peremptory order, injoining each of them to diſband their armies, and bring the cauſe to his tribunal for a final deciſion. This was looked upon by the Egyptian as highly injurious to the ſovereign majeſty of their king, who, being an independent prince, acknowledged no ſuperior, and therefore was not to be judged by any man. To this Cæſar anſwered, That he did not take upon him to judge as a ſuperior, but as an arbitrator appointed by the will of the late king, who had put his children under the tuition of the Roman people. This quieting all for the preſent, the cauſe was brought before Cæſar, and advocates were appointed on both ſides to plead at his tribunal; but, in the mean time, Cæſar, being greatly taken with the charms and graceful behaviour of Cleopatra, from an impartial judge became her advocate, and betrayed a great inclination to favour her. This provoked Ptolemy, who thereupon ſtirred up the whole city of Alexandria againſt Cæſar. The Roman ſoldiers, who were near the king, ſeized him, while he was encouraging the inraged multitude to take up arms in defence of their ſovereign, and ſecured him in the houſe where their general lodged; but nevertheleſs, as the reſt of his forces were diſperſed all over the city in their quarters, he would have been overpowered, and tore in pieces by the populace, had he not from a balcony ſpoke to them, and aſſured them, that the difference between Ptolemy and his ſiſter ſhould be ſoon made up to the ſatisfaction of both. Accordingly the next day, having aſſembled the people, he brought out Ptolemy and Cleopatra to them, and then cauſing their father's ther's will publickly to be read, wherein it was ordered that his eldeſt ſon and eldeſt daughter ſhould, according to the cuſtom of the country, be joined in marriage and reign together, under the guardianſhip of the Roman people, he decreed, in virtue of that guardianſhip, which, he ſaid, was veſted in him, that Ptolemy, as being the eldeſt ſon, and Cleopatra, as being the eldeſt daughter of the deceaſed king, ſhould, according to the tenor of the ſaid will, reign jointly; and that Ptolemy, the younger ſon of Auletes, and his other daughter, named Arſinoe, ſhould reign in Cyprus. This laſt he added by way of gift to appeaſe the people; for Cyprus had been ſome time before ſubdued by the Romans, and was then governed, like the other Roman provinces, by a prætor ſent annually from Rome. Photinus was the only perſon in the aſſembly, who did not applaud this decree. As that miniſter had been the chief cauſe of the breach between Cleopatra and her brother, and alſo of her expulſion out of the kingdom, he was well appriſed, that both his life and authority would be brought into danger by her return, and therefore exerted his utmoſt endeavours to prevent the execution of the decree. In order to this, he not only ſowed new diſcontents among the people, but prevailed upon Achillas to bring his army, conſiſting of twenty thouſand men, from Peluſium to Alexandria, in order to drive Cæſar out of the city.

The Alexandrian War.

This gave riſe to the Alexandrian war, ſo famous in hiſtory, of which we have given a very particular account in our hiſtory of Egypt °. King Ptolemy periſhing, in this war, Alexandria and all Egypt ſubmitted to the conqueror, who thereupon ſettled Cleopatraand the ſurviving Ptolemy, her younger brother, on the throne, as king and queen; which was putting the whole power into her hands, Ptolemy being then only eleven years old; but as he had engaged in ſo dangerous a war only for the ſake of that lewd woman, he made it turn the moſt he could to her advantage. In this war periſhed not only the king, but likewiſe Achillas and Photinus, with all the accomplices of Pompey's murder, except Theodotus, who, abandoning Egypt for fear of Cæſar, wandered up and down, deſpiſed and hated by all men, till M. Brutus, after Cæſar's death, finding him in Aſia, which was his province, cauſed him to be put to death, after he had made him ſuffer the moſt exquiſite torments he could invent.

CHAP. XIII.

The History of Rome, from the death of Pompey to the death of Cæsar.

WHEN the news of Pompey's death reached Rome, the senate and people strove who should heap most honours on the conqueror, now become absolute master of their liberties, lives, and fortunes. He was by the unanimous consent of all the orders of the republic, proclaimed consul for five years, named dictator, contrary to the antient custom, not for six months only, but for a whole year, declared tribune of the people, and head of that college for his life; impowered to make peace and war with whom he pleased, to levy what forces he thought fit, &c. so that all the dignities and power of the republic now centered in Cæsar alone, who, without any violence or proscriptions, was raised to a higher pitch of power and authority, than Sylla had acquired, by the death and banishment of innumerable citizens. As the new dictator could not then go in person to Rome, to take possession of the many dignities conferred upon him, he appointed Marc Antony his general of the horse, and sent him with a detachment of troops to the capital, committing to him the government of Italy, during his absence. As for the dictator himself, after he had put an end to the war of Alexandria, and settled his favourite Cleopatra on the throne of Egypt, he was forced to quit that kingdom, and march into the north of Asia against Pharnaces, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, son of Mithridates the Great, who finding the Romans engaged in a civil war, had laid hold of that opportunity to attempt the recovery of his father's dominions in Asia. In the very beginning of the troubles, he raised a powerful army, and, appointing Aſander governor of Boſphorus in his abſence, paſſed the Euxine ſea, and made himſelf maſter of Colchis, Armenia Minor, and ſeveral places in Cappadocia, Pontus, and Bithynia. After the battle of Pharſalia, Cæſar had ſent Domitius Calvinus with part of his army againſt him, committing to his care the government of all the provinces of Aſia Minor; but Pharnaces, having overcome Domitius in a pitched battle, made himſelf maſter of all the remaining parts of Pontus and Cappadocia. Puffed up with this ſucceſs, he treated the Roman merchants and publicans, who reſided at Amiſus the capital of Pontus, with great cruelty; and having ſeized all Bithynia, was preparing to paſs from thence into the province of Aſia properly ſo called. This extraordinary progreſs at length rouſed Cæſar, who was ſpending his time in wonton dalliances with Cleopatra, and put him again upon action. Having left part of his forces in Egypt to protect Cleopatra, he haſtened with the reſt into Syria; and, having appointed Sextus Cæſar, his relation, governor of that province, he purſued his march northward againſt Pharnaces. As he paſſed through Galatia, Dejotarus, who had ſided with Pompey and attended him in his flight, appeared before the dictator, in the habit of a ſuppliant and ſtripped of his royal robes, begging, he would extend to him the effects of the clemency, which had gained him greater glory than all his victories. The dictator was not much affected either with his ſubmiſſion or praiſes; but, nevertheleſs, as he was naturally inclined to mercy, he freely pardoned him, and reſtored to him the enſigns of royalty; but at the ſame time ordered him to ſend forthwith to his aſſiſtance the legion, which he had trained up in the Roman diſcipline, and all his cavalry, to be employed againſt Pharnaces. With this reinforcement he entered the kingdom of Pontus, which Pharnaces had reconquered, and, without giving any reſpite either to himſelf or his troops, or hearkening to the propoſals of peace, which the king made, with no other view but to gain time, he advanced againſt him, attacked him, and gained a complete victory, an account of which he wrote to his friend Aminitius or Anitius in the following words "Veni, vidi, vici, I came, I ſaw, I conquered;" which, being all diſſyllables and having the ſame cadence, happily expreſs the diſpatch of it. This victory, which was gained near the place where Triarius had been formerly defeated by Mithridates, repaired the honour of the Roman arms. After this defeat, Pharnaces fled with a thouſand horſe, the only remains of his vanquiſhed army, to Sinope, where he cauſed the horſes to be killed, and putting the men on board his ships in that port, he sailed with them back to Bosphorus; but he was no sooner landed, than Asander, whom he had left his lieutenant in that kingdom, and who, in his absence, had set up for himself, seized him, and, having put him to death, reigned in his stead. Hereupon Cæsar gave Mithridates the Pergamenian that kingdom, as a reward for the eminent services he had done him in Egypt, as we have related in the history of that kingdom. But Cæsar, in declaring him king of Bosphorus, gave him only an empty title; for Asander being in possession of it, he was to recover it by force of arms, in which attempt he lost his life, instead of gaining the crown, being overcome and slain in battle by Asander, who held the kingdom without any further opposition, the Romans not being at leisure, on account of the intestine broils that still continued among them, to give him any disturbance [q].

And now Cæsar, having settled affairs in Asia in the best manner he could, and left Cælius Vinicianus in Pontus, to keep that kingdom in awe, set out for Rome, attended only with one legion. He passed through Asia, and from thence crossed over into Greece, obliging every-where the publicans to bring to him the money, which, according to their engagments with the republic, they were to remit to the quæstors at Rome. His sudden arrival in Italy filled some with joy, others with fear, and kept the minds both of the senate and people in suspence. They were well acquainted with the humanity of his temper; but, as he had been greatly provoked by the blind and inconsiderate zeal of some rigid republicans, they were afraid he might rather follow the examples of Sylla and his uncle Marius, than the dictates of his own good-nature. Cicero was one of the first who felt the effects of his clemency. That great orator had declared for Pompey, and, after his defeat, returned to Italy, where he had lived at some distance from the capital, not caring to appear there, till he had obtained his pardon of Cæsar. He therefore no sooner heard, that the dictator was landed at Tarentum and was marching from thence to Brundusium, than he went to meet him, with an air of confidence mixed with fear and respect. Cæsar, who knew him while he was yet at some distance, in order to save him confusion of making submissions, not suitable to the rank he had held in the republic, dismounted, ran to meet him, and, having tenderly embraced him walked a great while

while with him alone, without ſhewing the leaſt diſſatisfaction, or taking any notice of his paſt behavour. Cicero was greatly taken with this kind reception; but nevertheleſs thought it adviſeable to keep at a diſtance from the capital, whither he repaired very ſeldom, and then only to make his court to the dictator. In his retirement he employed his time in the ſtudy of philoſophy, and compoſed moſt of thoſe books, which will be the admiration of all ages. Quintus Cicero, the orator's brother, who had formerly ſerved under the dictator in Gaul as one of his lieutenants, and had received innumerable favours at his hands, had, in the very beginning of the war, abandoned him to follow Pompey; but notwithſtanding his ingratitude, Cæſar pardoned him, at the earneſt entreaties of Aulus Hirtius, Caius Trebonius, and the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, the orator's inſeparable friend, even in his greateſt misfortunes. Many others, who had borne arms againſt him, were not only pardoned, but received with great kindneſs, and even admitted to his confidence. This obliging behaviour, ſo different from that of Sylla and Marius, gained him the affections of the people, and drew over great numbers of ſenators to his party, who had looked upon him before as a tyrant and uſurper. He entered Rome without the leaſt pomp or ſhew, being attended only by a ſmall number of legionaries; and finding great diſturbances in the city, occaſioned by a miſunderſtanding between Marc Antony, his general of the horſe, and P. Cornelius Dolabella, one of the tribunes of the people, who was no leſs attached to Cæſar's intereſt than Antony himſelf, he reſtored Rome to its former tranquillity, and eaſily prevailed upon the people to reject the law, which Dolabella had promiſed, containing an abolition of all debts. This law had occaſioned the miſunderſtanding between Antony and Dolabella, the former oppoſing it to the utmoſt of his power, and the latter ſtirring up the poor and meaner ſort of citizens to get it paſſed by force. Matters were carried ſo far, that Antony was ordered by the ſenate to bring his troops into the city; and then a battle was fought in the very forum, between Antony and his legionaries on one ſide, and Dolabella at the head of the inſolvent debtors on the other; but the latter paid dear for their boldneſs, eight hundred of them being killed upon the ſpot; whereas the general of the horſe loſt only a very ſmall number of his men in the fray. Cæſar's preſence put an end to all diſturbances. As he ſeemed to diſapprove the law, it was immediately rejected. Tho' he affected to govern according to the antient laws of the republic, public, and pretended to leave both the ſenate and people in the full poſſeſſion of their former privileges, yet no one dared to oppoſe or contradict him. Thus no change, as to outward appearance, was viſible in Rome, and at the ſame time all orders of men were ſubordinate to the ſovereign will of the dictator. During his ſhort ſtay in the capital, he entertained the people with magnificent ſhews, and remitted them the rents of the houſes which they hired of the public. Afterwards he confiſcated the eſtates of thoſe who ſtill continued in arms againſt him, and cauſed them to be ſold publicly by auction. The lands, houſes, and moveables of Pompey, whoſe children ſtill diſturbed the public tranquillity, were, together with the effects of many others, expoſed in the forum to public ſale; but no-body bidding for thoſe of Pompey out of reſpect to the memory of ſo great a man, Marc Antony purchaſed them at a very low price, and immediately took poſſeſſion of his houſe, where he ſpent his time, as is plain from Cicero's ſecond Philippic, in a continued ſcene of debauchery. When Cæſar's officers demanded the ſmall ſum he had agreed to pay for Pompey's houſe and moveables, he was highly offended, and treated them with great contempt, ſaying, He did not expect Cæſar would exact ſo paltry a debt of one who had done him ſo great ſervices. This provoked Cæſar, and occaſioned ſome coldneſs between him and his general of the horſe. As to Cæſar's other friends, none of them had occaſion to complain of him, or repent their having embraced his party. As pontifiex maximus, he appointed ſome of them augurs, others pontifices, others decemvirs, to whoſe care the Sibylline books were committed, and for their ſake increaſed the number of prætors to ten, filling that college with his friends and partizans. As the number of ſenators was greately diminiſhed by the death of ſome and flight of others, he raiſed to the ſenatorial dignity the chief officers of his army, and ſuch of the knights as had followed his ſtandards. Tho' a few days only were wanting to the end of the conſular year, with which his dictatorſhip expired, he aſſembled the tribes in the Campus Martius, and propoſed to them two of his lieutenants, Q. Fuſius Calenus and P. Vatinius, to be choſen conſuls for the current year. This he did with no other view, but to honour with the conſular dignity thoſe two officers, who had ſerved, with great fidelity, under him in all his wars. The ſhortneſs of their conſulate made Cicero ſay by way of raillery, That the year, in which Vatinius and Fuſius were conſuls, had neither ſpring, ſummer, nor autumn. The next year Cæſar cauſed himſelf to be created conſul; but did not part with the dictatorſhip. As conſul, he took for his collegue M. Æmilius Lepidus, who was juſt then returned from Hither Spain, which he had governed with great prudence and moderation. This was a great diſappointment to Marc Antony, who aſpired at the conſular dignity; but his late behaviour and ſcandalous debaucheries had alienated the dictator's mind from him; the more, becauſe he was hated by the people, on account of his haughty and imperious behaviour, while he diſcharged the office of general of the horſe [r].

And now Cæſar, having ſettled affairs in Italy, and taken the moſt proper meaſures to prevent any new diſturbances in the capital, was wholly intent on carrying the war into Africa, where Pompey's party was ſtill very powerful, being headed by the famous Cato and many officers of great diſtinction. When Pompey followed Cæſar into Theſſaly, he left in his camp at Dyrrachium, as we have obſerved above, fifteen cohorts, under the command of Cato. When news of Pompey's overthrow was firſt brought to Dyrrachium, Cato reſolved with himſelf, if Pompey were killed, to lead the fifteen cohorts into Italy, there diſband them, and retire from the tyranny of Cæſar, as far as he could, and live in exile; but, if Pompey were ſafe, to keep the troops together for him. With this deſign he left Dyrrachium, which was too near Theſſaly, where Pompey had been defeated, and croſſed over to the iſland of Corcyra, where the fleet lay. There he found Cicero, to whom, as he was a ſcrupulous obſerver of the laws, he offered the command of the troops he had with him, ſince Cicero had a right to the firſt poſt, as having been conſul; whereas he had only been prætor. But Cicero, who already repented his having declared for Pompey, and was then returning to Italy, under various pretences declined the offer, which ſo provoked Cneius, Pompey's ſon, that he reproached him with treachery and cowardice, and drawing his ſword, in the tranſport of his paſſion would have killed him on the ſpot, had not Cato, ſtarting up, laid hold of his arm, and held him, till the frightened orator was out of reach. The ſame night Cato conveyed him privately out of the camp, and by that means ſaved his life. Cicero immediately went on board a ſmall veſſel.

veſſel, and ſet ſail for Brunduſium, where he wrote to Oppius and Balbus (E), two of Cæſar's moſt zealous partizans, conjuring them to uſe their good offices in his behalf, and excuſe him with the conqueror, for having inconſiderately followed Pompey's party. While Cicero was ſailing towards Italy, many illuſtrious Romans, who had eſcaped from the battle of Pharſalia, arrived in the iſland of Corcyra, not knowing what rout Pompey had taken; ſo that Cato ſaw himſelf all on a ſudden at the head of a conſiderable army, and ſurrounded by many officers of diſtinction. That zealous republican did not doubt, but Pompey was fled either towards Egypt, where young Ptolemy, his pupil, reigned, or to the province of Africa, which P. Accius Varus had ſeized before the battle of Pharſalia, after having killed Curio, whom

(E) Caius Oppius was one of Cæſar's chief favourites. Chariſius Aulus, Gellius, and Pliny tell us, that he was a man of great learning, and the author of ſeveral works much eſteemed by the antients, among the reſt, of the lives of Scipio Africanus and of Pompey the Great. Plutarch reproaches him with leſſening the exploits and glory of Pompey, and magnifying thoſe of Cæſar. In Suetonius's time he was deemed the true author of the hiſtory of the Alexandrian, African and Spaniſh wars, which paſſed then, and have been tranſmitted to us, under the name of Hirtius. The ſame writer aſcribes to Oppius ſeveral other works, none of which have reached our times. As for Balbus, he was a native of Gades, or, according to others, of Carteia. He ſerved firſt in the armies of Quintus Metellus and of Pompey againſt Sertorius. Several years after he became acquainted with Cæſar, while he governed Spain, in quality of prætor, and was, at his recommendation, honoured with the rights and privileges of a Roman citizen. Theſe were afterwards called in queſtion; but Balbus found a zealous advocate in the perſon of Cicero, and was ſolemnly acknowledged by the ſenate and people for a citizen of Rome. It was cuſtomary for foreigners honoured with this diſtinction, to aſſume the name of the perſon they choſe for their patron; and agreable to this cuſtom Balbus took the name of Cornelius, having choſen Lentulus, who was one of the Cornelian family, for his patron. Before the war broke out between Cæſar and Pompey, one Theophanes, a great favourite of the latter, adopted Balbus and appointed him his heir. Sidonius Apollinaris commends ſome memoirs written by Balbus after the manner of a journal: "Quis "Balbi ephemeridem," ſays he, "fando adæquaverit (34)?"

Cæſar had ſent againſt him, and cut his army in pieces. He therefore reſolved to haſten after him, and, having taken all his men on board, ſet ſail, ſteering his courſe towards Africa. Before he embarqued, he gave thoſe, who were not willing to follow him, free liberty to depart and return to Italy. On his arrival in Africa, he found there Sextus, Pompey's younger ſon, who gave him an account of his father's tragical death in Egypt. This news occaſioned a general conſternation among the troops; but nevertheleſs they all declared with one voice, that they were ready to ſhed the laſt drop of their blood in defence of their common liberties, and that, after Pompey, they would follow no other leader but Cato. Out of compaſſion therefore to ſo many brave men, who had given ſuch proofs of a ſincere love for their country, and whom he was aſhamed to abandon, in a ſtrange country amidſt ſo many difficulties, he took upon him the command, and, without delay, marched towards the city of Cyrene, which received him, tho' the inhabitants had a few days before ſhut their gates againſt Labienus. Here he was informed, that Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, had landed before him in Africa, and taken refuge in the dominions of Juba king of Mauritania, where he had found Accius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Appius Varus, at the head of a conſiderable army. Hereupon Cato reſolved to go and join them; and accordingly, having loaded a great many beaſts of burden with water and other neceſſary proviſions, he ſet out on his march, which was attended with inexpreſſible difficulties. His troops travelled for ſeveral days together through inhoſpitable deſerts, covered with burning ſands, and infeſted by lions, tigers, ſerpents of a monſtrous ſize, &c. (F); ſo that they

Cato's march thro' the deſerts of Africa.

(F) Plutarch tells us, that Cato took with him on his march ſome of thoſe who were called Pſilli, and made it their buſineſs to cure the biting of ſerpents, by ſucking out the poiſon. This is no extraordinary matter; for we read in Homer, that, in antient times, wounds were cured by ſucking. But theſe Pſilli pretended, as we read in Plutarch, to a power of inchanting the ſerpents, and diſarming them of their fury, by ſtupifying them and laying them aſleep. We find in holy ſcripture inſtances of perſons, who pretended to that power, which they vaunted as miraculous. Upon this is founded, what we read in Jeremiah; For, behold, I will ſend ſerpents, cockatrices among you, which will not be charmed (35). But theſe wretched inchanters often paid dear for their preſumption.

they were obliged to be conſtantly on their guard night and day. Thus they marched ſeven days together, Cato himſelf being always the foremoſt, to encourage his men, who were quite exhauſted, by his example. Plutarch tells, that ſince the battle of Pharſalia, he had never mounted on horſeback, nor rid in a chariot; and that, to ſhew his concern, he had, ever ſince that fatal day, uſed to ſit at table, ſaying, That he never lay down but to ſleep (G). The ſoldiers, animated by the example of their leader, chearfully ſurmounted all difficulties, and arrived at length, to the number of ten thouſand men, at Utica. There a warm diſpute aroſe among the chief officers about the command of the army. Varus, who immediately joined Cato, together with Scipio and other ſenators of diſtinction, claimed the command as governor of Africa; which province had been allotted him by Pompey himſelf. On the other hand, the whole army demanded Cato for their leader; and even Varus and Scipio were willing to comply with their deſire: but Cato himſelf oppoſed his own promotion, ſaying, That he would not tranſgreſs thoſe laws, which he had taken arms to defend; and that he, who was only proprætor, ought not to command in the preſence of Scipio, who was proconſul. He added, that every one would look upon it as a good omen, to ſee a Scipio at the head of a Roman army in Africa, and that the very name would inſpire the ſoldiers with courage. Cato's words decided the diſpute; all readily yielded to Scipio, who, being declared commander in chief of all the forces of the republic in Africa, appointed Labienus, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral wars under Cæſar, his firſt lieutenant. Juba, king of Mauritania, no ſooner heard of Cato's arrival, than he came to Utica, to confer with him and the other officers. That prince had always ſhewn a great attachment to Pompey and his party; but, as he now thought they could not well do without him, he aſſumed an air of grandeur and pride, which gave great offence to Cato. The firſt time he had an interview with Cato and Scipio, he ordered his own ſeat to be placed in the middle; which Cato obſerving, he took up his own chair, and placed himſelf on the other ſide of Scipio, to whom he thus gave the moſt honourable place. Such was the pride and haughtineſs of thoſe republicans, even at the time their republic was was ready to ſink, if not ſupported by foreign ſtates and princes. Under Scipio were ſeveral officers of great diſtinction and experience in war, namely, Labienus, Afranius, Petreius, the two ſons of Pompey, Cneius and Sextus, Fauſtus Sylla, who had married their ſiſter, beſides a great number of ſenators and knights, all reſolved to prefer death to the loſs of their liberty, and either ſave the republic, or fall with it. King Juba promiſed to aſſiſt them to the utmoſt of his power, and join them with all his forces, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would allow him to take the field [s].

Cæſar reſolves to carry the war into Africa.

CÆSAR, now maſter of all Aſia, Greece, Egypt and Italy, reſolved to carry the war forthwith into Africa, and there cruſh the remains of Pompey's party; but while he was making the neceſſary preparations for that expedition, news was brought him, that the tenth legion, which he had always favoured in a particular manner, had openly revolted, and killed Galba and Coſconius, two officers of the ſenatorial order, who had endeavoured to appeaſe them. Cæſar, ſurpriſed at this unexpected attempt of his favourite legion, immediately diſpatched Criſpus Salluſtius, the famous hiſtorian, to quell the ſedition with his eloquence, and bring back the mutinous legion to their duty. Salluſt had great obligations to Cæſar, who had cauſed him to be appointed one of the ten prætors in the late election, after having reſtored him to his place in the ſenate, which he had forfeited by his infamous debaucheries. He therefore flew to Capua, where the mutineers were then encamped: but found it a more difficult taſk to appeaſe a ſeditious ſoldiery, than to harangue a diſarmed multitude. He was forced to ſave himſelf by flight from their fury, and haſten back to Rome, to acquaint Cæſar, that the rebellious legion, without hearkening to any terms, were in full march towards the capital. The dictator, amazed at their boldneſs, placed guards at the gates of the city, on the ramparts, and in all open places; and then as they drew near, ſent ſome truſty officers to aſk them what they wanted. Their ring-leaders anſwered, that they wanted to ſpeak with Cæſar himſelf. "Let them come into the city then, replied Cæſar, "and appear in the field of Mars, without any other arms "but their ſwords." Upon this, being admitted within the walls, they marched in good order to the appointed place, and

and there waited for Cæsar, who, without hearkening to the advice of his friends, went immediately to hear their complaints. The presence of a general, famous for so many victories, inspired them with such awe and respect, that even the boldest among them could not utter a single word. Then Cæsar, mounting his tribunal, encouraged them to speak and lay their complaints before him. Hereupon they took courage, and begged him to discharge them, alledging their age, their wounds, and their long service. As Cæsar was entering on a new war, they expected he would have courted them, and with large presents inticed them to follow him. They were therefore thunder-struck, when he answered, without shewing the least surprise or concern, "Your demand is just; "I do discharge you, and you may be gone." Cæsar, perceiving the consternation and surprise these words occasioned among them, after having kept silence for some time, added, "I do not, however, design to rob you of your rewards; these "I will give you, when I shall have triumphed over the rest "of my enemies." At these words they crouded round his tribunal, begging, that since he intended to reward them, he would suffer them to deserve the promised rewards with further services. But Cæsar, without seeming to take notice of their demand, "Go, fellow-citizens, said he, return to your "houses and families." The word fellow-citizens, instead of fellow-soldiers, was like a clap of thunder in their ears. They all cried out, that they were soldiers, that they had not accepted of their discharge, and that they would follow him into Africa. But Cæsar, pretending to despise both their offers and submissions, turned his back upon them, and came down from his tribunal. Then the legionaries, throwing themselves at his feet, conjured him rather to inflict such punishments upon them as their insolence deserved, than to disband them in so shameful a manner. He continued long inflexible; but at length, pretending to be overcome by the importunity of his friends, he ascended the tribunal once more, and, addressing himself to them, told them, that the revolt surprised him so much the more, as it came from a legion, which he had always distinguished above the rest; that nevertheless he could not prevail upon himself to punish those, whom he had once so tenderly loved; that, on his return from Africa, he would give them the rewards he had promised, and lands too for their subsistence; but that he would not by any means suffer them to attend him in the expedition he was now undertaking, in order to convince them that he could conquer without them. This speech made so deep an impression on their minds, that, with tears in their eyes, they begged he would rather decimate them than debar them from ſharing with him the glory of his victories. "We will follow you as volunteers," they all cried out with one voice, "if you refuſe to admit us in the number of your legions." Theſe words, which were manifeſtly ſpoken from a true ſenſe of their crime, and a ſincere repentance, touched Cæſar; he could no longer diſſemble, but ſtyling them again fellow-ſoldiers, he not only freely forgave them, but declared, that they ſhould ſhare with him both the glory and advantages of all his victories [t]. Having thus by his intrepidity, reſolution and addreſs, regained the affections and confidence of the rebellious legion, he purſued with great ardour the neceſſary preparations of the new war in Africa, ordering his legions in the mean time to aſſemble at Rhegium, the place of the general rendezvous. Thither he repaired ſoon after himſelf, and finding there but one legion of new levies and ſix hundred horſe, with them he croſſed over into Sicily, leaving orders for the other legions to follow him with all poſſible expedition. On his arrival in Sicily, he encamped on the ſhore, declaring, that he was determined to ſet ſail, as ſoon as the wind proved favourable, without waiting for the five legions and a body of two thouſand horſe, who were in full march to join him. Accordingly on the ſixth of the calends of January, that is, on the thirteenth of September, according to the computation which then obtained, the wind blowing fair, he embarqued the troops he had with him, and in the evening weighed anchor, leaving orders with Alienus prætor of Sicily, to convey over to him the other legions, as ſoon as they came up. In four days he arrived off Adrumetum on the coaſt of Africa; and having landed his troops at a ſmall diſtance from that city, by the advice of Plancus, one of his lieutenants, he ſent to ſummon Conſidius, who commanded in the place, to deliver it up to him; but Conſidius, truſting in his numerous garriſon, which conſiſted of two legions and three thouſand Mauritanian horſe, killed with his own hand the meſſenger, and then marched out at the head of all his troops to attack Cæſar in the camp he had formed in great haſte, and conſequently but very indifferently fortified. Cæſar thought it adviſeable to abandon his camp, and retire in good order, marching along the coaſt towards Ruſpina, at a ſmall diſtance from Adrumetum. Conſidius purſued him, and greatly haraſſed his troops on their march. On this occaſion it was that thirty Gauliſh horſe, who marched in the rear, put to flight two thouſand Mauritanian horſe, and drove them back to

to the very gates of Adrumetum. Cæsar with much-ado reached Ruspina, being continually harassed by the enemy's parties; but not finding sufficient provisions in that neighbourhood to subsist his army, he turned towards Leptis, situate on the coast between the two Syrtes. As Leptis was a free city, the inhabitants opened their gates to him, and supplyed his army in the best manner they could. He had not been long here, before part of the troops he expected from Sicily arrived on board some galleys and a small number of transports. These informed him, that the rest of the fleet were steering their course towards Utica; which gave Cæsar great uneasiness, that city being in the hands of the enemy. He therefore immediately dispatched Rabirius Posthumius, with orders to sail along the coast, and direct to Leptis such of his vessels as he should meet on his course. In the mean time, as the enemy were masters of the country, and Cæsar in a manner besieged in Leptis, his army was reduced to great streights for want of provisions; forage especially was become so scarce, that he was forced to feed his horses with a sea-weed, which he mixed with grass, to take off its saltness. He sent out indeed several parties to bring in provisions; but they had always the misfortune to fall in with the enemy, who narrowly watched their motions, and return with great loss. One day a party of horse, whom he sent out to forage, meeting an African, who played with great art on the flute, dismounted to hear him, leaving the care of their horses to their servants; but, in the mean time, the enemy falling upon them unexpectedly, cut most of them in pieces, and pursued the rest to their camp; which they would have entered with the fugitives, had not Cæsar and Asinius Pollio, at the head of a few cohorts, put a stop to their flight, by placing themselves in the gate of the camp, and by that means obliging the horse to face the enemy. In another encounter which happened a few days after, the best part of Cæsar's foot was put to flight by a strong detachment from Scipio's army. On this occasion, Cæsar, seeing one of the standard-bearers flying with the rest, taking hold of him by the collar, forced him to face about, saying, "Look that "way; the enemy is there." However, he could not prevail upon his frightened troops to stand their ground; but was forced himself to give way, and retire with them in no small disorder to his camp. As he was daily more and more streightened for want of provisions, and durst not venture out of his camp with the few forces he had with him, he resolved to go himself in quest of his fleet; and accordingly embarquing in the dead of the night, he set sail, attended only with a small number number of officers. The next day, when the ſoldiery miſſed him, they gave all up for loſt and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that the lieutenants, tribunes, and centurions kept them from abandoning their camp and deſerting to Scipio, who with ten legions and twenty elephants, was advancing againſt them. But their fears were ſoon calmed; for Cæſar, the next day meeting by good fortune the reſt of his fleet, returned with them to Leptis, and decamped as ſoon as they were landed, with a deſign to advance farther into the country.

Meets Labienus.

He had ſcarce marched three miles, when his ſcouts brought him word, that the enemy appeared; and ſoon after he diſcovered a very numerous army, which covered the whole plain, advancing in good order towards him. Cæſar immediately ordered his men to halt, and having drawn them up in one line, to prevent their being ſurrounded, waited in order of battle to receive the enemy's firſt onſet. This numerous body of Roman and Mauritanian forces was commanded by Labienus, who attacked Cæſar with ſuch fury, that he had need of all his courage and experience, to prevent his troops from flying back to their camp, and leaving the enemy maſter of the field.

His army in danger of being cut in pieces.

He was ſurrounded on all ſides, and would have been cut in pieces with all his men, had not a ſoldier of the tenth legion, by killing Labienus's horſe, occaſioned ſome confuſion among the enemy's battalions. Thoſe who were next to the general, ſeeing him fall and believing him dead, gave ground, and began to retire. Cæſar, obſerving the conſternation they were in, advanced at the head of a choice body of legionaries, and attacking with great intrepidity and reſolution the enemy's firſt line, put them to flight, before Labienus, who was ſtunned with his fall, recovered himſelf; but as Labienus's ſecond line ſtill kept their ground, Cæſar thought it adviſeable not to attack them, but march back in good order to his camp, before the firſt line could rally, which they were attempting to do, being commanded by officers of great experience and conduct. As Cæſar was retreating, M. Petreius and Cneius Piſo, two zealous partizans of Pompey, appeared unexpectedly at the head of eleven hundred Numidian horſe and a numerous body of light-armed infantry, and fell upon his rear. We are told, that Petreius on this occaſion, remembering the favours he had formerly received at Cæſar's hands, ſpared his benefactor, under the pretence that he ought not to rob his general of the glory of completing the victory. Be that as it will, Cæſar got ſafe to his camp at Leptis, and from thence marched the ſame night to Ruſpina. In the mean time, Scipio joined his lieutenant Labienus with eight legions and four thouſand horſe; and then Cæſar, intrenching himſelf under the walls of Ruſpina, diſpatched meſſenger after meſſenger to Italy and Sicily, acquainting his friends with the danger he was in and entreating them to ſend him ſpeedy ſuccours, without which he ſhould be obliged to abandon Africa, and return with ſhame and diſgrace to Italy. Alienus, prætor of Sicily, upon the firſt notice of his danger, ſent him powerful ſuccours; which were no ſooner arrived, than he reſolved to march out of his camp and offer Scipio battle, who, with an army twice as numerous as his, was encamped at a ſmall diſtance, to prevent his drawing any forage or proviſions from the neighbouring country. Cato, who commanded in Utica, being informed of the enemy's motions, wrote a letter to Scipio, adviſing him, as he had before done Pompey, by no means to hazard a battle, with a commander experienced in war and encouraged with ſucceſs; but to uſe delay, which, he ſaid, would cool the heats and paſſions of men, which are the chief ſupport and ſtrength of uſurpers. But Scipio, fluſhed with his late ſucceſs, not only rejected his advice, but wrote a letter to him, wherein he reproached him with cowardice, ſince he was not content himſelf to lie ſecure within walls and trenches, but muſt hinder others from making uſe of their courage, and laying hold of the opportunities of conquering which offered. Then Cato openly declared, that he was ſorry he had yielded the command to Scipio, who, ſaid he, will not uſe his power wiſely in war, and if he ſhould, contrary to all appearance, ſucceed, will, without all doubt, uſe his ſucceſs as unjuſtly at home; nay, he even told his friends, That, if Scipio ſhould conquer, he did not doubt, but he would prove as cruel and arbitrary a tyrant as Cæſar himſelf [u].

Receives reinforcements from Sicily.

But, to return to Cæſar: being informed that the enemy laid great ſtreſs on an oracle, importing, that the family of the Scipio's ſhould be always victorious in Africa, and having in his army a mean and contemptible man of that family, known by the name of Scipio Salutio, he gave him the title of general, either in raillery, as Plutarch obſerves, to ridicule Scipio, who commanded the enemy's army, or ſeriouſly, to bring over the omen to his ſide. After this, he quitted his camp at Ruſpina, and marched ſtrait to Utica, with a deſign to draw the enemy to a general engagement, by threatening to lay ſiege to that city, which was the great magazine of their proviſions and ammunition. He encamped before fore the place, without being in the leaſt diſturbed by the enemy, who were unwilling to engage before the arrival of Juba king of Mauritania, whom they daily expected with eighteen thouſand foot, eight hundred horſe, and thirty elephants. At length the king arrived with the expected ſuccours, and, together with Scipio and Labienus, formed three different camps, which in a manner blocked up that of Cæſar, who was again greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, the enemy having laid waſte all the neighbouring country. While he was thus beſieged, news was brought him, that the ninth and tenth legions were at length arrived from Sicily, and in full march to join him. Hereupon Cæſar, leaving in his camp a ſufficient number of troops to defend his works, marched out with the reſt to meet them, and brought them ſafe to his camp before Utica. As he now thought himſelf ſtrong enough to cope with the enemy, he drew out his forces in order of battle for ſeveral days together; but the enemy not accepting the challenge, he reſolved to decamp, and, leaving Utica, which was in a condition to ſuſtain a long ſiege, to attack Thapſus, a place of great importance, but not ſo well provided and fortified. Juba, Scipio, and Labienus followed him, and encamped ſeparately about fifteen hundred paces from the enemy. Cæſar was no ſooner informed that they were intrenching themſelves, than he marched out of his camp, and making his way with incredible expedition, through thick woods and a country almoſt impaſſable, fell upon Scipio's men, before they had completed their works, put them to flight, and then attacking firſt Labienus's camp, and afterwards Juba's, made himſelf maſter of them, and killed fifty thouſand of the enemy in the three camps, with the loſs only of fifty of his own men. After this battle, Thapſus, Adrumetum, and Zama immediately ſubmitted; and the heads of the party, giving all up for loſt, either laid violent hands on themſelves, or were taken and put to death by the enemy. Scipio endeavoured to ſave himſelf by ſea; but his veſſel being taken, he choſe rather to die, than owe his life to the conqueror. Juba and Petreius ſought death in a ſingle combat, in which Juba being killed, Petreius ordered one of his ſlaves to diſpatch him. Afranius and Sylla, with a ſmall body of troops, took their rout along the coaſt of Africa, with a deſign to join the two ſons of Pompey, whom Cato had ſent into Spain; but were met, defeated, and taken by Sitius, one of Cæſar's lieutenants, who would have ſaved them; but his ſoldiers in a mutiny cut them in pieces. Of all the heads of Pompey's party, Labienus alone found means means to make his escape, and convey himself safe into Spain.

All Africa, except Utica, submits.

And now the enemy's forces being dispersed, and their leaders either fled or killed, all Africa submitted, except the city of Utica, where Cato commanded, and had formed a kind of senate, composed of three hundred Romans, who had repaired to him from different parts. The news of the victory gained by Cæsar at Thapsus threw the whole city into the utmost consternation. Some of the citizens betook themselves to their arms; others thought of nothing but how to save themselves from falling into the hands of the conqueror.

But Cato endeavoured to calm their fears, representing to them, that perhaps things were not so bad in truth, but more than half increased by fame, as is usual in war. Thus he quelled the tumult for some time; and having called together his senate or council, consisting of three hundred Roman citizens he first commended their courage and fidelity, and then entreated them by no means to separate, since, while they kept together, Cæsar would have less reason to despise them, if they fought against him, and be more ready to pardon them, if they submitted to him. Consult among yourselves, said he; if you think fit to submit, I will impute your resolution to necessity; but if you resolve to stand up in defence of your rights and liberties, I will be your companion, and, if you think fit, your leader. We are to fight against one, whose affairs are not in so good a condition as is generally believed. Spain has already declared for the sons of Pompey; Rome, unaccustomed to slavery and oppression, will be ready to shake off the yoke upon every turn of affairs; Italy will never submit to a sovereign, who acknowledges no other law but his own caprice; Utica is well furnished with all sorts of provisions and military engines, and in a condition to stem the course of this mighty conqueror's victories. Let us therefore defend to the last what ought to be more dear to us than our lives and fortunes. Notwithstanding the uncertainty of war, we shall lead a most happy life, if we succeed, or die a most glorious death, if we miscarry. Cato's words inspired even the most cowardly with courage. They forgot the present danger, and declared with one voice, that they would stand a siege, protesting they would rather die with Cato, than save themselves by abandoning a person of such exalted virtue. When they came to deliberate about the proper measures for the defence of the place, some were for setting the slaves at liberty; but this Cato opposed, saying, That no slave ought to be set at liberty without the consent of his master. We ought not, said he, even in our preſent circumſtances, to make free with the property of others; but let every one diſpoſe as he pleaſes of what is his own. Some of the ſenators immediately ſet their ſlaves at liberty, and furniſhed them with arms; but the greater part of them, forgetting their former reſolution, ſhewed great backwardneſs in parting with their ſlaves, from whoſe labour they drew great advantages. Why ſhould we riſque all, ſaid they among themſelves, to preſerve Utica? Have we forgot what enemy we have to deal with? Is it not that Cæſar, to whom all the power of Rome has ſubmitted? and which of us is a Pompey, a Scipio, or a Cato? Now that all men give way to Cæſar's fortune, ſhall we alone engage for the liberty of Rome, and in Utica declare war againſt one, who has driven Pompey the Great and Cato himſelf out of Italy? No, let us know ourſelves, ſubmit to the conqueror, and ſend deputies to implore his mercy. Cato, tho' he perceived the change, took no notice of it; but wrote to Juba, who, with a ſmall body of men, was retired to a neighbouring mountain, and to Scipio, who lay at anchor under a promontory near Utica; adviſing them not to come near the place, ſince he ſuſpected the fidelity both of the inhabitants and of the ſenators who formed his council. Not long after, a conſiderable body of horſe, who had eſcaped from the battle, appearing at ſome diſtance from Utica, ſent a meſſenger to acquaint Cato with the different ſentiments that prevailed among them, and to aſk his advice; for ſome were for joining him; others, not caring to lock themſelves up in the city, were for going to Juba. Cato haſtened out to confer with their leaders, whom he entreated not to abandon ſo many worthy ſenators, but to ſeek the mutual ſafety of one another, and to come into the city, which was impregnable and well furniſhed with corn and other proviſions for many years. The ſenators likewiſe, who attended Cato, with tears in their eyes beſought them to ſtay. Hereupon the officers went to conſult the ſoldiers; but, in the mean time, news was brought to Cato, that the greater part of his ſenators were raiſing a tumult in the city, and ſtirring up the inhabitants to exclude Cato and ſend deputies to Cæſar. This news being immediately divulged among the horſe, they deſired their officers to return to Cato with this anſwer, That they ſhould not be afraid of Cæſar, while they followed Cato, whom they were ready to join, provided he would either drive out of the city, or cut in pieces, all the Uticans, who would not fail to betray them and plot their ruin, as ſoon as Cæſar appeared. This condition ſeemed too cruel to the virtuous Cato, who therefore therefore chose rather to deprive himself of so powerful and necessary a supply, than consent to it. Upon his return to the city, the senators of his council openly declared, that they were neither able nor willing to withstand Cæsar; nay, they even threatened to seize those senators, who were for standing a siege, and to deliver them up to Cæsar. Hereupon Cato with much-ado prevailed upon the horse to stay, at least one night, in the city, in order to facilitate the escape of those worthy senators, who were thus threatened by the rest. While they were preparing to set out, news was brought, that Cæsar was drawing near with his whole army; and then Cato, ordering all the gates to be shut, except one towards the sea, attended his friends to the port, and putting them on board some vessels he had prepared for that purpose, he returned to the city, and dismissed the body of horse, advising several of his friends to join them, and abandon a city, which would soon fall into the enemy's hands. Plutarch observes, that tho' he was very pressing with his other friends to save themselves by flight, yet he gave no such advice to his son, not thinking fit to persuade him to abandon his father. As Cæsar drew near, the senators, who remained in Utica, appointed Lucius Cæsar, a relation of the conqueror, who had followed Pompey's party, to intercede for them and make their submissions to the dictator. Cato approved of their choice, and even composed the speech, with which he was to address Cæsar. Lucius, in taking his leave of Cato, told him, That he should not scruple to kiss the hands and fall at the knees of Cæsar in his behalf; but Cato would by no means give him leave so much as to mention his name. "I will not, said he, be indebted to a tyrant, for those very "things which are marks of tyranny: to save men is an "instance of his tyranny, as if he were lord of their lives." However, as Lucius was departing, he recommended to him his son and the rest of his friends, and, tenderly embracing him, bid him farewel. While the rest were preparing to attend Lucius in the habit of suppliants, Cato was greatly surprised at the constancy of a young Roman, named Statilius, who, tho' in the flower of his age and a noted enemy to Cæsar, declared, That he would rather die, than be indebted to an usurper for his life. Cato, having attempted in vain to persuade him to yield to fortune and join the other suppliants, recommended him to Apollonides and Demetrius, two celebrated philosophers, saying, "It belongs to you to bring "down this young man's spirit, and to make him know " what is good for him (H)." Towards the evening, he ordered the gates of the city to be opened, exhorting both the Romans and inhabitants to go out, and meeting the conqueror, throw themſelves upon his mercy. As for himſelf, he went, according to his cuſtom, to bathe before ſupper; and while he was in the bath, remembering Statilius, he cried out aloud to the philoſopher Apollonides, who always attended him, " Well, Apollonides, have you brought down the high ſpi-" rit of Statilius? Is he gone without bidding us farewel?" No, anſwered the philoſopher, " I have diſcourſed much with " him, but to little purpoſe; he is ſtill unalterable, and de-" termined to follow your example." This, anſwered Cato with a ſmile, " will ſoon be tried." He then called his ſon, and adviſed him, among other things, never to intermeddle in affairs of ſtate; telling him, " That to act therein as be-" came him was now impoſſible, and to do otherwiſe diſ-honourable."

AFTER he had bathed, he went to ſupper, at which he ſat, as he had always uſed to do ever ſince the battle of Pharſalia, contrary to the Roman cuſtom. Several of his particular friends, and ſome of the principle citizens of Utica, ſupped with him. Among the former were Apollonides the ſtoic philoſopher and Demetrius the peripatetic. After ſupper, many philoſophical queſtions were diſcuſſed, and, among the reſt, thoſe fundamental principles, which were called the paradoxes of the ſtoics; and this in particular, " that the " good man only is free, and that all wicked men are ſlaves." The moment this was propoſed, the peripatetic took up the argument againſt it (I); but Cato, raiſing his voice, maintained the inconteſtable truth of that maxim with more than ordinary warmth; and, in the heat of the diſpute, let ſome words drop, which plainly ſhewed, that he deſigned to put an end to his life, and by that means ſet himſelf at liberty. Hereupon,

Cato maintains the principles of the ſtoics.

(H) By theſe words Cato implied, that the diſpoſition of mind, in which Statilius fancied himſelf to be, was rather the effect of vain-glory, than true conſtancy; and that what became Cato, who had always made a profeſſion of ſevere virtue and was Cæſar's equal, did not become ſuch a young man as Statilius. Epictetus obſerves, that it is only for " an extraordinary perſon to imitate " an extraordinary virtue." It is not fitting for a perſon of common ſize to attempt ſo high a flight.

(I) The peripatetics maintained, that neither virtue nor vice had any relation to freedom or ſervitude, taking theſe words in a ſenſe too conſtrained and literal.

Hereupon, when he had done ſpeaking, the whole company kept ſilence and ſeemed much dejected; but Cato, to divert them from any ſuſpicion of his deſign, turned the diſcourſe, and began again to talk of the preſent affairs, ſhewing great concern for his friends who were at ſea, and for thoſe who were travelling by land, ſince they were to paſs through a dry deſert, which afforded nothing for their ſupport.

WHEN the company broke up, he walked with his friends, as he uſed to do after ſupper, gave the neceſſary orders to the officers of the guard, and then withdrew, having firſt embraced his ſon and every one of his friends, with more than uſual tenderneſs. As this renewed their ſuſpicion of his deſign, his ſon, entering his room unknown to him, ſtole away his ſword, which he uſed to have always by him. Cato, now alone, lay down, and taking up Plato's dialogue on the immortality of the ſoul, began to read it with great attention. After he had read ſome time, in a tranſport of joy, which the hope of a happy immortality raiſed in his breaſt, he looked up for his ſword, and miſſing it, called one of his ſlaves; and, without ſhewing the leaſt eagerneſs or concern, only aſked him, Who had taken away his ſword? As the ſlave made no anſwer, he continued reading; and a little while after, not ſeeming importunate or haſty for it, but as if he would only know what was become of it, he ordered it to be brought to him. He then took up the book again, and having finiſhed the whole dialogue without any tidings of his ſword, he called all his ſervants one by one, and in an angry tone demanded it of them, crying out, That he was betrayed and delivered into his enemy's hands, naked and diſarmed. One of his ſlaves attempted to appeaſe him; but he had ſcarce begun to ſpeak, when Cato gave him ſuch a blow in the mouth, that he hurt his own hand. At this noiſe his ſon and the reſt of his friends came running into his room, and, falling at his feet, endeavoured, with tears and entreaties, to divert him from any deſign he might have on his own life; but Cato, raiſing himſelf up, "Why does no body perſuade me by reaſon," ſaid he, "or teach me what is better, if I have deſigned any thing "that is ill? Muſt I be thus diſarmed, and hindered from "making uſe of my own reaſon?" Then turning to his ſon, "And you, young man," ſaid he, "why do not you tie "your father's hands behind his back, that when Cæſar "comes, I may not be able to hurt him? for againſt myſelf "I ſtand in no want of a ſword; to end my days I need but hold "my breath a little while, or ſtrike my head againſt the wall." Having thus ſpoke, he diſmiſſed his ſon and the reſt of his friends, friends, except the two philoſophers Demetrius and Apollonides, to whom he addreſſed himſelf more calmly thus: "Can "you bring any reaſon to prove, that it is not baſe and un- "worthy of Cato to beg his life of his enemy? I have not yet "determined any thing on this ſubject, but I would have it "in my power to perform what I ſhall think fit to reſolve on." As the philoſophers made no reply, which indeed they could not without contradicting their own principles, Cato told them, That he would not fail to aſk their advice, when he ſhould have occaſion to make uſe of what their philoſophy taught; "but, in the mean time," ſaid he, "go tell my ſon, that "he ſhould not compel his father to what he cannot per- "ſuade him." Upon this they both withdrew, and ſent him his ſword by a young ſlave. Cato took it up with great pleaſure, and, having drawn it and examined the point, ſaid in putting it up, "Now I am maſter of myſelf." He then took the book again, and having read it twice over (K), he lay down, and fell into a ſound ſleep. About midnight he called up two of his freed-men, Cleanthes, his phyſician, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in public affairs. The latter he ſent to the port,

His whole concern is about his friends.

(K) And yet this dialogue ſeems too long to be read twice over in ſo ſhort a ſpace; but that which ſeems moſt incomprehenſible is, that Cato, before he laid violent hands on himſelf, ſhould read over that dialogue, which proves in the ſtrongeſt terms, that what he was going to do was not lawful. "A philoſopher," ſays Plato in that dialogue, "will never lay violent hands on himſelf, that not "being lawful even to thoſe to whom death is more deſireable than "life. They are not allowed to procure that remedy to themſelves, "tho' it be never ſo neceſſary; for God has placed us in this life as "in a poſt, which we are never to quit without his permiſſion. The "gods take care of us, and we muſt conſider ourſelves as their pe- "culiar property. If one of your ſlaves ſhould diſpatch himſelf "without your command, you would think he had done you an in- "jury, and would puniſh him, if it lay in your power." How could Cato perſiſt in his reſolution againſt ſuch ſtrong arguments? He might poſſibly juſtify himſelf from what is added by Socrates; "We muſt wait with patience till it pleaſes God to ſend us an ex- "preſs to remove out of this life." He looked perhaps on the condition he was then in as ſuch an order; and thus has Cicero commented upon it in the firſt book of his Tuſculan queſtions: "Cato "autem ſic abiit e vita, ut cauſam moriendi nactum ſe eſſe gauderet. "Vetat enim dominans ille in nobis deus injuſſu hinc nos ſuo de- "migrare; cum vero cauſam juſtam deus ipſe dederit, ut tunc So- "crati, nunc Catoni, ſæpe multis, næ ille, medius fidius, vir ſapi- "ens lætus ex his tenebris in lucem illam exceſſerit; nec tamen ille port, to see whether his friends had set sail, and ordered the former to apply some remedy to his hand that was hurt by the blow he gave his slave. At this they were all overjoyed, hoping he had laid aside all thoughts of putting an end to his life. Butas soon came back, and brought him word, that all his friends were embarqued, except Crassus, who had staid on account of some business, but was just ready to depart. He added, that the wind was high, and the sea very rough. At this he sighed, shewing a great deal of compassion for those who were at sea, and sent again Butas to see, whether any of them were driven back and wanted his assistance. In the mean time, he again fell asleep, and did not wake till day began to appear; when Butas returning, acquainted him that the storm was allayed, and that no noise was heard in the port. Then Cato, laying himself down again, as if he intended to sleep, desired Butas to withdraw and shut the door after him. He was no sooner gone, than the zealous republican, as if he had waited till those of his party were out of danger, taking his sword, ran it into his body; but not being able to use his hand so well which had been hurt, he did not die immediately of the wound, but fell upon his bed, and threw down a table on which he had drawn some figures of geometry. The noise of this alarmed his son and his friends, who, breaking into the room, found him weltering in his blood, with his bowels in

" vincula carceris ruperit, leges enim vetant; sed tanquam a ma-

If it was left to every one to explain, as he thought fit, the state he is in, and interpret it as an express order from God to quit his station, the prohibition of self-murder would be unnecessary, since a reason would never be wanting upon occasion to justify it; therefore this action in Cato is not by any means warrantable. However, it must be allowed that it was less criminal in him, than it can be in those, who destroy themselves for some private reasons when overwhelmed with grief, pinched with poverty, overcome with fear, or some other passion; for there is a wide difference, in our opinion, between the pusillanimity of such and the despair of a brave man, who kills himself, not for any private reason, but if the expression may be allowed, for some reason of state; for tho' the action carries in it a brutal fury and the blind impulse of an ungovernable passion; yet, as Plutarch has well observed on another subject, where he compares Romulus and Theseus, " he is more excuseable, who is transported by a great part out of his body. Such a dreadful ſight and his ghaſtly looks, his eyes being yet open, ſtruck them all with ſo great terror, that they ſtood ſome time motionleſs, without being able, in that ſurpriſe and confuſion, to lend him the leaſt aſſiſtance. At length Butas accoſting him, put in his bowels, which were not hurt, and ſewed up the wound; but Cato, after ſome time, coming to himſelf, thruſt away the phyſician, rent open his wound again, and, tearing his bowels, expired immediately, in the forty-eighth, or, as others will have it, in the fifty-fifth, year of his age. He was one of the moſt virtuous citizens Rome ever produced, had all the virtues, and none of the faults, of Cato the cenſor, one of his illuſtrious anceſtors, and would, with his invincible conſtancy and reſolution, have ſupported the ſinking republic, had not the gods themſelves, as Plutarch obſerves, decreed her deſtruction. His death was no ſooner known, than the inhabitants of Utica flocked to his houſe, calling him their benefactor, their deliverer, the only free, the only invincible, Roman. Tho' at that very inſtant word was brought them, that Cæſar was drawing near, yet neither fear of the preſent danger, nor the commotions and diſcord which reigned among them, nor even the eagerneſs each of them had of making their court to the conqueror, could divert them from burying his body with the utmoſt pomp, and paying all the funeral honours that were due to a perſon of his merit and rank. How ſtrong muſt the impreſſions have been, which the virtue of Cato left in their minds, ſince they thus openly honoured his memory at the approach of his enemy, who was victorious, and upon whoſe mercy they were that moment to throw themſelves! When Cæſar, who was now at the very gates of Utica with all his forces, heard of Cato's death, he is ſaid to have uttered theſe words; "Cato, I envy "thee thy death, ſince thou haſt envyed me the glory of ſaving "thy life"(L). Upon Cato's death, the city of Utica was by Lucius
" stronger cause, as by a more severe stroke." And what stroke can be more severe than the ruin of our country?

Utica ſubmits to Cæſar.

(L) Plutarch ſeems to queſtion whether Cæſar would have pardoned Cato or no. The diſcourſe, ſays that writer, which Cæſar wrote againſt Cato, is no great ſign of his kindneſs, or that he was inclined to ſhew him any favour. Is it probable, adds he, that Cæſar would have been tender of his life, when he was ſo bitter againſt his memory? But, with Plutarch's leave, we are of opinion, that Cæſar would have ſpared him, as he did Cicero, Brutus, Marcellus, his moſt inveterate enemy, and many others, not indeed out of any friendſhip he had for him, but out of vanity, and perhaps policy. As for the book mentioned by Plutarch, Cæſar wrote it not out of hatred to Cato, but in his own vindication. Cicero had written an encomium

Lucius Cæsar delivered up to the conqueror, who pardoned some, and caused others to be privately put to death. Among the latter was Lucius Cæsar himself, who had treated with great cruelty such of Cæsar's adherents, as he had got into his power during the war; among the former were Cato's son, his daughter, Statilius, and most of his friends. His son was afterwards slain in the battle of Philippi, with more glory than he had lived; for we are told, that he led a debauched life, and that being lodged, while he stayed in Cappadocia, in the house of Marphadates, one of the royal family, he maintained a criminal conversation with his wife, by name Psyche, which in Greek signifies "soul." This gave the Romans occasion to say by way of raillery, "That Cato and Marphadates were good "friends; for they had but one soul; that Cato was noble "and generous, and had a royal soul, &c." Cato's daughter was married to Brutus, one of the conspirators, and ended her life as became one of her birth and family, as we shall relate in a more proper place. As for Statilius, who affected to imitate Cato, he was prevented by the philosophers from putting an end to his life; but he afterwards followed Brutus, to whom he proved very faithful and serviceable, and at length died, with many other illustrious Romans, in the battle of Philippi [w].

Cæsar reduces Mauritania and Numidia.

Cæsar, now master of Utica, and of the whole Roman province in Africa, marched into Numidia and Mauritania, and reduced both those kingdoms to Roman provinces, appointing Crispus Sallustius to govern them in quality of proconsul, with private instructions to pillage and plunder the inhabitants, and by that means put it out of their power ever to shake off the yoke. The fruitful plains of Numidia he divided among the soldiers of P. Sitius, who had reduced great part of that country. Sitius, being driven out of Rome, we know not on what account, had taken refuge in Mauritania, and there assembled a considerable number of Roman exiles, mium on Cato, and called it by his name. A discourse composed by so great a master, upon such an excellent subject, was immediately in every body's hands. This touched Cæsar to the quick; for he looked upon a panegyric on his enemy, who chose rather to kill himself than fall into his hands, as no better than a satire against himself. He therefore published an answer to it, containing a collection of charges and accusations against that great man, which he styled Anticato.

exiles, with whom he entered into the ſervice of Bogud, a petty king of Mauritania, then at war with Juba. Bogud appointed him commander in chief of all his forces; which truſt he diſcharged with great fidelity, invading Juba's dominions, and making himſelf maſter even of Cirta his capital. This diverſion was of great uſe to Cæſar; for it obliged Juba to leave great part of his forces at home, under the command of Sabura, one of his beſt generals, to defend his own kingdom; but, during his abſence, Sitius, having defeated and killed Sabura, made himſelf maſter of the whole country, and then marched with his victorious army to join Cæſar, whom he ſcarce knew. On his march he met a body of Romans, who had ſaved themſelves from the battle of Thapſus, under the command of Afranius and Fauſtus Sylla, defeated them, and took their leaders priſoners, together with Sylla's wife the daughter of Pompey, whom he delivered up to Cæſar, who not only pardoned her, but ſent her into Spain to her brothers. Soon after Sitius's fleet ſurpriſed in the port of Hippo the ſquadron which was conveying into Italy Scipio and other Romans, who had left Utica, and took moſt of them priſoners. Scipio laid violent hands on himſelf; but the reſt were brought to Sitius, who conſigned them to Cæſar. Theſe ſervices the dictator rewarded with a fruitful country bordering on Numidia, which he beſtowed on Sitius, appointing him ſovereign of that diſtrict, after having driven out a Numidian prince named Manaſſes, who had declared for Juba, and ſerved in his army againſt Cæſar [x].

Carthage and Corinth rebuilt.

And now Cæſar, having brought all Africa under ſubjection and ſettled the affairs of that province, repaired to Utica, where his fleet waited for him. There he gave orders for the rebuilding of Carthage, as he did ſoon after his return to Italy for the rebuilding of Corinth; ſo that theſe two famous cities were deſtroyed in the ſame year, and in the ſame year raiſed out of their ruins, in which they had lain about a hundred years. Two years after they were both re-peopled with Roman colonies; and from theſe new inhabitants of Corinth were deſcended thoſe Corinthians, to whom St. Paul wrote his two epiſtles. As the dictator had now no enemy to contend with in Africa, he left that country, loaded with glory and ſpoils, and ſet ſail for Italy on the ides of June, that is, on the fourteenth of the Julian April; and arriving three days after at Caralos, now Cagliari, ſailed from

from thence, on the third of the calends of July, for Oſtia, which he did not reach, the weather proving very ſtormy, till the twenty-ſixth of the Julian May, that is, twenty-eight days after. As he drew near Rome, the whole city went out to meet him, and conducted him to the capitol, where he returned thanks to Jupiter for the ſucceſs of his arms. The ſenate and people ſtrove who ſhould be moſt forward in heaping honours upon him. Supplications were appointed, and ſacrifices ordered to be offered daily in the temples for forty days together in thankſgiving to the gods for the victories he had gained in Africa. His uſual guard was by a decree of the ſenate trebled, and the number of the lictors, who attended him as dictator, doubled. His dictatorſhip was prolonged for ten years, and the dignity of cenſor, which had been hitherto divided between two magiſtrates, conferred on him alone, under the title of "prefect," or "reformer, of "manners," that of cenſor ſeeming too vulgar. His perſon was declared ſacred and inviolable; and, to raiſe him above the level of his fellow-citizens, it was decreed, that he ſhould ſit, during his life, next to the conſuls; that he ſhould give his opinion the firſt in all public deliberations; that he ſhould ſit at all public ſhews in a curule chair, and that, even after his death, the chair ſhould be placed as uſual at the ſhews, to render his memory immortal; nay, they went ſo far as to place his ſtatue in the capitol next to that of Jupiter, with this inſcription on the pedeſtal, "to Cæſar a demi-god." Cæſar had too much penetration not to know, that this profuſion of honours was the effect of fear, and not of any ſincere kindneſs or affection for him; and therefore, in accepting ſuch marks of diſtinction, he declared, That he would make no other uſe of the authority, with which they were pleaſed to truſt him, than to prevent any further diſturbances in the republic, and to render, as far as in him lay, all the members of it happy. I ſhall not, ſaid he, renew the maſſacres of Sylla and Marius, which I cannot reflect on without horror. I wiſh I had been able to ſave the republic without ſhedding a drop of blood, and without depriving Rome of one ſingle citizen; but, ſince that was not in my power, now that my enemies are ſubdued, I will make no further uſe of the ſword; but endeavour to gain by good offices thoſe who ſtill continue obſtinate. You ſhall all find in me not a Marius or a Sylla, but an indulgent father and zealous protector. As for my troops, I ſhall keep them together, not ſo much for my own defence, as for that of the republic. They ſhall not, however, be any charge to you; the ſpoils I have brought with

with me from Africa, will be ſufficient to maintain them, and likewiſe to defray for ſome time the expences of the government. This ſpeech and the pardon he granted a few days after to M. Claudius Marcellus, one of his moſt inveterate enemies, calmed the fears both of the ſenate and people. Marcellus had been conſul five years before, and, during his conſulate, employed all his intereſt and authority againſt Cæſar. He had fought under Pompey's banners at Pharſalia; but, retiring after that fatal action from public affairs, he had choſen the city of Mitylene in the iſland of Leſbos for the place of his reſidence, and there led a quiet life, being entirely taken up with the ſtudy of philoſophy. Cicero, who had always profeſſed a ſtrict friendſhip for Marcellus, prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to intercede for him all in a body. Accordingly, the firſt time Cæſar appeared in the ſenate, Lucius Piſo having addreſſed him with an affecting ſpeech in favour of the illuſtrious exile, all the conſcript fathers ſeconded him, and, quitting their places, ſurrounded the dictator's tribunal, imploring his clemency in behalf of one of the moſt worthy members of their body. Cæſar heard them with great attention, and, as ſoon as they had done ſpeaking, "I willingly pardon Marcellus," ſaid he, "out "of regard to your interceſſion, conſcript fathers, and to "his own merit. Let him return and take his place in the "ſenate. I ſhall not for the future look upon him as an "enemy, but rank him among my friends, to convince the "world of the deference I pay to this venerable body." The conſcript fathers returned him thanks, and Cicero in particular, in that famous ſpeech, which is ſtill admired by all the learned. But Cæſar's clemency did not avail the unfortunate exile. Upon the firſt notice of what had paſſed at Rome, he left Mitylene, and came to Athens, with a deſign to paſs from thence over into Italy; but when he was ready to embarque, he was ſtabbed by one Magius Chilon, a no leſs zealous follower of Pompey than himſelf. What prompted him to this murder is not well known; ſome ſuſpected Cæſar of being privy to it; but that ſuſpicion ſeemed quite groundleſs to Cicero, ſince Magius with the ſame dagger put an end to his own life, and died on the ſpot with Marcellus (M).

THE dictator having, by his clemency and the extraordinary civility he ſhewed to all without diſtinction, delivered the ſenators from their fears, in the next place ſummoned the people, and, appearing in the aſſembly more like a common citizen, than a victorious general, returned them thanks, in a moſt obliging manner, for their inviolable attachment to his perſon. He then entertained them with a very particular account of his victories, telling them, That he had, by his laſt victory, ſubdued a country ſo rich, and of ſuch extent, that it would yearly ſupply the city with two hundred thouſand buſhels of corn, and three millions of meaſures of oil. In conſideration of the many conqueſts he had made, four triumphs were decreed him both by the ſenate and people. Accordingly he triumphed four times the ſame month, viz. over the Gauls, over Egypt, over Pharnaces, and over Juba. In the firſt triumph were carried before his chariot the names of three hundred nations and eight hundred cities, which he had reduced by the death of a million of enemies. Among the priſoners appeared Vercingetorix, who had ſtirred up all Gaul againſt Cæſar, and attempted to relieve Aleſia at the head of three hundred thouſand men. His ſoldiers followed him, crowned with laurel, and the whole city attended him with loud acclamations; but, in the midſt of the public rejoicings, the axletree of the triumphal chariot breaking near the temple of Fortune, the victor narrowly eſcaped being cruſhed by the wheels. The ſuperſtitious Romans drew from thence preſages no-ways favourable to the conqueror; but the only inconvenience that unforeſeen accident occaſioned then, was the retarding of the triumph till it was night; and then Cæſar, to prevent all diſturbances in the dark, embelliſhed his triumphal proceſſion with a new ornament, cauſing forty elephants to be ranged, twenty on each ſide of his chariot, with a prodigious number of flambeaux on their backs, diſpoſed in the ſhape of ſo many pyramids, which in a manner turned night into day, and

and conducted, without the leaſt confuſion, the numerous crowd to the capitol. There Cæſar, to ſet the people an example of religion, mounted the ſteps of the temple on his knees. After he had offered the uſual ſacrifice to Jupiter, he viewed the ſtatue, which the ſenate and people had erected to himſelf near that of the god; and being offended at the inſcription, "To Cæſar a demi-god," ordered the fulſome title of demi-god to be immediately cancelled. The ſecond triumph was over Egypt, when the pictures of Ptolemy, Photinus, and Achillas were carried before the triumphal chariot, with repreſentations of the cities of Peluſium and Alexandria, of the palace of the Egyptian kings, of the tower of Pharos, &c. Before the chariot walked many priſoners of diſtinction; among the reſt Arſinoe, the ſiſter of Cleopatra, loaded with chains; but, after the ſhew, ſhe was ſet at liberty, and only baniſhed from Egypt, that ſhe might not create new diſturbances in that kingdom to the prejudice of Cleopatra (N). The third triumph ſhewed the defeat of Pharnaces king of Pontus. In the midſt of the ſpoils, which the conqueror had brought from Pontus, Bithynia, and Galatia, the famous words Veni, vidi, vici, were carried on a table in large characters, to ſhew rather the diſpatch, than the difficulty or importance, of that victory. The ſubject of the fourth triumph was the conqueſt of Africa and Numidia, with the defeat of Juba and his allies. In this triumph Juba, the ſon of king Juba, who was then very young, walked among the other captives before the triumphal chariot; but when the ſhew was over, Cæſar ſet him at liberty, and gave him an education ſuitable to his rank, appointing maſters to teach him the Greek and Latin tongues, and ſuch ſciences as the young noblemen of Rome ſtudied in thoſe days. By this means he became one of the moſt learned men of the age he lived in; inſomuch, that the emperor Auguſtus, in conſideration of his great knowledge and abilities, afterwards beſtowed on him the kingdom of Getulia in Africa, and gave him in marriage Cleopatra Selene, the daughter of queen Cleopatra by Marc Antony (O). Romans were not ſo well pleaſed with this triumph as with the other three, Cæſar having cauſed the ſtatues of Scipio, Petreius, and Cato to be carried before him among thoſe of the ſovereign kings and princes whom he had ſubdued. They could not behold Cato tearing his bowels, as the ſtatue repreſented him, without expreſſing their concern with loud ſighs and tears for the death of ſo great a man. The veſſels of gold and ſilver, which in theſe triumphs were carried before the conqueror, amounted to the value of ſixty-five thouſand talents, that is, above twelve millions of our money, beſides eighteen hundred and twenty-two crowns of gold, weighing fifteen thouſand and thirty-three pounds, which were preſents made him, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, by princes and cities after his victories. Out of theſe ſums he paid his ſoldiers their arrears, and beſides, an hundred and fifty pounds of our money to every private man, as much more to each centurion, and thrice that ſum to each tribune and commander of the cavalry. As to the Roman people, whoſe favour he courted, he gave to each particular perſon ten buſhels of corn, ten meaſures of oil, and added a hundred denarii, by way of intereſt, to the three hundred he had promiſed them before he ſet out for Africa. After this he entertained the people at twenty-two thouſand tables with ſix thouſand murenas, and an incredible profuſion of other dainties and rich wines, which moſt of them had never taſted before; and that nothing might be wanting to the pomp and magnificence of theſe feaſts, he entertained the city with a combat of two thouſand gladiators, with repreſentations of ſea and land fights, in which were ſometimes three, ſometimes four thouſand combatants on a ſide, and with all ſorts of plays, farces, and mimic performances (P). Theſe entertainments laſted ſeveral days, and often quoted, and with great approbation, by the antients, but is now entirely loſt, as are alſo all his other works. One of them was of the affairs of Aſſyria, and chiefly collected from the writings of Beroſus.

(P) The two famous mimics, or, they were then called, pantomimes, Laberius and Publius, acted on this occaſion. Laberius was by birth a Roman knight, but nevertheleſs acted on the ſtage mimic pieces of his own compoſing. Cæſar rewarded him for acting in the plays, with which he preſented the people, giving him, when they were over, five hundred ſeſterces, and a golden ring, which was reſtoring him to the equeſtrian dignity he had forfeited by performing on the ſtage. Macrobius has given

CÆSAR, having by his largesses, entertainments, and shews, secured the affections of the soldiery and people, made it his whole business to reform the government, and establish good order in the city. In order to this he published many wholesome laws. In the first place, as many of the inhabitants had lost their lives in the civil war, and many had abandoned their native country; he appointed great privileges and exemptions for such as had numerous families, recalled all those who had settled in foreign countries, and invited to Rome from all parts given us part of a prologue of this author (37), which may serve for a taste of his wit and style. Horace indeed taxes his compositures with want of elegance (38). But Scaliger thinks the censure very unjust, and the verses cited by Macrobius more elegant than those in which Horace finds fault with them (39). When Laberius, was going, after he had received the golden ring of Cæsar, to resume his place among the knights, Cicero told him, as he passed by the orchestra, where the senators sat, that he would with all his heart make room for him there, but that he was already squeezed up himself; this he said in allusion to the many senators Cæsar had lately created, No wonder, replied Laberius, that you, who commonly make use of two seats at once, fancy yourself squeezed up, when you sit like other people. This was a severe wipe on the inconstancy and double-dealing of the orator (40).

Publius was a Syrian by birth, but received his education at Rome in the condition of a slave. Having by several specimens of wit obtained his freedom, he undertook the writing of mimic pieces, and acted them with uncommon applause in the towns of Italy. At last being brought to Rome to bear a part in Cæsar's plays, he challenged all the dramatic writers and actors, and carried the prize from every one of them, even from Laberius himself (41). A collection of sentences taken out of his works is still extant, which Joseph Scaliger highly commends, and even thought it worth his while to translate them into Greek.

parts of the world ſuch perſons as were in any repute for their learning and knowledge, granting them for their encouragement all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. At the ſame time he publiſhed a law, forbidding all citizens, above twenty years of age and under forty, to abſent themſelves from the capital more than three years, under any pretence whatſoever (Q). By other laws he reſtrained the profuſe way of living, which at that time prevailed in Rome and all over Italy; he confined the uſe of litters, of embroidered robes and jewels to perſons only of the firſt rank or of over-grown eſtates; he limited the expence of feaſts by many ſumptuary laws, which he cauſed to be put in execution with the utmoſt rigour, his officers often breaking into the houſes of the rich citizens, and ſnatching from off their tables ſuch meats as had been ſerved up contrary to his prohibition. All the markets ſwarmed with informers, ſo that nothing could be brought thither, or ſold, without his knowledge; and he never failed to puniſh with heavy fines ſuch as he found guilty of the leaſt breach of the laws he had enacted for the reſtraining of luxury. As for the management of the public money he reſerved that entirely to himſelf, but committed the adminiſtration of juſtice to the ſenators and knights, chuſing from among them ſuch perſons as were noted for their integrity and probity. (Q) Plutarch tells us, that Cæſar took a cenſus of the people, who from three hundred and twenty thouſand were now reduced to a hundred and fifty thouſand; ſo great a waſte, ſays he, had the civil war made in Rome alone; not to mention what the other parts of Italy and the provinces had ſuffered. But there are no fewer than three notorious miſtakes in this paſſage, as the learned Rualdus obſerves. The firſt is, where it is ſaid, that Cæſar took a cenſus of the people; Suetonius does not mention it, and Auguſtus himſelf in his Marmora Ancyriana ſays, that in the ſixth conſulate he numbered the people, which had not been done for forty-two years before. The ſecond is, that before the civil wars broke out between Cæſar and Pompey, the number of the people in Rome amounted to no more than three hundred and twenty thouſand; for long before that it was much greater, and had continued upon the encreaſe. The laſt is, where it is aſſerted, that in leſs than three years thoſe three hundred and twenty thouſand citizens were reduced by that war to an hundred and fifty thouſand; the falſity of which aſſertion is evident from this, that a little while after Cæſar made a draught of eighty thouſand to be ſent to foreign colonies. Is it probable, that he would have left portunity of uſurping an abſolute power, to prevent others from treading in his footſteps, he ordained by a law, that no prætor ſhould be continued in his government above a year, and no conſular above two. All the magiſtrates in Rome, as well as in the provinces, were appointed by him, the people, whom he ſuffered to aſſemble in the comitium, to maintain at leaſt ſome appearance of a republican ſtate, not daring to chuſe any but ſuch as he propoſed, or recommended; by which means all the places and governments were filled with his creatures. The tribunes, the prætors, the quæſtors, and even the conſuls, were all perſons who had ſerved under him, and were inviolably attached to his intereſt. The government of the countries ſubject to the republic was committed to ſuch only as the dictator thought he could confide in. Thus Sicily was allotted to A. Allienus, Ciſalpine Gaul to M. Junius Brutus, Tranſalpine Gaul to another Junius Brutus, ſurnamed Albinus, Achaia to Servius Sulpicius, Numidia to Criſpus Salluſtius, Illyricum to P. Vatinius, Syria to Q. Cornificius, and Spain to Q. Caſſius Longinus; ſo that the abſolute authority of Cæſar ſeemed to be equally eſtabliſhed in the capital and in the moſt diſtant provinces. In Syria indeed his power was diſputed by one Cæcilius Baſſus, who created great diſorders in that province. He was a Roman knight, and had fought on Pompey's ſide in the battle of Pharſalia. After that overthrow he fled to Tyre, and there, pretending to be a merchant, underhand engaged in his party many who had been favourers of Pompey, and even ſome of left no more than ſeventy thouſand ſouls in Rome? But what is ſtill ſtronger, eighteen years after, Auguſtus took an account of the people, and found the number amount to four millions and ſixty-three thouſand, "cenſere civium Romanorum capita quadragies cen- "tum millia, & ſexaginta tria millia," ſays Suetonius. Such an encreaſe in ſo ſhort a time muſt be prodigious, if not impoſſible Rualdus has not only diſcovered theſe miſtakes, but the ſource o them; he makes it appear, that Plutarch, for want of a thorough underſtanding of the latin tongue, has been miſled by the following paſſage in Suetonius, who ſays of Cæſar "recenſum populi ne "more, nec loco ſolito, ſed vicatim per dominos inſularum egit "atque ex viginti trecentiſque millibus accipientium frumentum "publico ad centum quinquginta retraxit (42)." Suetonius ſpeak there of the review taken by Cæſar of the nedy citizens, wh ſhared in the public corn, whom he found to amount to three hun dred and twenty thouſand, and reduced to an hundred and twent thouſand. Plutarch miſtook recenſum for cenſum the muſter take by the cenſors, and this error led him into the other miſtakes.

of the Roman ſoldiers who were ſent thither to garriſon the city. Whereupon being at length taken notice of by Sextus Cæſar, whom the dictator had appointed governor of that province, as he haſtened northward againſt Pharnaces, he was ſummoned to appear before him, and give an account of his proceedings. Baſſus, without betraying the leaſt fear, told the governor, that he was raiſing volunteers, and making other preparations with no other deſign but to aſſiſt Mithridates of Pergamus in the reduction of the kingdom of Pergamus, which had been given him by Cæſar. Sextus believing him, he was diſmiſſed, and no more taken notice of, till having got together a conſiderable number of conſpirators, he ſeized on the city of Tyre, giving out, that Cæſar was killed in Africa, and that thereupon he was appointed by the ſenate preſident of Syria. By this impoſture he encreaſed his forces ſo as to be able to take the field, and engage Cæſar; but he was entirely defeated, and forced to take ſhelter in Tyre. There he continued inactive, till the many wounds he had received in the battle were cured; and then by his emiſſaries ſtirred up the troops under the command of Cæſar, who was given to all manner of lewdneſs, to rebel againſt their leader and murder him. Upon his death, the troops he commanded joined Baſſus, excepting a ſmall body that retired into Cilicia. Baſſus ſeeing himſelf again at the head of a conſiderable army, marched ſtrait to Apamea, and ſeizing that city, fortified it, and made it the place of his reſidence, there taking on him the government of the whole province. But Antiſtius Verus putting himſelf at the head of thoſe who had retreated into Cilicia, and drawing to him ſeveral others of the Cæſarean party in that country, marched back with them into Syria. There he was joined by the ſons of Antipater with auxiliaries from Judæa, and by ſeveral of the neighbouring princes, who were glad of an opportunity to ſhew their attachment to the dictator, and by that means gain his favour. Thus Antiſtius was enabled to make head againſt Baſſus, and even to drive him quite out of the field. He retreated to Apamea, where he was cloſely beſieged by Antiſtius; but, as he was a brave ſoldier and experienced commander, his adverſary, having ſpent the whole ſummer before the place without being able to gain any advantage over him, was forced towards the end of the campaign to raiſe the ſiege and forbear all hoſtilities, till he received new ſupplies both of men and proviſions [z].

CÆSAR, being informed of what paſſed in Syria, immediately diſpatched Statius Murcus, whom Joſephus through miſtake names Marcus, to ſucceed Sextus in the government of Syria, appointing him three legions to put an end to that unexpected war. Theſe, with the troops which Antiſtius commanded, formed a very conſiderable army; ſo that Baſſus was again obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Apamea, the ſiege of which place was renewed by the united forces of Murcus and Antiſtius. During the ſiege, both ſides ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the neigbouring princes and ſtates. Alcaudonius an Arabian king, being on this occaſion ſent to both by Baſſus and Murcus, came with all his forces, and placing himſelf between Apamea and the camp of the Cæſareans that covered the ſiege, offered his aſſiſtance, by way of auction, to that ſide which ſhould give moſt for it; and Baſſus having bid higheſt, he immediately joined him. At the ſame time Pacorus came to his aſſiſtanceat the head of a numerous body of Parthians; which two reinforcements added ſuch ſtrength to the beſieged, that the Cæſareans were again forced to raiſe the ſiege, and leave Baſſus maſter of the field [a]. Hereupon the dictator ſent orders to Q. Martius Criſpus, governor of Bithynia, to march with the three legions he had under his command, to the aſſiſtance of Murcus, and at his approach Baſſus retired to Apamea, where he was cloſely beſieged the third time, but held out till the death of Cæſar, when he was relieved by Caſſius, who ſeized on the province of Syria, as we ſhall relate in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Cæſar reforms the kalendar.

WHILE the dictator's lieutenants were thus employed in the eaſt, the dictator himſelf, to ſhew that nothing eſcaped his care, undertook at Rome the reformation of the Roman kalendar, which it belonged to him to rectify as pontifex maximus, an office he had bore long before he was either conſul or dictator. This reformation was at this time much wanted; for by reaſon of the faults of the former kalendar the feſtivals of the Romans and their ſolemn days were removed by degrees, and put out of due time, till at laſt they came to fall in with ſeaſons quite oppoſite to thoſe of their primitive inſtitution. The year which the Romans made uſe of till this time conſiſted of twelve lunar months; but twelve lunar months falling eleven days ſhort of a ſolar year, it was the office of the pontifex maximus with the college of the pontifices to add ſuch intercalations as ſhould make all even. This they uſually did by caſting in an intercalary month every two years, which alternatively conſiſted of twenty-two and twenty-three three days. This ſhort month is called by Plutarch in one place Mercidinus [b], and in another Mercidonius [c]. The place it was allotted in the Roman kalendar was between the 23d and 24th of February. But the care of this intercalation being left to the pontifices, they put in or left out the intercalary month according as they had a mind to prolong or ſhorten the time of the annual magiſtrates then in office; by which means great diſorders crept into the political as well as the aſtronomical year; to prevent which Cæſar undertook that reformation, of which the world has had the benefit ever ſince, and happily completed it (R).

[b] Plut. in Numa. [c] Idem in Cæſ.

(R) This he did by the following methods: 1ſt, He aboliſhed the lunar year, conſiſting of twelve lunar months, or three hundred and fifty-five days, by which the Romans had hitherto computed their time; and introduced the uſe of the ſolar year, conſiſting of the time in which the ſun goes through the Zodiac, and comes about again to the ſame point, whence his courſe began. 2dly, having, according to the beſt obſervations of thoſe times, concluded this revolution to be made in three hundred and ſixty-five days and ſix hours; of theſe he made his ſolar year to conſiſt. 3dly, Theſe three hundred and ſixty-five days he diſtributed into twelve artificial, inſtead of lunar, months before in uſe, ſome of them conſiſting of thirty-one days, ſome of thirty, and one, that is, February, of twenty eight. 4thly, The ſix hours over and above in four years making a day, he made every fifth year to conſiſt of three hundred and ſixty-ſix days, and this is what we call the "Leap year." 5thly, This day he added between the 23d and 24th day of February, in the ſame place in the Roman kalendar, where formerly the intercalary month Mercidinus had been inſerted. As this addition was made by putting the latter of thoſe days, which was called Sextus Kalendas, twice in the kalendar, the year was thence called by the Latins Annus Biſſextilis, the Biſſextile Year. But we, inſtead of putting the 24th day of February twice in the biſſextile or leap year, number on the days, ſo as to make the month conſiſt of twenty-nine. 6thly, Cæſar began this year on the kalends or firſt day of January, becauſe on that day the annual magiſtrates of Rome entered on their offices. 7thly, The firſt of January he then fixed to the winter ſolſtice; but it has now over-run that time ſeveral days, by reaſon that the Julian ſolar year is eleven minutes longer than the natural ſolar year. 8thly, To bring this reformation into practice, beſides the month Mercidinus, which was inſerted in February, as uſual, Cæſar added to this preſent year two months more, which he put

YET ſo commendable and uſeful a work gave offence to ſome, who envied his grandeur, and were weary of his power. They took occaſion from thence to ſay, that after he had triumphed over the earth, he had a mind to govern likewiſe in heaven. It is no ſtrange thing to hear ignorant people talk at that rate; but that Cicero, who had long before tranſlated Aratus, and conſequently ought to have been better acquainted than any with the diſorders of the former calculation, could be guilty of ſuch a weakneſs, is ſurpriſing. Yet the orator made the reformation of the kalendar the ſubject of ſeveral ſevere jeſts. As one chanced to ſay in his company, that the next morning the Lyra would riſe, "Yes," replied Cicero, "by Cæſar's order," inſinuating thereby, that the dictator pretended to ſubject even the celeſtial bodies to his power. But Cæſar, who knew better than Cicero, what advantages would accrue to poſterity from ſo uſeful an undertaking, in between the months of November aud December; ſo that this year, thereby conſiſts of four hundred and forty-five days, viz. three hundred and fifty-five days for the common Roman year, twenty-three for the month Mercidinus, and ſixty ſeven for the other months added between November and December; ſo that this year, which was the longeſt the Romans had ever had, putting their affairs out of their uſual order, was called by them the year of confuſion. In the ſettling of this point Cæſar made uſe of the aſſiſtance of Soſigenes, an aſtronomer of Alexandria, for the aſtronomical calculations, and of Flavius a ſcribe, for the forming and digeſting of them into a kalendar, according to the Roman manner, that is, in diſtributing the days of each month into their Kalends, Ides, and Nones, and fixing the feſtivals, and other ſolemn times, to the days on which they were to be obſerved. But the pontifices, who had been the authors of the old confuſion, not well underſtanding the new computation, inſtead of interpoſing the leap day after every fourth year in the beginning of the fifth, put it in after the third in the beginning of the fourth, which diſorder was continued for thirty-ſix years following; by which means twelve years having been made leap years inſtead of nine, the error was at length perceived. Hereupon Auguſtus, who ſucceeded Julius Cælar, to bring matters into the right courſe again, ordered, that for the twelve years next enſuing no leap year ſhould be made: whereby the three ſupernumerary days, which had been erroneouſly caſt in, being again dropped, this way of computing has been obſerved ever ſince without any alteration, except that made by Gregory XIII. which we have mentioned above.

taking, and what glory to himself, thought it beneath him to take any notice of such low jests [c].

WHILE Cæsar was thus employed at Rome in works of peace, the two sons of Pompey, having assembled beyond the Pyrenees such of their father's party as had escaped from the battles of Pharsalia and Thapsus, made themselves masters of great part of Spain. The Spaniards, who had formerly served under their father, flocked to them from all parts; insomuch, that they soon saw themselves at the head of a very numerous army, composed partly of Romans, and partly of the natives of the country. They had likewise experienced officers, and among the rest Labienus, who had learnt the art of war under Cæsar himself, and had on many occasions given signal proofs both of his courage and the wisdom of his conduct. Cæsar had indeed after the conquest of Africa dispatched first Caius Didius into Spain, to oppose the progress of the two young generals in that country, and after him Q. Fabius Maximus and Q. Pædius, two of his lieutenants, with such a body of troops, as he thought sufficient to keep the Spaniards in awe. But the republican party, being favoured by the natives, had gained the ascendant over them, made themselves masters of several cities, and obliged the Cæsareans to shut themselves up in their strong-holds. The dictator's presence was therefore necessary; and accordingly he resolved to go in person, and put a stop to their further progress. But, before he left Rome, he assembled the comitia, and having caused himself to be chosen consul the fourth time, as dictator he appointed M. Æmilius Lepidus, whom the tribes had given him for his collegue, his general of the horse. All the inferior offices were filled with his friends and creatures, no one daring to oppose the election of such as he thought fit to recommend to the assembled tribes; for though he pretended to allow them the liberty of chusing whom they pleased, yet to each tribe in particular he wrote in the following terms; "Cæsar recommends such a person to such a tribe, and begs "they would oblige him so far as to chuse him." This recommendation from Cæsar was in reality an order, which no one had courage enough to dispute or oppose; so that all the power and authority of the republic being lodged in the hands of such persons as were entirely addicted to him, he had no reason to apprehend the least disturbance in the capital during his absence. Having thus settled matters, Cæsar took his leave of Cleopatra, whom he had invited to Rome, and kept

He ſets out for Spain.

In his own houſe during her abode in that city, and ſetting out for Spain about the beginning of this year, which was the firſt Julian year, he arrived in twenty-four days in the province of Bœtica. There he aſſembled what troops were quartered in that and the neighbouring provinces, and, putting himſelf at their head, marched without loſs of time towards Corduba, hoping to ſurprize Sextus, the younger of the two Pompeys, who was then quartered in that city. But he, having timely notice of Cæſar's arrival and deſign, immediately diſpatched an expreſs to his brother Cneius, who was then beſieging the city of Ulla, acquainting him with the danger that threatened him, and entreating him to break up the ſiege, and haſten with all his forces to his aſſiſtance. Cneius had reduced the place to the laſt extremity, and was then preparing for a general aſſault; but the unexpected arrival of the dictator, and the danger his brother was in, made him drop the enterpriſe and fly to Corduba. Cæſar, having upon his arrival attempted in vain to draw him to a battle, decamped in the night, and went to inveſt the city of Ategua, about ſixteen miles from Corduba, which the republican party had made their place of arms. Thither Cneius followed him, and encamped on ſome hills at a ſmall diſtance from Cæſar's intrenchments, with a deſign to cut off his communication with the neighbouring country, and by that means oblige him tc raiſe the ſiege. But the dictator, notwitſtanding the many and almoſt unſurmountable difficulties he had to ſtruggle with, purſued his point with a conſtancy and reſolu ion peculiar to himſelf. The beſieged defended themſelves with incredible bravery; but being at length reduced to the utmoſt extremity, the garriſon, which conſiſted moſtly of Romans, reſolved to cut the throats of all the inhabitants, ſet fire to the city, and attempt by a general ſally to force the enemy's lines, and retire to Cneius's camp which was in ſight of the city. The cruel maſſacre was put in execution; but the garriſon, after having attempted in vain to make their way through Cæſar's camp, were driven back into the town with great ſlaughter. At length L. Minutius Flaccus, who commanded in the city and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, during the ſiege, in a moſt eminent manner, ſurrendered the place upon honourable terms, and put Cæſar in poſſeſſion of the few magazines which the flames had ſpared. From Ategue Cæſar marched to Buriavolis, which he ſurprized, and put great numbers of the inhabitants to the ſword, for having cruelly maſſacred ſuch of their countrymen as had adviſed them to ſurrender. After the reduction of theſe two places, Cæſar marched to find out the enemy, and force them to a general engagement. They were encamped in the neighbourhood of Ucubis, now Lucubi, according to Mariana, in the kingdom of Grenade. Cæſar poſted himſelf at a ſmall diſtance from the enemy's camp, which gave occaſion to daily ſkirmiſhes, in one of which Cæſar's cavalry was put to the rout, and defeated with great ſlaughter. Pompey was ſo elated with this advantage, that he reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a general action. He even wrote to his friends, that Cæſar had with him only raw and unexperienced ſoldiers, that he apprehended he would never venture an engagement ſo long as he could avoid it, but that he would find means to force him to it. In order to this, he marched towards the city of Hiſpalis, now Seville, and from thence advanced into the plains of Munda (S), and encamped there. Cæſar was no ſooner informed of the enemy's motions, than he decamped, and after two days eaſy march appeared with his army in the ſame plain where Pompey was encamped. As the enemy were very impatient to come to an engagement, the very next morning they drew up their army by break of day; but had the precaution to poſt themſelves advantageouſly on a riſing ground, whereof one ſide was defended by the city of Munda, and the other by a ſmall river, which watered the plain, and by a marſh, ſo that the enemy could not attack them but in front. Cæſar likewiſe drew up his troops with great art, and, having advanced a little way from his camp, ordered his troops to halt, expecting the enemy would abandon their advantageous poſt and come to meet him. But, as they did not ſtir, Cæſar made as if he intended to fortify himſelf in that poſt, which induced the young general, who looked upon this as a ſign of fear, to advance into the plain, and attack the enemy before they could ſecure themſelves with any works. Pompey's army was by far the moſt numerous; for it conſiſted of thirteen legions, ſix thouſand horſe, and an incredible number of auxiliaries, amongſt whom were all the forces of Bocchus king of Mauritania, commanded by his two ſons, both youths of great valour and bravery. Cæſar had eighty cohorts,

It was in former times a place of great note, but is at preſent, as Mariana informs us, a ſorry village known by its antient name.

horts, three legions, viz. the third, the fifth, and the tenth, and a body of eight thouſand horſe. As the enemy drew near, Cæſar betrayed a great deal of uneaſineſs and concern, as if he were doubtful of the ſucceſs, knowing he was to engage men no ways inferior in valour and experience to his own, and commanded by officers, who had on many occaſions given ſignal proofs of their bravery and conduct. Cneius, the elder of the two brothers, was generally looked upon as an able commander, and Labienus eſteemed ſcarce inferior to Cæſar himſelf. However, the dictator, deſirous to put an end to the civil war, either by his own death or that of his rivals, gave the ſignal for the battle, and fell upon the enemy with his uſual vigour and reſolution. At the firſt onſet, which was dreadful, the auxiliaries on both ſides betook themſelves to flight, leaving the Romans to decide their quarrel by themſelves. Then the legionaries engaged with a fury hardly to be expreſſed; Cæſar's men being encouraged by the hopes of putting an end to all their labours by this battle, and thoſe of Pompey exerting themſelves out of neceſſity and deſpair, ſince moſt of them expected no quarter, as having been formerly pardoned when defeated under Afranius and Petreius. Never was victory more obſtinately diſputed. Cæſar's men, who had been always uſed to conquer, found themſelves ſo vigorouſly charged by the enemy's legionaries, that they began to give ground; and though they did not turn their backs, yet it was manifeſt that ſhame alone kept them in their poſts. All authors agree, that Cæſar had never been in ſo great danger; and he himſelf, when he came back to his camp, told his friends, that he had often fought for victory, but this was the firſt time he had ever fought for life. Thinking himſelf abandoned by fortune, which had hitherto favoured him, he had ſome thoughts of ſtabbing himſelf with his own ſword, and by a voluntary death preventing the diſgrace of a defeat. But returning ſoon to himſelf, and concluding it would be more to his reputation to fall by the enemy's hand at the head of his troops, than, in a fit of deſpair, by his own, he diſmounted from his horſe, and ſnatching a buckler from one of his legionaries, he threw himſelf, like a man in deſpair, into the midſt of the enemy; crying out to his men, "Are you not aſhamed to deliver your ge"neral into the hands of boys?" At theſe words the ſoldiers of the tenth legion, animated by the example of their general, fell upon the enemy with freſh vigour, and made a dreadful havock of them. But, in ſpight of their utmoſt efforts, forts, Pompey's men ſtill kept their ground, and, though greatly fatigued, returned the charge with equal vigour. Then the Cæſareans began to deſpair of victory, and the dictator, running through the ranks of his diſheartened legionaries, had much ado to keep them together. The battle had already laſted from the riſing to the ſetting of the ſun, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. At length a mere accident decided the diſpute in favour of the dictator. Bogud, a petty king of Mauritania, of whom we have ſpoke above, had joined Cæſar ſoon after his arrival in Spain with ſome ſquadrons of Numidian horſe; but in the very beginning of the battle, being terrified at the ſhouting of the ſoldiers intermingled with groans and the claſhing of their arms, he had abandoned his poſt, and retired with the auxiliaries under his command to a riſing ground at a ſmall diſtance from the enemy's camp. There he continued the whole day an idle ſpectator of the battle that was fought in the plain. But towards the evening, partly out of ſhame, and partly out of compaſſion on his friend Cæſar, he reſolved to fall upon Pompey's camp, and accordingly flew thither with all the forces he had with him. Labienus, appriſed of his deſign, haſtened after him, to the defence of the camp; which Cæſar obſerving, cried to his legionaries, "Courage, fellow-"ſoldiers, the victory at length is ours; Labienus flies. This artifice had the deſired effect: Cæſar's men, believing that Labienus was truly fled, made a laſt effort, and charged the wing he commanded ſo briskly, that after a moſt obſtinate diſpute they put them to flight. Though the enemy's left wing was thus entirely defeated, the right, where the elder Pompey commanded, ſtill kept their ground for ſome time. Pompey, diſmounting from his horſe, fought on foot like a private man in the firſt line, till, moſt of his legionaries being killed, he was forced to ſave himſelf by flight from falling into the enemy's hands. Part of his troops fled back to their camp, and part took ſhelter in the city of Munda. The camp was immediately attacked and taken ſword in hand; and as for the city, Cæſar without loſs of time drew a line of circumvallation round it. Such was the ever-memorable battle of Munda, which gave the finiſhing ſtroke to the Roman republic, and raiſed Cæſar to the higheſt pitch of power and glory, no one daring from this time diſpute his authority. This victory was gained on the ſixteenth of the kalends of April, that is, according to our way of counting, on the ſeventeenth day of March, when the Dionyſian feſtival, or the Liberalia, were celebrated at Rome (T), the very day, as Plutarch obſerves, in which Pompey the Great four years before had ſet out for the war. In this action Pompey loſt thirty thouſand men, among whom were the famous Labienus, Attius Varus, and three thouſand Roman knights. Seventeen officers of diſtinction were taken, and all the enemy's eagles and enſigns together with Pompey's faſces, which he had aſſumed as governor of Spain. On Cæſar's ſide only a thouſand men were killed, and five hundred wounded [d].

THE battle being over, Cæſar in the firſt place compleated his lines about Munda, uſing, inſtead of earth, the dead bodies of the enemy, which covered the plain, and raiſing them up in heaps, ſo as to equal the height of the walls. This ſight filled Cæſar with horror, who thereupon committed the carrying on of the ſiege to Fabius Maximus, one of his lieutenants, and, having cauſed the bodies of Attius Varus and Labienus to be honourably interred, abandoned the plain of Munda, and marched towards Corduba, expecting to find there the heads of the contrary party, who had diſappeared after the battle. But he was diſappointed; for the elder Pompey fled with a hundred and fifty horſe from the field

(T) Plutarch tells us, that this battle was won on the Dionyſian feſtival, τῇ τῶν Διονυσίων ἑορτῇ, ſays that writer; which paſſage, as madam Dacier rightly obſerves, moſt interpreters have groſly miſtaken. The old Latin verſion, ſays ſhe, has it thus: "hanc "victoriam obtinuit ſaturnalibus," this victory was gained on the feſtival of Saturn. The Dionyſia and Saturnalia were two very different feſtivals. Others, who have tranſlated it into the modern languages, have rendered it by the feaſt of the Bacchanals. How could Cæſar gain a victory on the day of a feſtival, which had been aboliſhed a hundred and forty-one years before, and ſuppreſſed throughout all Italy by an order of the ſenate, on account of its abominations, as we are informed by Livy (43)? Plutarch by the Dionyſia means that feaſt which is called by the Romans Liberalia, and ſtands in their kalendar againſt the 17th of March. Liberalia, ſays Feſtus, "Liberi Feſta, quæ apud Græcos dicuntur Dionyſia." As Liber and Dionyſius are two names of Bacchus, this is what has miſled thoſe interpeters, and made them believe, though very abſurdly, that the feaſt, called Liberalia, was the ſame with the Bacchanalia. Thus far the learned madam Dacier.

field of battle towards his navy, which lay at Carteia, a city about a hundred and seventy miles distant from Corduba. The inhabitants opened their gates to him; but were no sooner informed of the success of the battle at Munda, than they sent deputies to Cæsar, acquainting him, that they had secured Pompey. But, as a good number of the inhabitants still remained in Pompey's interest, the place was divided into two factions, which carried their animosities so far as to engage each other in the streets, and fill the city with blood and slaughter. In one of these tumultuary actions Pompey himself received several wounds; but having nevertheless, after a warm dispute, made himself master of one of the gates, he escaped to his fleet, and, hoisting sail, put to sea with thirty galleys. But Didius, who commanded Cæsar's fleet at Gades, upon notice of his weighing anchor immediately put to sea after him, having first taken on board a considerable body of horse as well as foot, in case there should be occasion to pursue the enemy by land. After four days sail he came up with their galleys, and surprising them, while both the soldiers and mariners were employed ashore in procuring necessary provisions, which they had not had time to take in at Carteia, he burnt several of them, took the rest, and by that means cut off the enemy's retreat by sea. Pompey, seeing himself thus unexpectedly deprived of his fleet, endeavoured to save himself by flight cross the mountains. But, as he had been dangerously wounded at Carteia in his shoulder and left leg, and besides had now the misfortune, as all things seemed to conspire against him, to put his ancle out of joint, which obliged him to be carried in a litter, the enemy's horse, who had been put on board for that particular service, soon came up with him. upon their approach, the unfortunate Roman discovering a castle on a steep hill at a small distance, retired thither with the few troops that attended him. The Cæsareans, under the command of Cesennius Lento, immediately attacked the place, hoping to carry it by assault, but were repulsed by a shower of darts, and pursued in their retreat with great slaughter. Hereupon Didius began to besiege the castle in a regular manner, and to draw a line of circumvallation round it; which so terrified Pompey's men, that they resolved to quit the place and abandon their leader, who was not in a condition to follow them, to the mercy of the enemy. Accordingly they made a sally, but were for the most part cut off in their retreat. Pompey retired with the rest, but not being able to keep pace with them them by reaſon of his wounds, he concealed himſelf in a cave, where he was betrayed by ſome of his own ſoldiers, and delivered up to the Cæſareans, who immediately put him to death. Thus periſhed the elder Pompey, after having exerted his utmoſt efforts to revenge the death of his father, and ſave his country from impending ruin. He had never before commanded in chief; but nevertheleſs, in this firſt eſſay, as we may call it, performed ſuch wonders, as forced Cæſar to own, that he had never encountered a more formidable enemy. As for the younger brother, ſome writers tell us that he was not preſent at the battle of Munda, but remained in Corduba to defend that important place in caſe of any misfortune; others ſay, that he retired to Corduba after the action. However that be, he was no ſooner acquainted with the melancholy news of the defeat of his brother, than he divided what money he had among the cavalry who attended him, and giving out that he was going to meet Cæſar and treat with him about an accommodation, he left the city, fled in diſguiſe to Celtiberia, and joining the banditti of that country, concealed himſelf ſo well, that Cæſar could never diſcover him [e].

BUT, to return to Cæſar. The battle being over and the lines about Munda completed; he marched to Corduba, which was defended by a body of troops that had eſcaped the ſlaughter, under the command of one Scapula, a zealous republican. Upon Cæſar's approach, Scapula armed all the ſlaves and vagabonds, who were very numerous in that great city, and leaving the thirteenth legion in the place, marched out at the head of that undiſciplined multitude, and poſſeſſed himſelf of a bridge. As Cæſar's army drew near, the rabble inſulted them, aſking them, whither they deſigned to fly, as if they had been the army defeated. But Cæſar not thinking it adviſeable to force the poſt, deſpiſed their bravadoes, and taking a long compaſs, paſſed the river without oppoſition, and appeared before Corduba. Hereupon Scapula, giving all up for loſt, retired into the city, and calling together his friends, gave them a ſumptuous entertainment; which being ended, he put on his beſt apparel, diſtributed what money he had among his attendants, and then aſcending a funeral pile, which he had prepared, he ordered one of his catamites to diſpatch him, while another put fire to the pile, which ſoon reduced his body to aſhes. Upon Scapula's death the city city was divided into two factions; ſome were for ſurrendering, others for ſtanding a ſiege; but the former prevailing, deputies were ſent to Cæſar, who got poſſeſſion of one of the gates. Hereupon the thirteenth legion, which had been always greatly attached to Pompey, began to ſet fire to the houſes, chuſing rather to periſh with the city, than fall into the hands of the conqueror. This occaſioned a bloody battle betwen them and the Cæſareans, in which moſt of the legionaries, with about twelve thouſand of the inhabitants were killed upon the ſpot. Cæſar, having thus made himſelf maſter of Corduba, at that time the capital of Bœtica, marched from thence to Hiſpalis, now Seville. On his march he was met by Ceſennius, who gave him an account of the tragical end of the elder Pompey, and at the ſame time preſented to him the young Roman's head, which, ſome writers ſay [f], he expoſed to public view, while the other tell us, that he cauſed it to be honourably interred [g]. As he drew near Hiſpalis, he was met by deputies from the city, who acquainted him with the diviſions that reigned in the place, and entreated him to ſend with them a detachment and an experienced commander, to keep the adverſe party in awe. Cæſar readily complied with their requeſt, and granted them Caninius Rebilius with ſome manipuli, who entered the town without oppoſition. But, in the mean time, Pompey's friends privately diſpatched one Philo, a zealous aſſerter of their party, into Luſitania, where he was well known, to beg aſſiſtance of Cæcilius Niger, who ſtill ſupported Pompey's intereſt there at the head of a conſiderable number of the natives. Philo ſoon returned with a numerous body of Luſitanians, and, being let into the city in the night, fell unexpectedly on the Cæſareans, and cut them all off to a man. Hereupon Cæſar immediately inveſted the town; but, in drawing the lines of circumvallation, left ſeveral open places for the Luſitanians to make their eſcape, leſt deſpair ſhould prompt them to ſet fire to the houſes and demoliſh the walls. At the ſame time he placed ſquadrons of horſe on all the roads that led from the city, ordering them to conceal themſelves till the Luſitanians appeared, and then, falling upon them, give them no quarter. They held out a long time with great obſtinacy and reſolution; but at length made a ſally, and got ſafe beyond Cæſar's lines through the paſſages that had been left for that purpoſe. But while they thought themſelves out of danger, they were all on a ſudden attacked by the Cæſarean cavalry, and put to the

the ſword, not one of them eſcaping the general ſlaughter. Cæſar, having thus recovered Hiſpalis, marched towards Aſta (U), the inhabitants of which city ſent embaſſadors to meet him, and deliver him the keys of their town. There he received the malancholy news of the death of Didius his admiral, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf on all occaſions in a very eminent manner. After he had deſtroyed Pompey's fleet, as we have related above, he cauſed his veſſels to be hauled on ſhore to be refitted, and, in the mean time, retired to a neighbouring caſtle, where he was unexpectedly attacked by a body of Luſitanians, who had eſcaped from the battle of Munda. The Roman admiral defended the place with great bravery; but the Luſitanians having ſet fire to his ſhips, he made a ſally, and marched in good order to the ſea-ſide, hoping to repulſe the enemy and preſerve his navy. While his men were buſy in extinguiſhing the flames, a body of Luſitanians, who had concealed themſelves among the buſhes, ſtarting up, attacked him in the rear, and cut off his retreat to the caſtle, while two other numerous bodies fell upon him, the one in flank, and the other in front. Didius, thus inveſted on all ſides, behaved with ſingle bravery; but was, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, overpowered, and with moſt of his men cut in pieces. Cæſar's concern for the loſs of ſo brave an officer was in great meaſure allayed, by the agreeable news he received at the ſame time of the ſurrender of Munda, after a long and cloſe ſiege. When the beſieged ſaw themſelves reduced to the utmoſt extremity, they deſerted in great numbers to Cæſar, by whom they were kindly received, and incorporated among his troops. But before they came over, it was agreed between them and their friends in the city, that upon a certain ſignal the latter ſhould make a vigorous ſally, while the deſerters did what execution they could in the camp. This plot being very ſeaſonably diſcovered the night before it was to be put in execution, the private men were by Fabius's orders decimated, and all the officers executed without diſtinction. Soon after, the beſieged made a ſally with a deſign to force their way through the enemy's works; works; but moſt of them having loſt their lives in the attempt, Fabius at length carried the place by aſſault. From Munda he marched ſtrait to Urſaon, a place equally fortified by art and nature, laid ſiege to it, and obliged the inhabitants to receive the yoke, after they had for ſome time defended the place with incredible bravery. And now Cæſar, having reduced all the places which had declared for Pompey, and exacted immēnſe contributions from the Spaniards under pretence of puniſhing their rebellion, retired to Hiſpalis; whence, to give new marks of his eſteem for Cicero, he wrote a conſolatory letter to him on occaſion of the death of his beloved daughter Tullia, who died at Rome in childbed, while her huſband P. Cornelius Dolabella was attending Cæſar in Spain. This letter, as appears from Cicero's works, was wrote the day before the kalends of May: and a few days after Cæſar left Hiſpalis, and marched with the beſt part of his army to New Carthage; where he was met by deputies from moſt cities of Spain, with whom he ſettled the affairs of the two Spaniſh provinces, and then embarqued for Rome, having finiſhed in ſeven months an expedition, which few generals would have completed in as many years [h].

And Urſaon.

CÆSAR reached Rome in the beginning of October, and entered the city in triumph, which diſpleaſed the Romans beyond any thing he had yet done. They could not brook his triumphing over the calamities of his country, and his rejoycing for an advantage, which he ought rather to have deplored, and for which no better appology could be made, than that he was abſolutely compelled to it. What made his triumph look ſtill more diſtaſteful was, that he had never before acquainted the ſenate by any letter or expreſs of the victories he had obtained in the courſe of the civil wars; but ſeemed rather to be aſhamed of the action, than to claim any glory that might ariſe to him from it. Cæſar, not contented with having triumphed himſelf, beſtowed the ſame honour on two of his lieutenants, Q. Fabius Maximus and Q. Pedius, but with this difference, that the repreſentations of the cities, rivers, &c. carried before Cæſar, were of ivory; whereas thoſe that were made uſe of in the triumphs of his lieutenants were of common wood; which made a humorous Greek, by name Chryſippus, ſay, by way of raillery, that the ſtatues carried before Fabius and Pedius were only the the caſes of thoſe which Cæſar had diſplayed in his triumph [i]. However, the Romans, taking the ſame ſide with fortune, began to heap new honours upon the conqueror, and thoſe greater than any they had yet beſtowed. Cicero indeed propoſed in the ſenate, the conferring of ſuch honours on him, as were in ſome meaſure within the bounds of modeſty; but others, ſtriving who ſhould deſerve moſt, carried them ſo high, that they made Cæſar odious even to the moſt indifferent and moderate ſort of men. They made him dictator for life, ſubjected all magiſtrates, even the tribunes of the people, to his power, decreed, that he alone ſhould levy troops, command armies, declare war, make peace, take charge of the public money, and that all inferior magiſtrates ſhould oblige themſelves by oath to obſerve whatever decrees he ſhould think fit to enact. Among other titles, that of imperator was given him, not in that ſenſe in which it had been formerly beſtowed on generals after ſome ſignal victory, but as it imported the greateſt power and authority in the commonwealth. From him was derived the name of imperator or emperor, and likewiſe that of Cæſar to his ſucceſſors; and this was the beginning of the imperial ſtate of Rome, though it was not ſettled till ſome years after. His enemies are thought to have had ſome ſhare in the extraordinary honours conferred on him, as well as his flatterers, ſince they took from thence an opportunity of calumniating him, and alienating from him the minds of ſuch as were friends to the antient form of government. On the other hand, Cæſar made it his whole ſtudy to gain the affections even of his moſt inveterate enemies; he not only pardoned all thoſe who had borne arms againſt him, but on ſeveral of them beſtowed honours and offices; inſomuch, that the ſenate and people, to teſtify their gratitude to him for the mild uſe he made of his power, decreed a temple to Clemency. As the people ſtill retained an affection for Pompey, he ordered all the ſtatues of that great man, which had been thrown down, to be ſet up again; upon which Cicero ſaid, that by raiſing Pompey's ſtatues he had fixed his own. To gain the confidence of the ſenate and the republican party, contrary to the advice of his beſt friends, he diſmiſſed his guards, ſaying, it was better to ſuffer death once, than to live always in fear of it. As he looked upon the affections of the people as his beſt and ſureſt guard, he did all that lay in his power to oblige them, entertaining entertaining them frequently with public feaſts and ſhews, and diſtributing corn among the poorer ſort of people. To gratify his army, he ſent out colonies to ſeveral places, of which the moſt remarkable were Carthage and Corinth (W). As for the nobility, he attached moſt of them to his intereſt by raiſing them to the chief offices in the ſtate, and truſting them with the government of the many provinces that were then ſubject to Rome. In ſhort, he ingratiated himſelf with all orders of men, by his gentle deportment and winning behaviour, ſo as to work in them a chearful and willing ſubmiſſion. Though he had been inveſted with the conſular dignity for ten years, yet he named others to that eminent poſt in the republic, appointing Q. Fabius Maximus and C. Trebonius conſuls for the remaining part of that year. Nay, he carried his pretended obſervance of the antient cuſtoms and laws ſo far, that the conſul Fabius Maximus happening to die ſuddenly on the very day before the expiration of his office, he named Caninius Rebilius to be conſul for the remaining hours only, that is, till ſix in the evening, when the calends of January began. As the Romans were all haſtening to pay their compliments, as was uſual, to the new conſul, "Let "us make haſte," ſaid Cicero, by way of raillery, "leſt he "be gone out of his office before we get to his houſe (X). As the dictator had many friends to gratify, he encreaſed the prætors to ſixteen, and the quæſtors to forty; he created ſix new ædiles, and encreaſed the number of the other curule magiſtrates in proportion. But as there ſtill remained many unrewarded, who had ſerved him with great fidelity, he allotted them places in the ſenate, by which means the number of the ſenators roſe from three hundred to nine hundred. This have great offence to the conſcript fathers, the more, becauſe among thoſe, whom the dictator raiſed to that high ſtation, were many common ſoldiers, ſons of freed-men, foreigners lately admitted to the Roman citizenſhip, Gauls,

(W) It may be ſaid, there was ſomething ſingular in the fate of theſe two cities; for as they had been both deſtroyed at the ſame time, ſo were they now at the ſame time rebuilt and repeopled,

(X) There was no end of Cicero's witticiſms on that occaſion; "We have had a very vigilant conſul," ſaid he; "for he has "not ſhut his eyes during the whole time of his conſulate. Ca- "ninius was a conſul of ſuch ſtrictneſs and ſeverity, that not one "among us dined, ſupped or ſlept during his conſulſhip. Spaniards, &c. Cæſar having thus debaſed the ſenate, began to look upon them with contempt, and conſider them no otherwiſe than his vaſſals and creatures. Of this he gave not long after a ſignal inſtance. The ſenate, having paſſed a decree, conferring on him ſome extravagant honours, went in a body to preſent him with it, as he was ſitting on the roſtra, adminiſtering juſtice. Though the conſuls, prætors, and all the curule magiſtrates then in Rome attended the ſenate, yet the dictator received them with all the pride and haughtineſs of a ſovereign, without ſo much as condeſcending to riſe to them. We are told by Plutarch, that he offered to ſtand up to the ſenate; but that Cornelius Balbus, one of his friends, or rather flatterers, hindered him: "Remember," ſaid he, "you are Cæſar, and ſuffer them "to pay you that reſpect which is due to your dignity." However that be, his [illegible]iage offended, not only the conſcript fathers, but the people too, the latter thinking the affront on the ſenate equally reflected on the whole republic. Cæſar, ſenſible of the falſe ſtep he had taken, immediately retired home, and cauſed a report to be ſpread abroad by his emiſſaries, that his ſitting had been cauſed by the diſtemper to which he was ſubject, viz. the falling ſickneſs, which, he ſaid, diſcompoſed the ſenſes of thoſe who were affected with it, if they talked much ſtanding. Not long after he gave a freſh occaſion of reſentment by affronting the tribunes. While Cæſar was one day ſitting in a golden chair upon the roſtra, to view the ceremony of the lupercalia, Marc Antony, who was then Cæſar's collegue in the conſulſhip, after having run up and down the city naked, as was uſual during that ſolemnity (Y) came into the forum, and falling down before Cæſar, preſented him with a diadem, wreathed with laurel. Upon this a ſmall ſhout was raiſed by ſome who had been placed near the dictator for that purpoſe; but when Cæſar refuſed it, he was applauded by the whole multitude. Antony offered the crown again, and, upon the dictator's

(Y) The lupercalia, were, as we have obſerved elſwhere, at their inſtitution, peculiar to the ſhepherds, and of the ſame nature with the Arcadian Lycæa. The young patricians, and ſome of the magiſtrates, uſed to run that day up and down the city naked, ſtriking all they met with leathern thongs by way of ſport. Women of the firſt rank placed themſelves in the way, and held out their hands to the laſh, out of an opinion, that it prcured an eaſy labour to thoſe who were with child, and made thoſe conceive who were barren.

ſecond refuſal, all, who were preſent, teſtified their ſatisfaction anew with loud acclamations. Then Cæſar, finding it would not take, roſe up, and ordered the crown to be carried into the capitol, ſaying, that Jupiter alone was king of the Romans. The next morning Cæſar's ſtatues were found with royal diadems on their heads; but Flavius and Marullus, two tribunes of the people, went preſently, and not only pulled them off, but cauſed thoſe to be apprehended and committed to priſon, who the day before had applauded Antony, while he attempted to put the royal diadem on Cæſar's head. ed their tribunes with loud acclamations, comparing them to the famous Brutus, the founder of the republic. This Cæſar highly reſented, diſplaced the two tribunes, and while he inveighed againſt them in a public ſpeech, he abuſed and ridiculed on that occaſion the people, calling them bruti and Cumæi, that is, beaſts and fools (Z). A few days after, as he was returning from Alba to Rome, ſome of his friends ſaluted him, as he entered the city by the title of king; but he, finding the people diſreliſhed it, ſeemed to reſent it himſelf, and anſwered aloud, "My title is Cæſar, not king." This affectation of being king gave the common people the firſt occaſion to quarrel with him, and proved a ſpecious pretence, for thoſe who had been his ſecret enemies all along, to conſpire againſt him. us, a ſincere friend to his country, and at the ſame time an enemy to Cæſar on a private account, the dictator having a few months before beſtowed the firſt and moſt honourable prætorſhip on Brutus, though he could not help owning, that Caſſius had the beſt claim to it. Caſſius therefore, partly out of zeal for the good of his country, and partly out of a ſpirit of revenge, formed firſt with himſelf the plan of the conſpiracy, and then imparted it to a few, whom he knew to be ſecret enemies both to the tyrant and tyranny. As Brutus was highly eſteemed both by the people and ſenate, Caſſius looked upon him as the moſt proper perſon for carrying on the conſpiracy. He was thought to be deſcended by his father's ſide from the famous Junius Brutus, who drove out the Tarquins (A), and by his mother's ſide from the Servilii, one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome; but what, in Plutarch's opinion, was more than all the reſt, he was [illegible]n nephew and ſon-in-law to Cato of Utica. He was a moſt zealous republican, and fully convinced, that the common-wealth could be no longer maintained without the death of the dictator. But the honours and favours he had received at Cæſar's hands reſtrained him from uſing violent meaſures. He had not only been pardoned himſelf, and obtained the ſame grace for many of his friends, after the battle of Pharſalia; but was one in whom Cæſar had a particular confidence. He had at that time the moſt honourable prætorſhip, was named for the conſulſhip four years after, and deſigned in all appearance by Cæſar for his ſucceſſor. For being once accuſed as engaged in a conſpiracy againſt him, Cæſar would not hearken to the accuſation, ſaying, that Brutus was

(A) Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus and Dion Caſſius aſſure us, that Marcus Brutus was not deſcended from the famous Junius Brutus. The Junian family was, according to them, divided into two branches, the one patrician, the other plebeian. The former ended in Brutus himſelf, after he had ſacrificed his two ſons to the ſafety of his country. The other flouriſhed many ages after, and furniſhed Rome with many heroes, among the reſt with Marcus Brutus, of whom we are ſpeaking in this place. As he bore the ſame name with the firſt conſul, and was of the ſame family, the common people believed him to be deſcended from the firſt Brutus. Plutarch himſelf, upon the authority of Poſidonius the philoſopher, was of the ſame opinion, and will have Brutus to be ſprung from a third ſon of Junius Brutus, who was but a child, when his two brothers were executed by their father's command. Some writers, the more to debaſe Brutus who acted a chief part in the conſpiracy, pretend that he was come of a mean family, which had been raiſed to honours and offices in the republic but a few years before.

was not so ambitious, but he could wait with patience till he was taken off by a natural death. Cassius therefore, who had already formed the design of assassinating Cæsar, being on one hand desirous of drawing into the plot a man of so great credit as Brutus; but on the other not daring to discourse the matter with him openly, laid in the night-time papers about his chair, where he used to sit as prætor and determine causes, with sentences to this import; "You are asleep, Brutus; you are no longer "Brutus;" and under the statue of the famous Junius Brutus he wrote the following words; "Would to heaven thou "wert alive, or some of thy descendents resembled thee." Cassius, perceiving that these sentences made a deep impression on his mind, first employed his wife Junia, who was sister to Brutus, to revive in the breast of her brother those generous sentiments, which were peculiar to their family; and afterwards resolved at all adventures to discover to him his design, not doubting but he should be able to draw one into the plot, who, though he did not hate the tyrant, was a declared enemy to tyranny. Accordingly, as the senate was to meet a few days after in order to deliberate, as was said, about giving Cæsar the title of king, Cassius took this occasion to pay a visit to Brutus, and ask him whether he designed to be present in the senate on the calends of March, when Cæsar's friends were to propose the giving him the title of king. Brutus answered, that he designed to absent himself that day. "But "suppose you are called thither," replied Cassius. "Then, said Brutus, "I should think it my duty to speak and use my "utmost endeavours against such unwarrantable proceedings, "nay, and to die rather than outlive the liberty of my country. Ah!" replyed Cassius, "what generous Roman "would suffer you to die for his liberty? You are not ac-"quainted with yourself, Brutus, if you imagine, that those "papers, which were thrown into your tribunal, came from "any but the most illustrious and bravest men of Rome. From "other prætors they demanded games, shews, gladiators, &c. "but from you, whose very name is dreadful to tyrants, they "expect the ruin and downfal of arbitrary power, being ready "to expose themselves to the utmost dangers in expectation of "your auspicious aid." These words made such a deep impression on Brutus, that, notwithstanding the many favours he had received at the dictator's hands, he entered into all Cassius's measures, and from that time took upon himself the whole management of the conspiracy. The name of Brutus soon engaged a great many illustious citizens in the conspiracy, among whom were C. Trebonius, Servius Sulpitius Galba, the two two Servilius Caſcas, Publius Caius, Decimus Brutus Albinus, Tullius Cimber, and Lucius Minucius Bacilius. Theſe had all ſerved under Cæſar from the very beginning of the civil wars, and were looked upon by him as his moſt truſty friends. It was more eaſy to draw into the conſpiracy thoſe who had always ſhewn an utter averſion to Cæſar's uſurpation. Among theſe were M. Junius Brutus, L. Caſſius, a brother to C. Caſſius, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, P. Turullius, C. Attilius, L. Petronius, C. Cornelius Cinna, Caſſius Parmenſis, L. and C. Cæcilius, Rubrius Ruga, M. Spurius, P. Sextius Naſo, Pontius Aquila, Antiſtius Labeo, and many others, to the number of ſixty, whoſe names have not been tranſmitted to us. As for Cicero, though he was known to be at the bottom a zealous republican, yet as he was naturally timorous and greatly addicted to Cæſar, who had heaped innumerable favours upon him, Brutus did not think it adviſeable to truſt him with the ſecret. The conſpirators would fain have engaged the famous Statilius, who affected to imitate Cato, and would have laid violent hands on himſelf after the defeat of Pompey's party in Africa, had he not been prevented by Apollonides and Demetrius, as we have related above. Brutus in order to diſcover his true ſentiments, aſked him in a private converſation, which of the two evils was the greateſt? "To bear tamely the yoke "of a tyrant, or to run the riſque of a civil war by ſhaking "it off?" To this queſtion Statilius anſwered without heſitation, that he had rather patiently ſuffer the oppreſſion of an arbitrary maſter, than the cruelties and diſorders which generally attend civil diſſenſions. Brutus likewiſe endeavoured to engage in the conſpiracy Favonius, a philoſopher of great reputation, and, in order to ſound him, propoſed the ſame queſtion to him, when Favonius declared, that, in his opinion, a civil war was worſe than the moſt unjuſt tyranny. Upon this, Brutus gave over all thoughts of gaining Statilius and Favonius. In the mean time, Cæſar's enemies made it their whole buſineſs to ſtir up the common people againſt him, by ſpreading among the multitude a thouſand falſe reports, viz. that he deſigned to fix the ſeat of his empire in Egypt or Phrygia, and to tranſport thither all the riches of Italy, abandoning Rome to the mercy of his creatures and favourites. Cæſar, in hearing theſe groundleſs reports, began to ſuſpect, that ſome plot was privately carrying on againſt him; his friends believing that Marc Antony and Dolabella were concerned in it, adviſed him not to truſt them, but to be upon his guard and watch them narrowly. Cæſar anſwered, that he was not afraid of thoſe plump jolly fellows, but rather of pale lean men, ſuch as Caſſi-

us and Brutus. However, as he too eaſily gave credit to his flatterers, among whom were ſome of the conſpirators, telling him, that after he had put an end to the civil war, the commonwealth was more concerned than himſelf in his preſervation, that he neglected the neceſſary precautions for his ſafety, and was more intent on making the due preparations for putting in execution the vaſt deſigns he had formed, than in guarding himſelf againſt the attempts of his domeſtic enemies. For he had reſolved to make war upon the Parthians, and, after having revenged the death of Craſſus and the Romans ſlain with him at the battle of Carrhæ, to paſs through Hyrcania, thence to march by the Caſpian ſea to mount Caucaſus, till he came into Scythia, then to over-run all the countries betwen Scythia and Germany, and Germany itſelf, whence he deſigned to return through Gaul into Italy, deſcribing the ſpacious circle of his intended empire, and [illegible]nding it on every ſide by the ſea. He had already ord[illegible] ſixteen legions and ten thouſand horſe to march towards Brunduſium, and was himſelf to follow them in a few days, But his friends, who were deſirous to ſee him honoured with the title of king before he left Rome, gave out, that the books of the Sibyls declared, that the Parthians could never be overcome by the Romans, unleſs they fought under the conduct of a king. Aurelius Cotta, one of Cæſar's creatures, who had the ſacred volumes in his keeping, was to make this report out of them to the ſenate, and to propoſe, that Cæſar ſhould only be ſtyled dictator in Italy; but that he ſhould be acknowledged as king, and take upon him that title, with reſpect to all foreign nations ſubject to the Roman republic. The ſenate was appointed to meet for this purpoſe on the ides of March, and that day the conſpirators fixed upon as the moſt proper for putting their deſign in execution, ſince Cæſar would not fail coming to the ſenate on ſuch an occaſion, and it was ſafer to fall upon him there, moſt of the ſenators being privately enemies to him, than in any other place, where the populace might divert the blow. All the antient hiſtorians are full of prodigies and apparitions, which, in their opinion, were manifeſt preſages of Cæſar's tragical death. They tell us, that men were ſeen in the air all on fire, encountering each other; that a prodigious [illegible] ſeemed to iſſue from the hand of a ſoldier's ſervant, inſomuch, that thoſe who ſaw it thought he muſt be burnt, but nevertheleſs he received no hurt; that as Cæſar was ſacrificing, the victim was found without a heart; that Spurina, a famous augur, bid him beware of the ides of March, for that he was then threatened with ſome great danger. They add, that when the day was come,

Cæſar, as he went to the ſenate, meeting the augur, ſaid to him by way of raillery, "The ides of March are come. They "are come," anſwered calmly the augur, "but they are not "paſt." The night before the plot was put in execution, he ſupped with M. Lepidus; and the diſcourſe turning upon the kind of death which ſeemed beſt, Cæſar, buſy as he was in ſigning ſome letters, before any of the company had time to deliver his opinion, cried out, "Of all deaths a ſudden one is "the beſt." After ſupper he retired to his own houſe, where both he and his wife Calpurnia paſſed the night in great care and uneaſineſs. He was ſcarce fallen aſleep, when the doors and windows of the apartment where he lay flew open. Being ſtartled at the noiſe and the light, which broke all on a ſudden into his room, he ſat up in his bed, when by the moonſhine he perceived Calpurnia faſt aſleep, but heard her utter in her dream ſome inarticulate words mixed with groans. She dreamt at that time, that the pinacle (B), which the ſenate had allowed to be raiſed on Cæſar's houſe, by way of ornament and grandeur, was fallen down; and alſo fancied, that ſhe was weeping over Cæſar, and holding him all covered over with woundsand blood in her arms. When it was day, ſhe begged of Cæſar that he would not ſtir out, but adjourn the ſenate to another time; and that, if he ſlighted her dreams, he would be pleaſed to conſult the gods by ſacrifices, and other kinds of divination. He complied with her requeſt; ſacrifices were offered early in the morning; and, according to the report of the prieſts, all the victims proved inauſpicious. Cæſar was not a man to be eaſily intimidated; he had braved death on a thouſand occaſions, and gained many victories, among the reſt that of Munda, when the auſpices threatened him with utter deſtruction. But, however, as he had never before diſcovered in Calpurnia any kind of ſuperſtition, he now began to look upon her fears and apprehenſions as inſpirations from heaven, and forebodings, which ought not always to be neglected. As Marc Antony was then Several prodigies preceding Cæſar's death.

Cæſar is alarmed.

(B) The pinacle, as madam Dacier obſerves, was a ſort of ornament uſually placed on the top of temples. The Greek called it ἀέτὸς ἀέτωμα, and the Latins faſtigium. Private perſons were not allowed to raiſe ſuch ornaments on the tops of their houſes without the conſent of the ſenate, who had the ſuperintendency of every thing relating to the public.. Thus, as a token of honour, the ſenate accorded to Poplicola to have the doors of his houſe open towards the ſtreet inſtead of opening inwards. The pinacles were commonly adorned with ſtatues of the gods, figures of victory, and ſuch other decorations as were ſuitable to the rank and quality of thoſe to whom the privilege of erecting them was granted.

then with him, being come, according to his cuſtom, early in the morning, to attend his levee, he had ſome thoughts of ſending him with orders to the ſenate not to aſſemble that day. But as moſt of his troops were already embarqued, and he himſelf was to leave Rome in four days, he could not come to any fixed reſolution, but remained in ſuſpenſe, till the ſenate began to aſſemble in the appointed place, which was a great hall built by Pompey near his theatre [k].

The conſtancy and intrepidity of Brutus.

WHILE Cæſar was thus deliberating with himſelf, whether he ſhould ſuffer the ſenate to aſſemble that day, or adjourn their meeting to another, Brutus was buſy in adminiſtering juſtice in the forum, he being prætor urbanus for the preſent year. We are told, that he heard thoſe who pleaded before him, pronounced ſentence, and diſpatched the cauſes that were brought to his tribunal, with as much care, equity, and application as if he had no other buſineſs in hand. Though he had taken with him, when he went out of his houſe, a dagger, and had it then concealed under his robe, with a firm reſolution of plunging it into Cæſar's breaſt before he returned home; yet he did not betray on his tribunal the leaſt concern, but acquitted himſelf of his office with his uſual calmneſs and tranquillity. One, whom he had condemned in a certain ſum, refuſed to pay it, crying out, that he appealed to Cæſar; when Brutus caſting his eyes on the conſpirators, "Cæſar," ſaid he "how powerful ſoever, "ſhall not prevent me from ſeeing ſuch ſentence put in execu-"tion, as are agreeable to the laws of Rome." However, ſeveral accidents intervened, which did not a little terrify Brutus and the other conſpirators, and had almoſt defeated their beſt concerted meaſures. While Brutus was hearing cauſes in the forum with his uſual attention and patience, news was brought him, that his wife Porcia lay at the point of death. She was the daughter of Cato, and the only perſon, not concerned in the conſpiracy, to whom Brutus had revealed it. He ſtrove as much as poſſible, when abroad, to keep his uneaſineſs of mind to himſelf; but at home, and eſpecially in the night-time, he was not the ſame man, but ſometimes all on a ſudden ſtarted out of his bed, and at other times ſo taken up with unquiet thoughts, and ſo perplexed in his mind, that Porcia concluded, he had ſome dangerous and difficult enterprize in agitation. As ſhe was addicted to the ſtudy of philoſophy, fond of her husband to a great degree, and and full of courage and prudence, ſhe reſolved not to enquire into Brutus's ſecrets, till ſhe had tried whether ſhe had courage and reſolution enough to conceal them even in the midſt of torments. With this view ſhe diſmiſſed all her attendants, and taking a knife, gave herſelf a deep gaſh in the thigh, which threw her into a violent fever. Brutus, who was then at home, flew immediately to her apartment, when ſhe in the height of her pain addreſſed him thus: "I am O "Brutus, the daughter of Cato, and was given to you in "marriage, not to partake only in the common civilities of "bed and board, but to bear a ſhare in your good, as well "as your evil, fortunes. When I look upon you, I find no "reaſon to repent the match; but from me, what evidence "of my love, what ſatisfaction can you receive, if I am not "allowed to ſhare with you in bearing your hidden griefs, "nor admitted to any of your counſels, that require ſecrecy "and truſt? I am well apprized, that woman are commonly thought to be of too weak a nature to be truſted with "ſecrets; but certainly, Brutus, a virtuous birth and education, and frequent converſing with men of honour, are of "ſome force to the forming of our manners, and the "ſtrengthening of our natural weakneſs. I am the daughter "of Cato and the wife of Brutus, in which two great titles "I did not place much confidence, till I tried myſelf, and "found, that even againſt grief itſelf and pain I am invincible." Having thus ſpoke, ſhe ſhewed him her wound, and related to him the trial ſhe had made of her own conſtancy. Brutus, touched with this affecting ſpeech, could not help diſcovering the whole plot to her without reſerve; which when he had done, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and begged the aſſiſtance of the gods in his enterprize, that he might live to be a huſband worthy of ſuch a wife as Porcia (C). But with all her reſolution, when the day came, on which the deſign was to be put in execution, ſhe was extremely diſturbed with the expectation of the event, and, not

Brutus diſcovers to her the conſpiracy.

(C) Valerius Maximus is the only author, who ſuppoſes, that Porcia was acquainted with her huſband's deſign before ſhe wounded herſelf. According to him, Brutus diſcovered to her the whole plot the night before it was to be put in execution. Whereupon Porcia the next morning gave herſelf a dangerous wound with a razor; at which Brutus being greatly alarmed, Porcia told him, while he was expreſſing his concern in the moſt tender terms, that ſhe had wounded herſelf to make a trial of her conſtancy and courage, being determined to lay violent hands on herſelf, in caſe the ſucceſs of his enterprize did not anſwer his expectation.

not being able to bear the greatneſs of her cares, ſhe could ſcarce keep within doors. At every little noiſe ſhe ſtarted up, and, running into the ſtreet, aſked thoſe who came from the forum, what Brutus was doing? At length, after having expected a long time, being overcome by her fears and doubts, ſhe fell into a ſwoon. Whereupon her women making a great outcry, many of the neighbours ran to Brutus's houſe to know what was the matter, and the report was ſoon ſpread abroad, that Porcia was dying, though ſhe recovered in a little time, and came to herſelf again. This news pierced Brutus's heart; yet he was not ſo carried away by his private grief, as to neglect the public concern. He came down immediately from his tribunal, but, inſtead of going home, went to Pompey's porch, adjoining to the hall, where the ſenators were to aſſemble, and there waited with the other conſpirators the coming of Cæſar to the ſenate. But as he did not appear, though the day was far ſpent, being detained at home by his wife and the augurs, they were all under the greateſt uneaſineſs, and aſcribed his delay to the diſcovery of the plot. They were confirmed in their ſuſpicion by ſeveral accidents, which were thrown in their way by mere chance. While they were thus waiting for Cæſar, a citizen, coming up to Caſca, one of the conſpirators, and taking him by the hand, "You con" cealed, ſaid he, the ſecret from me, but Brutus has told me
" the whole." At which words Caſca being greatly alarmed, the other ſaid ſmiling, " How came you, Caſca, to be ſo rich
" on a ſudden as to ſtand for the ædileſhip?" Theſe words reſtored, we may ſay, Caſca to life again; for he looked upon himſelf as loſt, and, deceived by the ambiguity of the reproach, was upon the point of diſcovering the ſecret, in hopes of gaining his friend by that means. The ſenator Popilius Lænas gave room for new ſuſpicion; for after having ſaluted Brutus and Caſſius very obligingly, he accoſted them, and whiſpered them ſoftly in the ear; " My wiſhes are with you, may you
" accompliſh what you deſign; but I adviſe you to make no
" delay, for the thing is now no ſecret." Having thus ſpoke, he left them in the utmoſt conſternation. Decimus Brutus, ſurnamed Albinus, one in whom Cæſar had ſuch confidence, that he had made him his ſecond heir, being no leſs alarmed at theſe words than the reſt of the conſpirators, reſolved to go in perſon to Cæſar's houſe, to inform himſelf there of what kept him ſo long from coming to the ſenate. Accordingly, with the approbation of Brutus and Caſſius, he flew thither, and being immediately admitted into the dictator's appartment, he aſked him with his uſual familiarity, what kept him ſo long from from appearing in the ſenate. Cæſar, who looked upon him as one of his beſt friends, imparted to him in confidence what his wife had dreamed the night before, and what the augurs had told him. Hereupon Decimus, fearing leſt he ſhould put off the ſenate to another day, and the buſineſs might in the mean time get wind, turned into ridicule both Calpurnia's dreams and the divinations of the ſoothſayers, telling Cæſar, that he would be much to blame, if he gave the ſenate ſuch juſt grounds to complain; "For they are, ſaid he, met upon "your own ſummons, and are ready to vote unanimouſly, "that you ſhould be declared king of all the provinces out of "Italy, and be allowed to wear a diadem in any other place. "Now, if any one ſhould be ſent to tell them, that they muſt "break up for the preſent, and meet again when Calpurnia "ſhall chance to have better dreams, what will your enemies "ſay? or who will with any patience hear your friends pre-"tending to juſtify you, and maintaining, that this is not an "inſtance of downright ſervitude on one ſide, and bare-faced "tyranny on the other? But if you are ſo far prepoſſeſſed "with groundleſs fears as really to think this an unlucky day, "it will be more decent for you to go to the ſenate yourſelf, "and adjourn it in perſon." Having thus ſpoke, he took Cæſar by the hand, and dragged him, in a manner, out of his houſe. He was not gone far from his door, when an unknown ſlave made towards him; but not being able to get near him by reaſon of the croud, he went into his houſe, and put himſelf into the hands of Calpurnia, begging her to ſecure him till Cæſar returned, becauſe he had matters of the utmoſt importance to communicate to him. Soon after one Artemidorus, a native of the iſland of Cnidus, by profeſſion a rhetorician, and intimately acquainted with moſt of the conſpirators, put into Cæſar's hand a paper, containing the heads of what he had to diſcover to him. Artemidorus had obſerved, that Cæſar, as he received any papers, immediately delivered them to ſome of his officers, who attended him; and therefore coming as near to him as he could, he cryed out, "Read this, Cæſar, quickly; for it contains affairs of the "greateſt importance, and ſuch as concern you nearly." Some writers tell us, that Artemidorus, not being able to come near Cæſar by reaſon of the throng, gave this note to another, who preſented it to him. However that be, Cæſar attempted ſeveral times to read it; but being diverted by the croud of thoſe who came to ſpeak to him, he kept it in his hand by itſelf, till he came into the ſenate. When he was got to the door of the great hall, where the conſcript fathers were were assembled, Popilius Lænas, who, but a little before, had wished Brutus and Cassius good success in their undertaking, coming up to him, discoursed a great while with him in private, Cæsar standing still all the time, and seeming to be very attentive. The conspirators, not being able to hear what he said, but guessing from what they were conscious of, that this conference was a discovery of their treason, were strangely dejected; and, looking upon one another, laid their hands on the daggers they had concealed under their robes, and were drawing them with a design to stab themselves, if the plot was discovered; but judging from Lænas's looks and gestures, which they narrowly watched, and from the calmness and unconcern that appeared in Cæsar's countenance, that the conspiracy was not the subject of their conference, they took courage, and were soon after delivered from all their fears. For Lænas in retiring was observed to kiss Cæsar's hand, which was a plain indication that he had been petitioning, and not accusing. Cæsar having dismissed Lænas, entered the hall, where the senators were assembled. This was one of the many edifices which Pompey had raised for the use of the public; whence Plutarch concludes, that some deity guided the action, and brought Cæsar thither to revenge upon him the death of Pompey. Upon Cæsar's entering the hall, the senate stood up in respect to him. Of the conspirators, some stood behind the chair, which was placed for the dictator in the middle of the hall; others went to meet him, pretending to join their prayers with those of Metellus Cimber, in behalf of his brother who was banished. In the mean time, Trebonius (D) drew Marc Antony, who was faithful to Cæsar and a man of great strength and resolution,

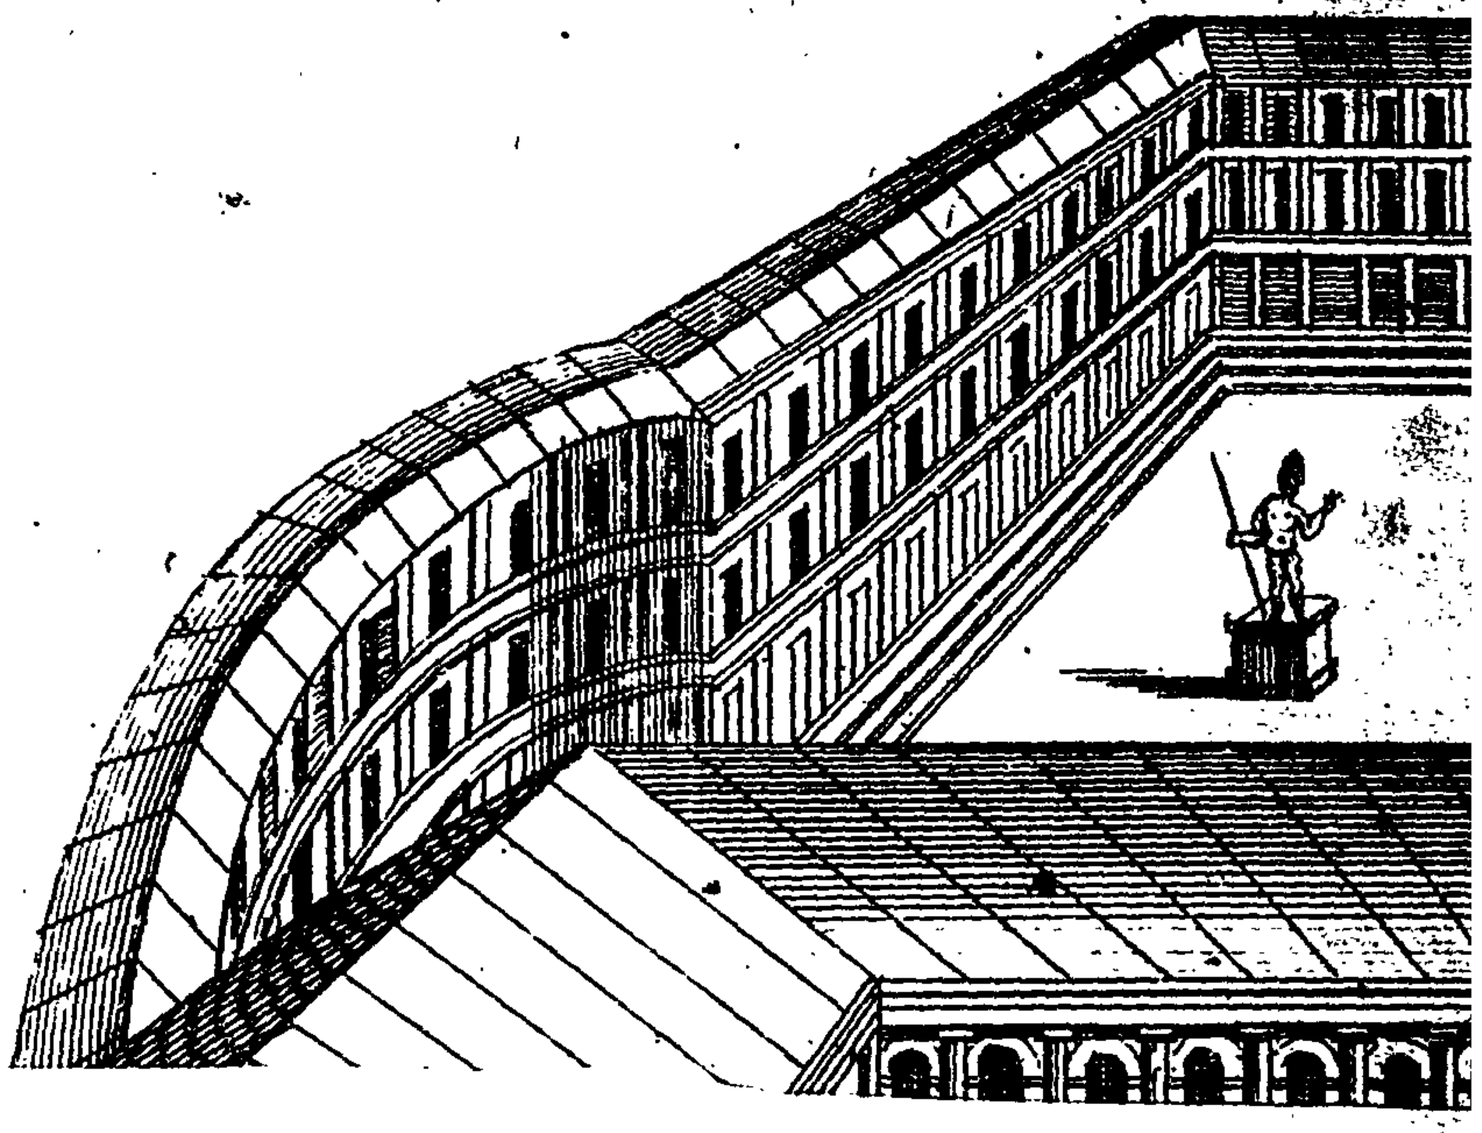
The conspirators alarmed.

The conspirators croud round Cæsar in the senate-house.

(D) Plutarch in the life of Cæsar tells us, that Antony was detained without by Brutus Albinus; and in the life of Brutus, that he was kept in talk by C. Trebonius. How could he be guilty of so manifest a contradiction in the relation of an action so considerable and notorious? He was certainly mistaken in the life of Cæsar, and in that of Brutus hits upon the truth; since all the historians, who mention this action, agree, that Trebonius entertained Antony at the door. Cicero, who is more to be relied on than all the historians put together, says in express terms in his second Philippic, addressing his speech to Antony himself; "Cum interficeretur Cæsar, tum te a Trebonio vidimus "sevocari;" and in the 13th. "Sceleratum Trebonium? quo "scelere? nisi quod te idibus Martiis a debita tibi peste se- "duxit;" intimating, that Antony deserved the same doom with Cæsar.



lution, towards the door, and entertained him in the porch with a long diſcourſe contrived for that purpoſe. When the dictator was ſeated, the conſpirators, crouding round him, renewed their ſupplications in favour of Cimber's brother, and taking him by the hand, kiſſed it, in appearance, with great reſpect. But the dictator rejected their petition, and upon their urging him farther and growing very importunate, he firſt reprimanded them ſeverely, and afterwards, ſtarting up, puſhed them from him. Hereupon Cimber, laying hold of the dictator's robe with both hands, pulled it off from his ſhoulders, which was the ſignal agreed on to fall upon him. In that inſtant Servilius Caſca, who ſtood behind him, drawing his dagger, gave him the firſt wound in the neck, which was not mortal, nor dangerous, as coming from one, who at the beginning of ſuch a bold action was probably very much diſturbed; ſo that his ſtrength as well as his courage might fail him. Cæſar immediately, turning about, ſeized Caſca by the hand which held the dagger, both of them crying out at the ſame time, "Cæſar in Latin, wicked Caſca, what doſt thou mean?" and Caſca calling to his brother in Greek to come and help him. Thoſe who were not privy to the deſign were ſtruck with ſuch horror at the attempt, that they could neither fly, nor aſſiſt Cæſar, nay, nor utter a ſingle word. But the conſpirators, who came prepared, encloſed him on all ſides with their naked daggers in their hands, ſo that which way ſoever he turned, he met with blows, and ſaw their daggers levelled at his face and eyes. Caſſius, having firſt turned his face to a ſtatue, which the republic had erected to Pompey in the hall, and ſilently implored the aſſiſtance of that hero, flew at Cæſar with the rage of a madman, and gave him a deep wound on the head, encouraging the others to follow his example and rid Rome of her tyrant. Hereupon they all preſſed upon him; but, as each of them was eager to plunge his dagger in his body, and have the glory of diſpatching him, they wounded one another, Brutus in particular received a wound on the hand from Caſſius, and moſt of them were ſtained either with Cæſar's blood or their own. The Hero, though thus baited on all ſides, to uſe Plutarch's expreſſion, like a wild beaſt taken in a toil, fought and defended himſelf in the beſt manner he could, till, looking round about him to ſee if he could make his eſcape, he perceived Brutus with his dagger in his hand. This ſight ſtung him to the heart, ſo that he ſtruggled no more; but crying out, "What! my ſon, Brutus, and you "too?"

"too?" he covered his face with his robe, and quietly surrendered himself. Then the conspirators, pushing him either by chance, or, as some say, by design, to the pedestal, on which Pompey's statue stood, which by that means was sprinkled with his blood, dispatched him there with twenty-five wounds, the senate looking on with horror and amazement, but not one of them daring to lend him the least assistance. We are told, that as he found himself fainting away and ready to drop down, he wrapt the skirts of his garment round his knees, that he might fall with more decency [l].

He is killed. Year of the flood 2960. Before Christ 39. Of Rome 709.

THUS died in the fifty-sixth year of his age the greatest warrior that Rome, or perhaps the world, ever saw, after he had fought with success fifty pitched battles, taken by assault above a thousand towns, and slain, if Pliny is to be credited [m], eleven hundred ninety-two thousand men. He was, without doubt, a person of extraordinary parts and wonderful abilities, in all the arts both of war and civil government, and of equal diligence and application in the use of them. He was beloved and revered by the people, honoured and adored by his friends, and esteemed and admired even by his enemies. But as his ambition, which knew no bounds, prompted him to inthral his country, and usurp a despotic and arbitrary power over those who were as free as himself, he met in the end with that doom which all tyrants and usurpers deserve. If the state had been deemed irretrieveable and an usurper a necessary evil, Rome could not have had a better than Cæsar. But as Brutus, Cicero, and the best and ablest Romans judged otherwise, the dictator's power and dominion was downright usurpation, and consequently every Roman was warranted by all the laws of Rome to put him to death.

CHAP. XIV.

The Hiſtory of Rome, from the death of Cæſar to the firſt conſulate of Octavianus.

Rome in great conſternation upon Cæſar's death.

WHEN Cæſar was diſpatched, Brutus, ſtepping forth into the middle of the ſenate houſe, offered to give an acount to the conſcript fathers of the motives of their undertaking, and to exhort them to approve an action, which had reſtored liberty to their country. But they all flew out of doors in the utmoſt conſternation, and carried terror and confuſion into all quarters of the city. So great was the throng at the door of the hall and in the porch, that ſome of the ſenators were ſtifled in the croud, and others dangerouſly wounded, by running blindly, in that general diſtraction, againſt the naked daggers of the conſpirators. The news of Cæſar's death being in a trice ſpread all over the city, the friends of the deceaſed retired in all haſte to their houſes, and there ſhut themſelves up, without knowing what they had to hope or fear from ſo tragical an event. The artificers, ſhutting their ſhops, ran in that ſudden ſurprize, ſome to ſee the body of the deceaſed, others up and down the ſtreets to inform themſelves of the circumſtances of ſo bold an attempt. In the mean time, Brutus and the other conſpirators marched in a body from the ſenate-houſe all over the city, with their daggers yet bloody in their hands, not like perſons who thought of eſcaping, but with an air of confidence and aſſurance. Some perſons of diſtinction, who had not been privy to the conſpiracy, joined them with their drawn ſwords, being deſirous to ſhare in the honour of the action, as if they had borne part of it. Of this number were C. Octavius, P. Lentulus Spinther, Favonius, Patiſcus, L. Statius Murcus, who had ſerved under Cæſar in quality of lieutenant againſt the ſons of Pompey in Spain, A. Aquinius, and ſeveral others, who afterwards paid dear for their vanity, being cut off by Antony and young Octavianus. As they marched along, they proclaimed in the ſtreets, that they had killed the king of Rome and the tyrant of their country. They were preceded by an herald, who carried on the point of a lance a cap, the ſymbol of liberty among the Romans. As they marched along, they called to the people to reſume their antient liberty, liberty, and complimented ſuch perſons of rank as came in their way. When they arrived at the comitium, Brutus, holding up his bloody dagger, cryed out, "Cicero, we "have revenged the republic." This he did, as ſome writers conjecture, either to engage that famous orator in the common cauſe, or to make the people believe, that he, who had formerly guarded his country againſt the wicked attempts of Cataline, bore a part in delivering it from the tyranny of Cæſar. However that be, the people did not join them; but, alarmed at the death of the dictator, ran up and down the city, ſome bewailing the loſs of one who had ſupported them with his largeſſes, and others laying hold of the preſent general diſtraction to plunder the houſes of their fellow-citizens. They were no more thoſe antient Romans, to whom liberty was more dear than life itſelf. They were become effeminate, debauched, and accuſtomed to live by the price of their votes, which they ſold to the beſt bidder. Brutus therefore, with his followers, thought it adviſeable to retire to the capitol, whither they were attended by a body of gladiators belonging to Decimus Brutus Albinus. The next day, as no-body was injured by the conſpirators either in his goods or perſon, the ſenators and many of the people took courage, and went up to the conſpirators in the capitol. Brutus made an harangue to them, very popular and adapted to the preſent ſtate of affairs. When he had done ſpeaking, they applauded his oration, and invited him with one voice to come down into the city. Hereupon the conſpirators deſcended with confidence into the forum, Brutus being attended and guarded by many perſons of the moſt eminent quality in Rome, while the other conſpirators went promiſcuouſly mingled with the crowd. He no ſooner appeared on the roſtra, than the rabble, though conſiſting of a confuſed mixture and all diſpoſed to raiſe a tumult, were ſtruck with reverence, and hearkened to him with ſilence and attention. He acquainted them in a very affecting harangue with the motives that had prompted them to put Cæſar to death, and ſolemnly proteſted, that neither he nor his companions had any thing elſe in view, but the delivering of Rome from a tyrannical yoke, and the reſtoring of their country to her former condition; but the populace, more afraid of poverty than ſubjection, expreſſed by their melancholy looks, that they were highly diſpleaſed at the action, and that they reverenced Brutus, but at the ſame time pitied Cæſar. Hereupon the conſpirators thought fit to withdraw again to the capitol, where Brutus, who expected pected to be beſieged, diſmiſſed ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who had attended him thither, not thinking it juſt, that thoſe who had no hand in the action ſhould ſhare in the danger [m].

As Cæſar had deſigned to ſet out in a few days on his intended expedition againſt the Parthians, he had reſigned his conſulſhip to P. Cornelius Dolabella, a young man of twenty-five years of age, who had married Tullia the daughter of Cicero. The new conſul, out of reſpect to Cæſar, waited for his departure to enter upon his office; but he no ſooner heard the news of his death, than he appeared with his lictors and faſces, without the conſent either of the ſenate or people. As this was an open acknowledgment of the dictator's power, no one doubted but he would join his friends againſt Brutus and the other conſpirators; but he, to the great ſurprize of all, after ſo unwarrantable a ſtep, immediately went up to the capitol with all the pomp of a conſul; and there, congratulating Brutus and his followers on the ſucceſs of their glorious undertaking, declared, that he would ſupport them to the utmoſt of his power. From the capitol he returned to the forum, where he made an harangue to the multitude, exhorting them to join the deliverers of their country; and, after having caſt out many bitter reflections on Cæſar, and beſtowed the higheſt elogiums on Brutus, he went ſo far as to propoſe a law, enacting, that for the future the ides of March ſhould be celebrated with the ſame ſolemnity, as the day on which Rome was built. "The day," ſaid he, "in which Rome recovered her "liberty by the death of a tyrant, ought to be deemed by "all true Romans as happy a day, as that in which the "city was firſt built. To the latter ſhe owes her being, "to the former her liberty; and what is being itſelf with-"out liberty?" But the indigent populace, whom the dictator had ſupported with his liberal preſents, were ſo far from being moved by his ſpeech to approve of his death, that on the contrary they would have torn the conſul in pieces, had he not, by a timely retreat, ſaved himſelf in the capitol. However, the menaces, which the multitude threw out on this occaſion againſt the dictator's enemies, did not deter L. Cornelius Cinna from renouncing his party in a moſt ſolemn manner. Cæſar had married to his firſt wife Cornelia the ſiſter of Cinna, and on that account had always favoured him in a particular manner. He had raiſed him this year to the prætorſhip, and promiſed him the conſulate. But Cinna

Dolabella takes upon him the conſular dignity, and declares for Brutus.

[m] Plut. Dio Caſſ. Appian. ibid.

Cinna was in his heart a well-wiſher to his country and an enemy to tyranny; and therefore, upon Cæſar's death, he not only ſided openly with the conſpirators, but going into the forum, with all the enſigns of his dignity, pronounced there an invective againſt his brother-in-law, ſtyling him tyrant, uſurper, oppreſſor of his country, &c. When he had done ſpeaking, he ſtripped himſelf, in preſence of the people, of all the ornaments of his dignity, crying out, "These I received of Cæſar, againſt the known "laws of Rome; and now I reſign them to the Roman "people, who alone have a right to diſpoſe of them." But even this generous and diſintereſted proceeding was highly reſented by the vile populace, and Cinna obliged to abſcond, for fear of feeling the effects of their blind fury [n].

The generous and diſintereſted behaviour of L. Cornelius Cinna.

In the mean time, Antony and Lepidus, who were entirely addicted to Cæſar, and had concealed themſelves for fear of being involved in his ruin, hearing how the people ſtood affected, appeared again in public. When the conſpirators firſt conſulted about the execution of their deſign, they were all, except Brutus, of opinion, that Antony ſhould be cut off with Cæſar; for they looked upon him as a dangerous perſon, on account of his unbounded ambition and the powerful intereſt he had among the ſoldiery; but Brutus, whoſe intentions were upright and ſincere, would by no means hearken to their advice, ſaying, That an action undertaken in defence of the laws and of juſtice ought be free even from all appearance of injuſtice. Beſides, he gave them hopes, that a great change might be worked in Antony. I do not deſpair, ſaid he, but ſuch a lover of glory as Antony, ſtirred up with emulation of our great attempt, will lay hold of this occaſion to be joint reſtorer with us of the liberty of his country. Thus the generous Brutus ſaved Antony's life; but he, inſtead of anſwering the brave patriot's expectation, upon the firſt news of Cæſar's death, fled in the diſguiſe of a ſlave, and concealed himſelf, till he was informed, that the populace were diſpoſed to revenge his death. Then he appeared again with all the majeſty and ſplendor of a conſul, being this year Cæſar's collegue in that dignity, and managed matters with ſuch addreſs, that he paved the way for that triumvirate, which gave the finiſhing blow to the republic, and reduced Rome to a laſting monarchy. The firſt ſtep he took was, to order Lepidus to march into the city a legion, which he commanded in the neighbourhood neighbourhood, and to encamp in the field of Mars. This alarmed tbe conſpirators in the capitol, who thereupon ſent deputies to Antony and Lepidus, deſiring them to conſider the ſad conſequences of a diviſion in ſo critical a conjuncture, and remonſtrating, that no hatred to Cæſar's perſon had armed them againſt him, but only the love which every good citizen ought to have for his country; that the ſtate was already ſo drained by civil wars, that any new diſturbances muſt prove fatal to it; that they believed them too generous to let any particular views tranſport them to the prejudice of the public, &c. Both Antony and Lepidus, under pretence of revenging Cæſar's death, aimed at the ſovereign power themſelves, and ſought it in the ruin of thoſe brave men, who ſtood up in defence of their oppreſſed country; but, as Decimus Brutus was already ſet out from Rome to put himſelf at the head of an army of veterans in Ciſalpine Gaul, which province had been allotted him by Cæſar, they both diſſembled even their deſign of revenging Cæſar's death, and, to gain time, returned the following anſwer, That they were ready to ſacrifice their private regards to the public good, and ſuffer the ſenate to be aſſembled, that they might govern themſelves by the advice of ſo many illuſtrious and diſcerning perſons as compoſed that venerable body. Accordingly Antony, as conſul, appointed the ſenate to meet early the next morning in the temple of Tellus, near his own houſe, and, in the mean time, placed guards all over the city, to keep the unruly multitude from raiſing diſturbances, and likewiſe ordered all Cæſar's money and papers to be conveyed to his houſe. Next morning by break of day, the conſcript fathers aſſembled purſuant to their ſummons; and never did that auguſt body meet on ſo important and nice an occaſion. They came to decide, whether Cæſar had been an uſurper, or a lawful migiſtrate; and whether thoſe who had killed him deſerved puniſhments, or rewards. As none of the conſpirators appeared in the ſenate, not daring to expoſe themſelves to the fury of the rabble, the debates were carried on with more calmneſs and temper than could have been expected in a matter of ſuch conſequence. Moſt of the conſcript fathers were inclined to favour the conſpirators; but nevertheleſs divided among themſelves in their opinions. Some were for declaring them "the deliverers, the ſaviours of their country, and al-"lotting them, as ſuch, ample rewards." Others were for approving approving the action, without appointing any rewards to the authors of it, since no-body demanded them. Some thought it was sufficient to bury in oblivion what was past, without bestowing either praises or rewards on the authors of Cæsar's death. Some of Cæsar's friends declared boldly, that the action was odious and detestable; but that they were nevertheless ready to concur in such measures as should be judged necessary for the safety of those who had committed it, out of a due regard to so many illustrious families. After several different overtures, it was at length concluded by a great majority, that, before the conspirators were declared guilty or innocent, this question should be put, "Whether Cæsar "was a tyrant, or a lawful magistrate?" since on the decision of this depended that of all other questions relating to the conspirators. Antony, foreseeing that this question would be decided to the disadvantage of his party, warded off the blow with an address and dexterity which will seem incredible to those who judge of his abilities from what they read of him in Cicero's letters and speeches. "Have you well "weighed with yourselves, conscript fathers," said he, "the consequence that must attend the decision of this ques- "tion? If you declare the late dictator a tyrant, all his "acts will be of course void and null; and who can con- "ceive what confusion and disorders will hence ensue, not in "this metropolis only, but in all the states and kingdoms sub- "ject to Rome? The republic will be without lawful ma- "gistrates, the provinces without governors, the armies "without commanders, &c. since we have been all invested "in our offices, commands, and governments by Cæsar. "If we pronounce Cæsar a tyrant and usurper, we must "lay down those honours, since we can no longer think "them lawfully conferred upon us. If Cæsar is an usurper, "his body must, pursuant to the ordinances of our ancestors, "be ignominiously dragged through the streets and thrown "into the Tiber. What disturbances and tumults will not "this produce among the populace, who adore him as a "god? You are going, conscript fathers, to plunge the "republic, nay, the whole world, which is filled with "Cæsar's glory, into a bloody war and eternal disorders." Antony's words made a deep impression on the assembly, which was again divided into different opinions. Such as had not been nominated by Cæsar to any civil or military employments, still insisted on his being declared an usurper and tyrant; but all the present magistrates, and those whom Cæsar had appointed to ſucceed them (E), were for dropping the queſtion relating to him, and only decreeing, that no-body ſhould be proſecuted on account of his death. Among the latter was the conſul Dolabella, who, as he had not yet attained the age required by the laws of Rome for the conſular dignity, was well appriſed, that, if he once parted with it, the people would not be eaſily induced to reſtore him, in defiance of the laws, to that poſt. However, ſeveral prætors were prevailed upon by the friends of the conſpirators, that is, by the zealous republicans, to ſtrip themſelves of their robes and publicly reſign the offices, to which Cæſar, by his authority alone, had raiſed them. The diviſion, which reigned in the ſenate, was likely to have involved the republic anew in a civil war, when Cicero, by an excellent ſpeech, which has been tranſmitted to us, not in the language in which he ſpoke it, but in Greek [o], prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to drop the queſtion relating to Cæſar, viz. "Whether he was "a tyrant, or no;" and to paſs an act of oblivion for what was paſt. Accordingly a general amneſty was proclaimed, and at the ſame time it was decreed, contrary to the opinion of Cicero and the moſt zealous patriots, That not the leaſt thing ſhould be altered, which Cæſar had enacted during his government. This was, in a manner, declaring him at the ſame time both innocent and guilty, ſince it was inconſiſtent to confirm what he had done during his dictatorſhip, and at the ſame time decree, that thoſe who had put him to death ſhould not be proſecuted. Cicero, in one of his letters to Atticus, expreſſes himſelf on this ſubject thus; "The tyrant is no more; "but the tyranny ſtill ſubſiſts. We expreſs great joy at his "death, and at the ſame time confirm all his ordinances [p]."

An act of oblivion paſſed, and Cæſar's acts confirmed.

THIS act of oblivion brought matters to a more peaceable poſture. Antony and Lepidus were ſtill reſolved to purſue their revenge on the conſpirators, hoping to raiſe themſelves by

(E) Cæſar, foreſeeing that his intended expedition againſt the Parthians, a brave and warlike nation, would prevent him from returning to Rome for ſome time, had appointed conſuls, as Cicero informs us, for the two following years, viz. Aulus Hirtius and Caius Vibius Panſa for the firſt year after his departure, and Decimus Brutus with Lucius Munatius Plancus for the ſecond. According to Dion Caſſius, he had named conſuls for the three following years; according to Appian for five, and according to Suetonius for many years. But the authority of Cicero ought to be of more weight than that of any hiſtorian, by their deſtruction to the ſame poſt which Cæſar had held; but as they were afraid of each other, and both of Decimus Brutus governor of Ciſalpine Gaul, they artfully concealed their ambitious deſigns, and cauſed the act of oblivion to be publiſhed in all the quarters of the city. As the conſpirators ſtill kept in their aſylum, for fear of ſome ſudden tumult, Antony and Lepidus ſent their children to the capitol as hoſtages for their ſecurity; and then Brutus, Caſſius, and their followers came down into the city. The ſame night, in token of a perfect reconciliation, Antony invited Caſſius to ſupper, as Lepidus did Brutus. As Antony liked joking, he aſked Caſſius, "Whether he had a dagger concealed under his robe?" "Yes, anſwered Caſſius, who was naturally choleric and "ſullen, and a ſharp one too, for any who ſhall dare to aſpire at the ſovereign power." This anſwer put a ſtop to any further jeſts. And now no body doubted, but the republic would ſoon be reſtored to her former tranquillity. Even the populace began to look upon the conſpirators as the deliverers of their country, and honour them with the title of tyrannicides. This tranquillity did no-ways ſuit Antony's ambitious views. He therefore ſoon found means to put the whole city in an uproar, and to incenſe the multitude anew againſt thoſe whom they had deſervedly begun to look upon as worthy of the greateſt honours and rewards. Cæſar, on the ides of September of the preceding year, had made his will in his houſe at Laricum, and appointed his father-in-law Calpurnius Piſo to ſee it executed. To him Marc Antony applied, and preſſed him to produce the will, that it might be publicly read, being well appriſed, that this would produce new diſturbances, and have a great effect on the inconſtant multitude. On the other hand, the dictator's enemies endeavoured to perſuade Piſo to ſuppreſs it; but he, being ſupported by Antony, openly declared, that nothing ſhould divert him from diſcharging the truſt Cæſar had repoſed in him. The affair was at length brought before the ſenate, where it occaſioned freſh diſputes. Antony and Piſo warmly inſiſted on having the will read, and the body of the deceaſed dictator honourably interred. Thoſe, ſaid Piſo, who boaſt of having killed a tyrant, treat us themſelves in a moſt tyrannical manner. They are willing, that whatever Cæſar has done in their behalf ſhould be ratified, and at the ſame time demand, that his laſt diſpoſitions be ſuppreſſed. As to Cæſar's funeral, you may order what you think fit; but as to his will, which he

he has depoſited in my hands, I am reſolved to read it before the whole people. The affair was long debated by both parties and with great warmth, Caſſius violently oppoſing the propoſal of Antony and Piſo, which, if complied with, he foreſaw, would revive the affections of the people and cauſe freſh troubles; but Brutus at length yielded, and it was decreed, that Cæſar's will ſhould be opened, his funeral rites performed at the expence of the public, and he worſhipped as a god. This was an unpardonable overſight in Brutus, and Caſſius loudly complained of his too eaſy condeſcenſion and unſeaſonable humanity; and indeed with a great deal of reaſon: for the reading the will, and the public honours decreed to the deceaſed, proved fatal, both to the avengers of the republic and the republic itſelf. The will being produced was read in the preſence of the people; and there it was found, that he had appointed his three great-nephews his heirs, C. Octavius, Lucius Pinarius, and Quintus Pedius. To Octavius, the grandſon of his ſiſter Julia, he left three-fourths of his eſtate, and the remaining part to the other two. He alſo ordained, that young Octavius, his principal heir, ſhould take his name, and be adopted into the Julian family; and that if any of his great-nephews ſhould die or renounce his inheritance, Decimus Brutus and M. Antony ſhould be ſubſtituted in their room. Several of the conſpirators were appointed guardians to his children, in caſe he ſhould have any; and Decimus Brutus, for whom he had a particular affection, was named to ſucced Octavius, in caſe he ſhould die without iſſue male, and to be adopted into the Julian family. By the ſame will he bequeathed to the Roman people his fine gardens beyond the Tyber, and to each individual citizen the ſum of ſeventy-five Attic drachmas, or three hundred ſeſterces. These laſt tokens of Cæſar's good-will revived the affection of the people for him, and provoked them anew againſt Brutus and his followers, on whom they no longer beſtowed the glorious name of tyrannicides, but that of aſſaſſins, threatening to treat them in the ſame manner as they had treated the dictator their common benefactor. Brutus, perceiving this change, mounted the roſtra in quality of prætor, and, with the following ſpeech, endeavoured to appeaſe the enraged populace. "Great pains have been taken, ſaid he, to "prejudice you againſt us as diſturbers of the public tranquil-"lity. We are accuſed at the ſame time of cruelty, ingrati-"tude, and perfidiouſneſs. It is pretended, that we have "violated the oaths, which tied us to Cæſar. What oaths, "immortal gods! Had Cæſar any lawful power to require "them;

(F) We are told by ſome hiſtorians, that the conſpirators deſigned at firſt to throw the dead body of the dictator into the Tyber, in order to remove that object of compaſſion out of the ſight of the populace; but being prevented from putting their deſign in execution by the tumult which happened in the ſenate, they left it in the ſenate-houſe, from whence it was privately conveyed in a litter to his houſe by three of his ſlaves, who took care to have it embalmed, not doubting, but the ſenate or people would, in due time, order it to be interred with all pomp and magnificence.

(G) Suetonius is the only writer among the antients, who tells us, that Antony pronounced no funeral oration. " The conſul,
" ſays that hiſtorian, made no oration, as was uſual, in commen" dation of the deceaſed. He only ordered an herald to read aloud

oration, enlarging on every topic which could move compaſſion. He enumerated the many victories he had gained, the innumerable conqueſts he had made, the various nations he had ſubdued, &c. Then he took notice of all the titles of honour which the republic had conferred upon him, his dictatorſhip, his being ſeveral times honoured with the conſulate, the cenſorſhip, the dignity of pontifex maximus, and above all, with the glorious name of "the father of his country." From thence he paſſed to his virtues, crying up his courage, his eloquence, his humanity, generoſity, clemency even to his enemies, &c. After this, he repeated the oath which the people of Rome had taken to him, and by which they had ſworn, that his perſon ſhould be ſacred and inviolable, and that they would defend him at the hazard of their own lives. Antony, perceiving the people to be infinitely affected with what he ſaid in commendation of Cæſar, to ſtir them up yet further to compaſſion, or rather to madneſs, unfolded the bloody garment of Cæſar, ſhewed them in how many places it was pierced, and expoſed to their view the number of his wounds. Hereupon Antony, ſeeing rage mixed with grief painted in every one's face, reſumed his diſcourſe, and turning to the capitol, "Great Jupiter, ſaid he, and ye gods protectors of "the Roman empire, I call you to witneſs, that I was determined to revenge his death, and fulfil my obligations; but "the decree of the conſcript fathers has tied my hands. Am "I guilty of ſacrilege and perjury." At theſe words the mob made great outcries, and nothing was heard but, vengeance, vengeance. The ſenators were highly provoked againſt Antony, for thus firing the multitude with new fury; which he obſerving from their countenances and fearing to diſoblige them, in order to reconcile to him that auguſt body, and, in ſome degree, qualify what he had ſaid, concluded thus: "Yes, the gods themſelves abſove me from the obligation of my oath. What has been done ought to be forgot; ſince it is the crime of ſome evil demons, enemies to Rome, rather than of men; and nothing ought now to be thought of, but honouring the memory of the illuſtrious deceaſed, and placing him among the immortal gods [s].

ANTONY ordering divine honours to be paid him. Antony ſpoke only a few words in praiſe of the illuſtrious deceaſed." It is ſurpriſing, that Suetonius ſhould be ignorant of ſo remarkable an incident, related at length by all other hiſtorians, and, what is more by Cicero, who, in his ſecond Philippic, reproaches Antony with it in moſt bitter terms.

ANTONY had ſcarce done ſpeaking, when one of the ſpectators, flying, as ſeized with ſome fury, from the midſt of the croud and mounting the ſtage, laid hold of Cæſar's robe, and diſplaying it again to the multitude, "There is the ſpoil of "a hero, he cried, beloved of the gods and reverenced by the "world even to adoration." Theſe words interrupted with frequent ſighs, uttered with a mournful tone, and accompanied with great outcries and ſtrange poſtures of ſorrow, occaſioned a general commotion. At the ſame time, appeared all on a ſudden an image of Cæſar in wax, which moved by ſprings, and ſhewed the twenty-three wounds which he had received on his face and other parts of his body. This ſight tranſported the populace even to madneſs: the forum reſounded with ſighs mixt with menaces and curſes againſt the authors of his death, whom they ſtyled aſſaſſins, parricides, &c. worthy of the moſt cruel puniſhments. Their fury was ſo great, that they would defer no longer the ſolemnities of the funeral; but tearing to pieces the benches and chairs of the magiſtrates, who held their courts in that place, and carrying away the counters and tables from the adjoining ſhops, raiſed with them a funeral pile, and, placing Cæſar's body upon it, ſet it on fire; ſo that the body, the bed, and the temple were conſumed in a moment. When the fire firſt began to flame out, the old ſoldiers, who had ſerved under the deceaſed, threw into the flames all the military rewards which he had given them. Many women of diſtinction, to teſtify their grief and honour the memory of the deceaſed, threw into the fire their jewels, their children's ornaments and robes, and whatever they had of value about them. The incenſed multitude, whoſe blind fury knows no bounds, flocking in like madmen, in ſpite of the guards placed round the pile, ſnatched the flaming brands out of the fire, and ran to burn the houſes of the conſpirators; but they, having before-hand got together a great number of their friends and domeſtics, eaſily repulſed a diſorderly mob, that had no other arms but their grief and fury. As they were returning from the conſpirators houſes, they met one Cinna (H), who had been always greatly attached to Cæſar's party; but miſtaking him for

(H) We are told, that Cinna, of whom mention is made here, had the night before an odd dream. He fancied that Cæſar invited him to ſupper, and that upon his refuſing to comply with the invitation, the dictator preſſed him very earneſtly, and at length taking him by the hand, led him into a dark place. After this viſion, he was ſeized with a fever; but nevertheleſs in the morning, for another of the ſame name, who was concerned in the conſpiracy, fell upon him and tore him to pieces on the ſpot. Brutus and his party were ſo alarmed at theſe proceedings that they thought it adviſeable to retire from the city; and accordingly they privately withdrew to Antium, with a deſign to return again as ſoon as the fury of the people was abated, which they hoped, would be ſoon, ſince the ſenate had eſpouſed their cauſe. All the ſtrangers in Rome mourned after the cuſtom of their reſpective countries, eſpecially the Jews, who watched ſeveral nights at the place where his body had been burnt (I). At laſt divine honours were given him, and an altar erected by the populace in the ſame place, which was ever after looked upon as ſacred, his great nephew Octavius having cauſed a temple to be erected there, and a pillar of jaſpar twenty foot high, with this inſcription, "To the "father of his country [s]."

morning, hearing that Cæſar's body was to be in[illegible]nd being aſhamed not to be preſent at the ſolemnity, he went into the forum, out of reſpect to the memory of his friend, tho' his dream gave him no ſmall apprehenſion. One of the rabble, whom Antony's ſpeech had ſtirred up and enraged, ſeeing him there, aſked another, Who he was; and having learnt his name, told it to another. It was preſently reported, that he was one of the conſpirators, or what is moſt probable, that he was that Cinna, who had a little before, in a ſpeech to the people, inveighed againſt Cæſar, and this was enough for the furious multitude to tear him to pieces.

(I) No people received more ſignal favours at Cæſar's hands than the Jewiſh nation. He reſtored Hyrcanus, the ſon of Alexander to the ſovereignty of Judæa, and ſecured the crown to him and his family by a decree, which he cauſed to be engraved on tables of braſs in Greek and Latin, and to be hung up in the capitol at Rome, and in the temples of Tyre, Sidon, and Aſkalon in Phænice: he remitted great part of the tributes, which the Jews paid annually to the republic, in acknowledgment of the aſſiſtance he had from the Jewiſh nation in the war of Alexandria: before he left that city, he confirmed all the privileges they enjoyed there and ordered a pillar to be erected, whereon, by his command all theſe privileges were engraved, and alſo his decree confirming them (45).

(45) Joſeph. antiq. l. xiv. c. 17

THE conſpirators and the conſcript fathers were equally offended at the artful ſpeech of Antony. They complained, that, contrary to the decree of the ſenate and his own word, by which it was agreed to bury all that had paſſed in oblivion, he had ſo pathetically enlarged on the praiſes of Cæſar, with no other view but to ſtir up the rage of the people. Antony therefore, finding he had diſcovered himſelf too ſoon, and being well appriſed, that it was in the power of the ſenate to croſs his deſigns, reſolved to regain their favour, or at leaſt to blind them for a while, by inflicting ſevere puniſhments on the authors of the diſturbances, which were daily raiſed in all the quarters of the city. One Amatius, paſſing himſelf upon the multitude for the grandſon of Marius, and giving out that it was incumbent upon him to revenge the death of Cæſar his kinſman, committed every-where great diſorders, being backed by a numerous mob, whom the reputation of his pretended grandfather drew after him. But Antony, to make his court to the ſenate, cauſed him to be ſeized, and put to death, without any farther trial. As the people flocked daily in crowds to the altar, which they had erected to Cæſar, Antony cauſed it to be demoliſhed. This provoked the mutineers, who thereupon aſſembled the next day in great numbers, in order to rebuild the altar; but Dolabella, with the conſent of his collegue, fell upon them at the head of ſome legionaries, and cut ſeveral of them in pieces. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſwords of the legionaries, were proſecuted by the two conſuls, and puniſhed with the utmoſt rigor, as diſturbers of the public tranquillity. The ſlaves were all crucified, and ſuch as were of free condition thrown down from the top of the Tarpeian rock. Such vigorous proceedings ſtruck the unruly multitude with terror, and for a while reſtored the city to its former tranquillity. After this, Antony, having aſſembled the ſenate, aſſured the conſcript fathers, that thenceforth his whole attention ſhould be how to re-unite the people's minds, divided on this fatal occaſion, and to prevent the calamities of a civil war. At the ſame time, to gain the fathers entirely, he propoſed the recalling of Sextus Pompeius, ſon to Pompey the Great, who, ever ſince the battle of Munda, had concealed himſelf in Celtiberia. He was even of opinion, that the loſs of his paternal eſtate, which had been confiſcated by Cæſar and divided among his creatures, ſhould be made good to him at the expence of the public, and that the ſupreme command of all the naval forces of the republic ſhould be conferred upon him, in the ſame unlimited manner as his father had enjoyed it before him. This propoſal was heard heard with ſurprize, and received with general applauſe. Some aſcribed this change in Antony to his fear of the conſpirators; others ſuſpected, that he was deſirous of engaging the ſenate in his favour againſt young Octavius, the dictator's heir, who was on his journey from Greece to Rome. All the ſenators, however, beſtowed on him the greateſt commendations, which were ſo much the ſincerer, as the reſtoration of young Pompey ſeemed to be an implicit condemnation of Cæſar's memory. Cicero himſelf, deceived by this falſe appearance of zeal, highly commended Antony's conduct, firſt in the ſenate, and afterwards in a letter he wrote to him, which the conſul kept, and in due time made public by way of anſwer to the orator's bitter invectives.

THE conſcript fathers were highly pleaſed with ſuch a conduct in a conſul and friend of Cæſar; but the populace, extremely provoked at his thus changing ſides, reproached him with ingratitude to the memory of his benefactor. Antony failed not to make himſelf a merit with the ſenate of this averſion. He even pretended to be afraid, leſt the enraged multitude ſhould make ſome attempt upon his life, and, as [illegible] were not ſafe, demanded a guard of the ſenate to ſec[illegible]nſelf againſt the rabble, who, he ſaid, threatened h[illegible] with deſtruction. The conſcript fathers could not well reject his requeſt, ſince he had incurred the hatred of the people for the intereſt of the ſenate. They allowed him therefore a guard for the ſecurity of his perſon; but Antony, under this pretence, choſe ſix thouſand old legionaries, who had ſerved with him under Cæſar, and paſſionately longed to revenge the death of their general. The ſe[illegible]e was alarmed to ſee the conſul walk the ſtreets of Ro[illegible]e always attended with ſuch a number of armed men. Even his friends remonſtrated to him, that ſuch an extraordinary attendance made him ſuſpected and odious in a free ſtate. Antony promiſed to diſband them, as ſoon as he thought himſelf out of danger; and, in the mean time, to remove the ſuſpicions they might entertain of his aſpiring to ſucceed Cæſar in the dictatorſhip, he propoſed a law abrogating that dignity for ever, and got it paſſed in the aſſembly of the people. This calmed for a while the fears of the conſcript fathers: but Antony ſoon gave them freſh motives of jealouſy; for having gained over to his intereſt Cæſar's ſecretary, whom ſome call Faberius, others Tabirius, and by his means made himſelf maſter of all his papers, he appointed what officers he pleaſed, brought whom he thought fit into the ſenate, recalled ſome from exile, freed others out of priſon, &c. and all this as ordered ſo by His falſehood and doubledealing in concert with Cæſar's ſecretary.

Cæſar, whoſe acts had been declared void by the ſenate. The Romans, by way of raillery, called thoſe new magiſtrates and ſenators Charonites, becauſe, if obliged to prove their patents, they muſt have had recourſe to the regiſters of the dead, that is, of thoſe who had paſſed the river Styx in Charon's bark. They were alſo ſtyled Orcini, an epithet given to ſuch ſlaves as were enfranchiſed by their maſters will made on their death-bed. Antony, having by this artifice introduced many of his own creatures into the ſenate, began to act with great independency, knowing he had nothing to fear either from the conſcript fathers or the populace, ſince he had now a ſtrong party in the ſenate, and was guarded by a numerous body of choſen troops againſt the inſults and attempts of the multitude. Beſides, the whole authority of the government was, we may ſay, in his hands. He was himſelf conſul, one of his brothers, Lucius Antonius, was tribune of the people, and the other, C. Antonius, prætor; ſo that, without taking upon him the title either of king or dictator, it may be ſaid, that he governed Rome with an abſolute ſway [t]. As for Lepidus, Antony attached that powerful Roman to his intereſt, by procuring for him the dignity of pontifex maximus, vacant by the death of Cæſar, and betrothing his daughter Antonia to young Lepidus his ſon.

In the mean time, ſome of the conſpirators returned to Rome, while others continued at Antium. Among the latter was M. Brutus, who, upon intelligence that many of the old ſoldiers, who had ſerved under Cæſar, of whom they had received lands, lay in wait for him, and by ſmall parties had ſtolen into the city, would not expoſe himſelf to unneceſſary dangers. However, in his abſence, moſt magnificent ſhews were exhibited to the people at his expence, he being then prætor; for having bought up a great number of wild beaſts of all ſorts, he gave poſitive orders, that not one of them ſhould be diſpoſed of or ſaved; but that they ſhould be all uſed in thoſe ſhews. He even went in perſon as far as Naples to engage a conſiderable number of comedians, and wrote to Cicero and his other friends, begging them by no means to omit honouring his ſhews with their preſence [u]. Cæſar, had, before his death, allotted provinces to the chief men among the conſpirators, viz. Macedon to M. Brutus,

However that be, they ſtill continued in or near the capital, to watch Antony's ſteps, who now manifeſtly aſpired, notwithſtanding all his former proteſtations, at the ſovereign power.

SUCH was the poſture of affairs, when news was brought, that young Octavius, Cæſar's great-nephew and adopted ſon, was coming to take poſſeſſion of his inheritance. He was the ſon of Caius Octavius of the ſenatorial order, who had been prætor of Macedon, and of Accia, daughter to Julia Cæſar's ſiſter. The Octavian family was divided into two branches, viz. the Cneii and the Caii. The former were early diſtinguiſhed at Rome with the firſt honours of the republic; but the latter, from whom Cæſar's adopted ſon was deſcended, were but ſimple knights at the time of the ſecond Punic war. Octavius's great-grandfather ſerved in Sicily in quality of legionary tribune, and his grandfather bore the firſt employments in Velitræ, his native city. His mother Accia, or Atia, was the daughter of Julia and M. Accius Balbus, whoſe family, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, had been, long before the birth of Octavius, one of the moſt conſpicuous of Aricia, an antient city of Latium (K). Octavius was born

Octavius origin.

(K) Marc Antony reproached Octavius with the meanneſs and obſcurity of his anceſtors. According to him, Octavius's great-grandfather, on the father's ſide, was a freed-man, and by profeſſion a rope-maker in the territory of Thurium, and his grand father a banker. On the mother's ſide, Antony derived his pedigree from a perfumer, who afterwards turned baker in the city of Aricia. Caſſius Parmenſis, in a letter he wrote to Octavius before the battle of Actium, told him that he owed his birth to a money-changer and a woman brought up in the mills of Aricia. But theſe calumnies are learnedly rejected by Joſeph Rocco Volpi, an Italian jeſuit, in his account of the antiquities of the antient Latium, where he proves from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, that the Octavian family, before their migration to Rome, which happened, according to him, in the reign of Tarquinius Priſcus, had borne the firſt employments in the republic of Velitræ, now Velletri. As to the Atian family, he ſhews, that, for ſeveral ages before the birth of Octavius, it had been one of the moſt conſpicuous of Aricia. Virgil indeed derives the

in the conſulate of Cicero and Caius Antonius, that is, in the year of Rome 690. His father Caius Octavius dying when he was but four years old, his mother Accia married again, and took to her a ſecond huſband Lucius Marcius Philippus, deſcended from thoſe Philippi, who ſignalized themſelves in the Macedonian wars. From his infancy he bore the ſurname of Thurinus, borrowed, as Suetonius conjectures, from his father, who drove the remains of Catiline's army from the neighbourhood of Thurium, a city of Great Greece, and was from thence ſtyled Thurinus. Accia, his mother and Philippus his father-in-law took care to have him educated and inſtructed by the beſt maſters then in Rome; and he is ſaid to have ſo profited by their inſtructions, that at nine years old he harangued the people with wonderful intrepidity, and pronounced the funeral oration of his grandmother Julia when he was not quite twelve. All the writers of his age tell us, that from his infancy he gave glaring proofs of an exalted mind, capable of managing the moſt difficult enterprizes. His extraordinary parts, ſay they, joined to the majeſty of his mein and comelineſs of his perſon, influenced in his favour all who knew, or only beheld, him. Above the reſt, Julius Cæſar, his great uncle, was ſo taken with his prudent conduct and a certain maturity of judgment, which young Octavius diſcovered from his tender years, that he cheriſhed him, with Many writers, and among the reſt F. Volpi, are of opinion, that Octavius was brought up in the town of Ulubræ, ſituated in the diſtrict of Velitræ; for Suetonius tells us, that he was educated " in avito ſuburbano prope Velitras;" and that, as ſoon as he ſpoke, he commanded the frogs that were croaking to be ſilent, and from that time, adds he, " negantur ibi coaxare." From this paſſage they infer, that Octavius was brought up in a place near Velitræ, which abounded with frogs, and conſequently at Ulubræ, which was in the territory of Velitræ; and as it was ſituated in the midſt of the Pomptine marſhes, muſt of courſe have been well ſtocked with frogs (47). Hence it is, that Tully calls the inhabitants of this town frogs, becauſe, like frogs, they lived in the midſt of marſhes (48).

with all the tenderneſs of a father, and very early formed the deſign of adopting him, in caſe he had no children of his own. He deſigned to take him with him into Spain, when he went thither to make war on the ſons of Pompey, that he might have an opportunity of inſtructing him in the military art; but his mother Accia, alarmed at a ſlight indiſpoſition, with which he was ſeized when upon the point of departing, kept him in Rome till that war was near ended, the battle of Munda being fought before he reached Spain. He intended to carry him with him to the Parthian war, and with this view ſent him before to Apollonia, on the other ſide of the Adriatic, to wait for him there, and in the mean time improve his talent for eloquence under the famous rhetorician Apollodorus of Pergamus. He had been ſix months in Apollonia, when he received the news of his uncle's tragical death. which moſt ſenſibly afflicted him. At firſt he knew not whether the whole ſenate was privy to his death, or whether he had fallen by a conſpiracy of his private enemies; but, a few days after, he was informed that ſixty ſenators of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome had been in the plot; that even thoſe who had no ſhare in it, did, however, ſecretly favour the conſpirators, whom they looked upon as the deliverers of their country; that this party was very powerful; that Antony, Lepidus, and the other friends of his great-uncle, under pretence of avenging his death, aimed at nothing elſe but to eſtabliſh their own power; that the city was filled with troubles and commotions occaſioned by the animoſity of different parties, &c. At the ſame time he received letters from his mother and father-in-law, and his other friends and relations, adviſing him to forbear for the preſent declaring either his pretenſions or reſentment, ſince there could be no ſafety for him, but in an obſcure and private life. Some of his friends went even ſo far as to adviſe him to renounce Cæſar's adoption, leſt he ſhould be involved in the ſame fate with his uncle. Others would fain have perſuaded him to ſeek for ſhelter among the troops in Macedon, which had, for the moſt part, ſerved under Cæſar, and were appointed to attend him in his expedition againſt the Parthians. But Octavius, rejecting the timorous counſels of his friends, reſolved to paſs over into Italy without delay, to inform himſelf on the ſpot of the ſituation of affairs. Accordingly he went on board a ſmall veſſel, and, paſſing the Adriatic ſea, landed at Lupia, now known by the name of La Rocca, between Brunduſium and Hydruntum. The former of theſe two cities was the uſual place of landing for thoſe who came from the eaſt; but Octavius thought it adviſeable not to ſhew himſelf there, the place being full of ſoldiers, till he had, by means of ſome dexterous perſons, ſounded the diſpoſitions of both the inhabitants and garriſon. The latter no ſooner heard of the arrival of their late general's ſon, than they went out in a body to meet him, and introduced him in a kind of triumph into the city. Octavius thanked them for their attachment and reſpect to the memory of his uncle, and, after having offered a ſolemn ſacrifice to the gods, declared himſelf Cæſar's heir and ſon by adoption, called himſelf no longer Caius Octavius, but Caius Julius Cæſar Octavianus (L); and by the latter name we ſhall diſtinguiſh him, following therein moſt of the antients, till he acquires that of Auguſtus, which was given him by the ſenate after the victory he gained over Antony at Actium. His thus taking the name of Cæſar, and declaring himſelf his heir in ſo critical a conjuncture, was, no doubt, a bold ſtep in a youth ſcarce eighteen years old; the more, becauſe it was againſt the advice of his friends and relations: but from his firſt ſetting out, fortune ſeemed to eſpouſe his cauſe; and indeed his riſe ſeems to us more owing to fortune, that is, to ſeaſonable conjunctures, and to the great reputation of his uncle, whoſe memory was adored by the ſoldiery and populace, than to any extraordinary parts of his own. All the writers of his time, whether hiſtorians or poets, men of great wit, but notorious flatterers, repreſent him as the greateſt commander, the ableſt ſtateſman, and the moſt accompliſhed prince, the world ever ſaw; but whether he deſerved the praiſes, which they ſo laviſhly beſtowed upon him and for which they were amply rewarded, is a queſtion which muſt be decided by facts. But to proceed: the garriſon of Brunduſium, which was very numerous and conſiſted for the moſt part of brave veterans, whom Cæſar intended to lead againſt the Parthians, not only offered their ſervices to Octavianus tavianus, but put him in poſſeſſion of all the military ſtores and proviſions, which Cæſar had prepared for his Parthian expedition and conveyed to Brunduſium, in order to be tranſported from thence into the eaſt. At the ſame time, Octavianus had the good luck to intercept the tributes, which were ſent annually to Rome from the provinces on the other ſide of the ſea, and likewiſe the proviſions and money deſigned for the ſupport and payment of the troops of the republic in Macedon. Theſe Octavianus ſeized for his own uſe, which was, according to the laws of Rome, a capital crime, and would have been puniſhed with death in leſs turbulent times; but Octavianus, young as he was, had already reſolved to make himſelf maſter of the republic, under the ſpecious pretence of revenging his uncle's death. Being thus ſupplied at once with men, money, arms, and proviſions, he ſet out from Brunduſium, and took his rout through Campania to Rome. On the fourteenth of the calends of May he arrived at Naples, and the next day went to viſit Cicero at his country-houſe in the neighbourhood of Cumæ, whither the orator had retired for fear of Antony, who now governed Rome with an abſolute ſway. Of this viſit Cicero himſelf makes mention in one of his epiſtles to Atticus [w]. Octavianus wanted a man of Cicero's elequence and authority to ſupport his intereſt in the ſenate, and Cicero, one of Octavianus's credit among the troops to ſcreen him againſt the attempts of Antony, with whom he had quarrelled. It was therefore agreed between them that Cicero ſhould aſſiſt Octavianus with his eloquence, both in the ſenate and with the people, and that Octavianus, on the other hand, ſhould defend Cicero againſt all his enemies eſpecially M. Agreement between Cicero and Octavianus.

[w] Cic ad Attic. l. xiv. ep. 10.

(M) We are told by Plutarch, that Cicero had long had a tender regard for young Octavius, which, if that writer is to be credited, was occaſioned by the following dream: While Pompey and Cæſar were yet alive, ſays Plutarch, Cicero, in a dream, ſeemed to ſummon the ſons of the ſenators into the capitol, as if Jupiter deſigned to declare one of them the ſovereign of Rome. The citizens, haſtening thither out of curioſity, ſurrounded the temple; and the youths, ſitting in their purple robes, kept a profound ſilence. On a ſudden the doors opened, and the youths ariſing paſſed one by one before the god, who reviewed them all one after another, and diſmiſſed them; at which they ſeemed much

Octavianus purſued his journey to Rome, being joined, as he paſſed through Campania, by the moſt conſiderable of his uncle's friends, his relations, free-men, and even his ſlaves. The veterans likewiſe, to whom Cæſar, after the civil war, had given lands in Italy, haſtened from all parts to offer their ſervice to his adopted ſon. As he drew near Rome, moſt of the magiſtrates, the officers of the army, and the people came out in throngs to meet him. Of all the friends and creatures of the dictator, Antony alone neglected to pay him the leaſt reſpect; nay he did not ſo much as deign to ſend any of his ſervants or attendants to compliment him in his name; but of this young Octavianus took no notice, being unwilling, on ſo trifling an account, to diſoblige one, with whom he had affairs of much greater moment to tranſact. His friends indeed could not forbear publicly condemning the pride and ingratitude of Antony; but Octavianus, with a ſeeming good temper, excuſed him on account of his great age and the prerogatives of the conſular dignity. "It behoves me, who "am but a young man, and in a private ſtation," ſaid he, "to wait the firſt on one who is my ſenior, and in the higheſt poſt of the republic. Accordingly he reſolved to make him a viſit the next morning; but, as he deſigned to have his adoption firſt ratified by the prætor according to the Roman cuſtom, he deſires his friends to meet him early the next morning in the forum, with as many attendants as they could get together, in order to aſſiſt at that ceremony. His friends and relations, with numerous crowds of clients and attendants, accompanied him early in the morning, purſuant to his requeſt, into the forum, where he proved before Caius, the brother much diſpleaſed: but when it came to Octavius's turn to be reviewed, Jupiter, ſtretching forth his hand, ſaid aloud, "This "O Romans! this young man, when he ſhall become maſter of "Rome, ſhall put an end to all your cruel wars." The ſame author adds, that Cicero, by this viſion had framed a perfect idea of the youth and preſerved it in his mind, tho' he did not know him. The next day as he was going down into the campus Martius, he met the boys returning from their exerciſes, and the firſt he ſaw was young Octavius juſt as he had appeared to him in his dream. Being greatly ſurpriſed at this, he aſked him who he was; and hearing he was the grandſon of Julia, Cæſars's ſiſter, from that time he ſaluted him where-ever he met him, and ſhewed on all occaſions a particular regard for him. But we do not find one word of this in all Cicero's works; and yet it is not to be preſumed, that he would have concealed ſo ſignificant a dream from his friend Atticus.

ther of Antony, at that time prætor urbanus or city prætor, his adoption, declared with the uſual ceremonies his acceptance of the ſame, and cauſed this his acceptance to be regiſtered by the public ſcribes or notaries. From the forum Octavianus went ſtrait to Pompey's gardens, where Antony then reſided, he having appropriated them to himſelf upon that great man's death. The conſul made him wait a great while at the gate, to let him know, by that affected diſregard, how much he was above him, and what degree of authority he deſigned to maintain over him. At length he admitted him into his apartment, and received him with great politeneſs and civility. Octavianus ſpoke firſt. He began with returning thanks to Antony for his attachment to the memory of his father, and the panegyric he made at his funeral. Then he modeſtly complained of his having ſuffered a pardon to paſs in favour of the conſpirators, whom he might have puniſhed with as much ſeverity, and as arbitrarily, as he had done the impoſtor Amatius. He reminded him in a very handſome manner of Cæſar's friendſhip to him, and of the many good offices he had done him. He conjured him, by the memory of his friend and benefactor, to aſſiſt him in revenging his death, at leaſt not to oppoſe him in ſo laudable an undertaking. In the cloſe of his ſpeech he gave Antony to underſtand, that he was reſolved to pay immediately the legacies which his father had left to the people and ſoldiery, and therefore deſired him to deliver up to him, as Cæſar's chief heir, the money which he had cauſed to be conveyed from Cæſar's houſe to his own; "But as that," ſaid he, "will hardly "be ſufficient to diſcharge all my obligations, I ſhall be "highly obliged to you, if you will either lend me ſome of "your own, or procure me ſome at intereſt from the queſt-"ors, that I may pay off what ſhall remain due to thoſe "whom my father has remembered in his will. As for his "moveables, I am willing you ſhould keep them, as marks "of his affection; but for the ready money I have preſent "occaſion, and therefore hope you will order it, without "delay, to be delivered to me." Antony, amazed at the young man's boldneſs, and piqued at what he ſaid in the cloſe of his ſpeech relating to his father's money, which, according to Plutarch, amounted to no leſs than four thouſand talents, told him with an air of authority, That he was very much miſtaken, if he fancied, that Cæſar had left him heir of the Roman empire, as well as of his name and fortune; that his death ought to have taught his adopted ſon, that the conſtitution of the commonwealth allowed neither of hereditary tary nor elective ſovereigns; and that therefore he ought not do demand reaſons of a Roman conſul for what he had done in the government of the commonwealth. As for the obligations, which he pretended to owe him on account of the honours which he had procured for his father's memory, he willingly acquitted him of them all, ſince what he had done was without any regard to him, and only deſigned for the good of his country. However, added he, to me alone you are indebted for his name and his eſtate; for had Cæſar been treated like an uſurper, which I alone prevented, there had been neither will, inheritance, nor adoption: but I ſecured to him the honours due to his memory, and by that means his name and eſtate to you, even at the hazard of my own life. 'Tis true, I have ſuffered ſome decrees to paſs in the ſenate favourable to the conſpirators; but I have been prompted thereunto by reaſons, which one of your age is not capable of diſcerning. As to Cæſar's money, which you demand, it does not amount to ſo great a ſum as you imagine; beſides, as it belonged to the commonwealth, from which your father took it, it has been, in great part, ſhared among the magiſtrates ſince his death, who are to lay it out according to the exigencies of the ſtate. As for what remains, I am ready to put it into your hands; but give me leave to adviſe you, young man, not to lay it out in largeſſes and gratifications: employ it rather in ſending back to their reſpective colonies that ſhoal of followers, who attended you hither. The populace is a monſter that will never be ſatisfied, and will always requite the good offices of their fellow-citizens with the baſeſt ingratitude. As you are converſant in the Grecian hiſtory, you muſt know, that the favourites of the people are, generally ſpeaking, ſhort-lived, and that the popular affection is more inconſtant than the waves of the ocean [x].

Octavianus, highly offended at this ſpeech, took his leave of Antony, repeating ſeveral times, as he went out of the door, the name of Cæſar. He was well appriſed, that the conſul kept his father's money and eſtate from him, with no other view but to diſable him from purchaſing the favour of the people. He therefore reſolved to expoſe to public ſale all the houſes and lands that belonged to the dictator, declaring, that he had not accepted his inheritance, had it not been to prevent Antony from depriving ſo many families of the effects of Cæſar's far's bounty towards them; but the conſul, to put a ſtop to the ſale, prevailed upon ſome private citizens to claim the lands, as the eſtates of their anceſtors, which the dictator had appropriated to himſelf during the civil war. At the ſame time the quæſtors and other officers of the revenue, at the inſtigation of the conſul, claimed part of thoſe lands, as having been confiſcated for the uſe of the public. Hereupon Octavianus, foreſeeing the affair would be drawn out to a great length, inſtantly put up to ſale his own patrimony, with the eſtates of his mother and father-in-law, who willingly parted with them to promote his deſigns, and aſſiſt him in purchaſing the favour of the people. With the money accruing from theſe ſales he paid part of his father's legacies; which affected generoſity ſo charmed the populace, who expected more favours from him, that they all declared in his favour, and broke out into bitter invectives againſt Antony, for withholding from him his father's eſtate. A few days after, a new diſpute aroſe between Antony and Octavianus, on occaſion of the public ſhews, which Crotonius exhibited during his ædileſhip. The ſenate had decreed, as we have related above, in Cæſar's life-time, that at all public ſhews, a gilt chair and a crown of gold ſhould be placed for him even after his death, to make the memory of that great man immortal. Purſuant to this decree, Octavianus failed not to ſend the chair and crown; but the ædile, gained over by Antony, refuſed to admit them. Hereupon the affair being carried before the conſul, Antony anſwered coldly, That he would refer it to the ſenate; "And I," anſwered Octavianus haughtily, "will go and place my father's chair where "it ought to ſtand, while you are conſulting the conſcript "fathers." Antony, provoked at the young man's boldneſs, threatened to ſend him to priſon, if he offered to bring forth his father's chair and crown, either at the games of Crotonius, or at thoſe which he himſelf was to exhibit in honour of the dictator before the temple of Venus. Octavianus, perceiving that his prohibition was ill received by the people, reſolved to turn it to his advantage; and accordingly going into the forum, complained there to the multitude of the injury done to the memory of his father, addreſſing himſelf to Antony, as if he had been preſent: "Why ſhould your hatred "to me," ſaid he, "extend to Cæſar who deſerved well of "you? Why do you endeavour to prevent me from paying "thoſe honours to the memory of my father, which you your"ſelf procured, and the ſenate decreed for him? Sacrifice "me, if you pleaſe, to your revenge; but do not thus revile "the manes of a great man, to whom you owe your preſent "dignity.

" dignity. Suffer me at leaſt, O Antony, to diſcharge thoſe " legacies, which he has left to his fellow-citizens; I freely " abandon to your inſatiable avarice all the reſt. I ſhall think " myſelf rich enough, if I can but do juſtice to his memory, " by diſtributing among the people what he has left them by " his will." This diſcourſe incenſed the populace againſt Antony; every one deteſted his ingratitude; even his own guards, who had all ſerved under Cæſar, threatened to abandon him, if he continued to perſecute the ſon of their general. Hereupon Antony, finding it behoved him to diſſemble, notwithſtanding his paſſion againſt young Octavianus, anſwered, That he preſerved a tender regard for the memory of Cæſar, and had alſo a great value for his ſon; but that as the young man, proud of the name of Cæſar, pretended to put himſelf upon the level with a conſul, he thought himſelf obliged to make him ſenſible of the difference there was between a private citizen and the chief magiſtrate of the republic; but that he was ready to forget all that was paſt, provided Octavianus would for the future, pay him that reſpect and deference, to which his office and age entitled him. This explanation was, at the requeſt of the officers, followed by an interview, in which, after mutual proteſtations of friendſhip, they promiſed to aſſiſt each other in revenging Cæſar's death and perſecuting the authors of it[x].

They are reconciled.

In this pretended reconciliation with Octavianus, Antony had his private views. As the conſular year was near expiring, he hoped, by the intereſt of Octavianus, to procure for himſelf the province of Ciſalpine Gaul, which had been given to Decimus Brutus by the dictator, and confirmed to him after his death by a decree of the ſenate. As he knew the importance of that government with reſpect to all Italy, he remonſtrated to Octavianus, that ſince he was generouſly diſpoſed to revenge the death of his father, he ought not to ſuffer one of his aſſaſſins to enjoy a command at the very gates of Rome. Octavianus fell into the ſnare, and promiſed to aſſiſt him with all his intereſt. Hereupon the affair was brought before the ſenate, where it met with great oppoſition, the conſcript fathers looking upon the cauſe of the conſpirators as the ſame with that of liberty. Beſides, they could not turn Brutus out of the province which Cæſar had allotted to him, without reverſing the decree by which they had confirmed all his acts. The propoſal was therefore rejected by a great majority; nay, there were not wanting ſome, who, well appriſed of Antony's ambitious views, propoſed declaring that province a free ſtate, rather rather than truſting the government of it to one, who would make uſe of it as a place of arms, and from thence awe the capital; but as that province ſeemed very convenient for his deſigns, Anthony had recourſe to the people, whoſe tribunes he had bribed; and the undiſcerning multitude, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the ſenate, granted him the government he deſired. On this occaſion Octavianus employed all his intereſt in favour of Antony, and it was chiefly by his intrigues and under-hand management, that the conſul carried his point. The conſcript fathers immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to Brutus, acquainting him with what had paſſed, adviſing him not to deliver up the province to Antony; but to fortify himſelf there, and keep out the conſul, if neceſſary, by force of arms [x].

Antony obtains of the people the province of Ciſalpine Gaul.

THE friends of Cæſar triumphed on account of the reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony, but, as the intereſts of the two rivals were ſo widely oppoſite, each of them aſpiring at the ſame power which Cæſar had enjoyed, it was impoſſible they ſhould continue long united. Antony, thinking himſelf now maſter of Italy, began to thwart Octavianus's meaſures and regard him leſs; nay, he commanded him, under ſevere penalties, to forbear bribing the populace with his largeſſes: and becauſe Octavianus, by the great intereſt he had among the people, was likely to get Flaminius, one of his creatures, named to the tribunate, Antony employed all his credit and authority with the multitude to poſtpone the election. Thus the hatred and averſion of the two rivals were kindled anew. Antony never mentioned Octavianus, but with the epithets of a "raſh, turbulent" and "ſeditious young man;" while Octavianus, on the other hand, left no ſtone unturned to ſtir up the reſentment of the people againſt Antony, The ſenate was overjoyed at this diviſion; but Antony's guards and the late dictator's friends did not fail to remonſtrate to him anew the dangerous conſequences of their diſagreement, and to exhort Antony to be reconciled again to the ſon of their general: "Both your ſafety and ours," ſaid they, "depends upon the "undoing of the conſpirators. If their party prevails, we muſt "expect to be proſcribed, as the miniſters and accomplices of "an uſurper. Nothing can ſupport our party but your union with young Octavianus. "his father." Antony was no leſs deſirous of deſtroying the conſpirators than his ſoldiers and officers: but he could not brook it ſhould be owing to Octavianus. He was afraid, that under pretence of revenging Cæſar's death, he might ſeize on the ſovereign power, after having ruined the republican party. This was the ſecret motive that prompted him to oppoſe Octavianus, whom he ſaw greatly beloved both by the ſoldiery and people. However, as it much concerned him not to diſoblige the officers and legionaries, who had followed him ſince the dictator's death, he undertook to juſtify his conduct to them in the following harangue, which is related at length by Appian[y], and unravels all the myſteries of his wicked policy. After having given them an account of the diſturbances that hapened in the city upon the firſt news of Cæſar's death, he goes on thus: "The general cry was, that the "republic was reſtored, and the ſenate ſeemed diſpoſed to "decree a reward for the aſſaſſins, as the authors of liberty. "If this had been effected, Cæſar had been declared a ty-"rant, and we all involved in the ſame ſentence as his accom-"plices; but I alone ſtood up againſt all the conſpirators, their "relations, their friends, and, I may ſay, againſt the ſenate it-"ſelf. Their adherents foreſeeing, that, if Cæſar was not de-"clared a tyrant, the conſpirators might be puniſhed, were "very ſanguine for having his memory branded with infamy. "As both parties defended their opinions with obſtinacy, I "thought it adviſeable to propoſe a general pardon for the con-"ſpirators, rather than a reward. In ſhort, I am determined at all " adventures to revenge your general's death, and uſe my " utmoſt endeavours to compaſs the total ruin of all who " have had any hand in his murder. Such has hitherto been " my conduct, ſuch are at preſent my deſigns, which I was " unwilling to conceal from you, who are to aſſiſt me in the " execution of them." This ſpeech ſatisfied his officers; yet they inſiſted on his being reconciled anew to Octavianus, with whom, at their requeſt, he had a ſecond interview in the capitol, which ended in mutual engagements and promiſes to aſſiſt each other, as the former had done; but notwithſtanding their pretended reconciliation, they parted juſt as ſincere friends as they were before. Octavianus was willing, that Antony, as his father's creature, ſhould aſſiſt him in revenging Cæſar's death; but would not put him at the head of a party, which, after the defeat of the conſpirators, would be maſter of the republic. On the other hand, Antony, quite indifferent about the revenging of Cæſar's death, only pretended to be in earneſt, to ingratiate himſelf with the ſoldiery and populace. The ſovereign power was what he aimed at, and whoever traverſed him in the purſuit of it, whether Octavianus, Brutus, or Caſſius, was equally odious t· him.

Is reconciled anew to Octavianus.

And now Antony, the more to attach his colleague Cornelius Dolabella to his intereſt, and at the ſame time to weaken the party of the conſpirators, perſuaded him to demand the government of Syria, which had been allotted by Cæſar to Caſſius, and the command of the army which the dictator had deſigned to lead againſt the Parthians. The ſenate, highly offended at ſuch an unſeaſonable demand, remonſtrated to him, that it was an inſult both upon the memory of Cæſar, who had given that government to Caſſius, and upon them, who had, by a ſpecial decree, confirmed all his ordinances; but Dolabella, who was now wholly addicted to Antony, anſwered, that Caſſius had firſt tranſgreſſed the ordinances of Cæſar; and that a traitor, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his friend and benefactor, ought not to have any ſhare in his favours. As the ſenate continued inflexible, the affair was brought before the people, who readily granted the government of Syria to Dolabella, in hopes of ſeeing a ſpeedy vengeance taken of the dictator's enemies, without conſidering, that their death would be immediately followed with the loſs of their own liberty. Antony, taking advantage of the preſent diſpoſition of the people, prevailed upon them at the ſame time to confer on his brother Caius Antonius the government ment of Macedon and Illyricum, which had been given to M. Brutus. By these new promotions Brutus and Cassius were deprived of their governments; but the senate, who placed all their hopes in these brave patriots, and were equally jealous of Octavianus and Antony, procured other provinces for them, viz. Cyrene and Crete for Cassius, and Bithynia for Brutus [a].

A new breach between Antony and Octavianus.

As the reconciliation of Antony and Octavianus was forced and no-ways sincere, their pretended friendship was but short-lived. A few days after they had mutually engaged in the capitol to assist each other, Antony caused some of his guards to be put under arrest, giving out, that they had been corrupted by Octavianus to murder him. This point has never been well cleared up. Some writers are of opinion, that it was only a fetch of Antony's to estrange the minds of the people from his rival. Others seemed inclined to believe, that Octavianus had really formed such a design, and that he was put upon it by the conscript fathers, with whom he was at that time upon very good terms. Cicero, tho' a friend to Octavianus, does not question the fact; but endeavours to turn it to the glory of Octavianus, as if he ought to be highly commended for attempting to deliver the republic from so cruel an enemy. There were not wanting some among the zealous republicans, who imagined, that the whole was agreed on before-hand between the heads of the two parties, that they might have a plausible pretence to raise troops for the accomplishment of their private designs; but their ensuing conduct sufficiently shewed, that each of them sought the other's destruction, and aspired to remain alone at the head of the party, which was opposite to that of the conspirators.

They both arm.

With this view they began now both to raise forces. Antony sent orders to his brother Caius, for whom he had procured the government of Macedon, to bring over into Italy four of the legions that were quartered in that province. He flattered himself, that Lepidus, who was now in Spain at the head of four legions, and Plancus, who commanded three more in Transalpine Gaul, would declare for him. On the other hand, Octavianus, fearing to be surprised and crushed by his enemy, hastened into Campania, where he drew together ten thousand brave veterans, who had served under Cæsar, and had been rewarded by him for their service with lands in that part of Italy. To these the name of Evocati was first given, because after they had served their legal time, and received the

the rewards due to their valour, they were again invited into the army. He likewiſe found means to corrupt with large preſents and gain over two of Antony's legions, the Martial and the fourth. Having thus raiſed an army of his own authority, without being inveſted either with a military title, or any magiſtracy which gave him right to head the forces of the republic; eſpecially againſt a conſul, he marched ſtrait to Rome; but thought it adviſeable to halt at the temple of Mars, about two miles from the city, till he obtained the conſent of the people for his entry. Canutius, a tribune of the people, in an harangue to the multitude, aſſured them, that young Octavianus had no other view, in entering Rome with ſo numerous a guard, but to protect them and himſelf from the inſults and dangerous attempts of the cruel and ambitious conſul. The populace, always ſhort in their foreſight, believed their tribune, and ſuffered Octavianus to enter the city with all his forces. Antony was then at Brunduſium, whither he had gone to appeaſe a tumult, which ſome mutineers had raiſed among the Macedonian legions; but as he was hourly expected back, both with his own guards and the other legions which had remained faithful to him, no-body doubted, but a civil war would ſoon be kindled within the very walls of Rome. In this perſuaſion ſome ſided with Antony, others with Octavianus; but the moſt diſcerning among the ſenators declared for neither, affecting to ſtand neuter, and, in the mean time, ſtirring up under-hand the heads of the two parties againſt each other, not without hopes of ſeeing them both undone by their mutual hatred [b]. Cicero, out of the averſion he bore to Antony, ſided with Octavianus, whom he had aſſiſted with his advice ever ſince his firſt arrival in Italy, omitting no occaſion to diſcredit his rival Antony both with the ſenate and people, as plainly appears from thoſe inimitable declamations which have reached us, and are known by the name of Philippics, a name borrowed from the orations which Demoſthenes wrote againſt Philip the father of Alexander. M. Brutus, who was ſtill in the neighbourhood of Rome, wrote ſeveral letters to Cicero, wherein he complained of his conduct in very ſharp terms, telling him, that notwithſtanding his boaſted love of liberty, he was very ſenſible he could endure a tyrant; that it was manifeſt, from his courting Octavianus, that he did not intend liberty for his country, country, but a bountiful master for himself; but our forefathers, said Brutus, could not brook even an easy and gentle slavery. As for my own part, says he in one of his letters, I am not resolved whether I shall make war or peace; but as to one point I am fixed and settled, which is, never to be a slave. I wonder, that you, says he in writing to Cicero, should fear the danger of a civil war, and not be much more afraid of a dishonourable and infamous peace. All you can promise yourself from destroying the tyranny of Antony is, to make Octavianus a tyrant. Such were the sentiments of that noble and truly generous spirit [c]!

But to return to Antony: after he had appeased the tumult, which had been raised among his troops at Brundusium by the emissaries of Octavianus, and discharged such of the officers as he distrusted, he ordered his legions to march to Ariminum; but took himself his rout towards Rome, which he entered at the head of a thousand well-armed legionaries; but the very next day he left the city, and went to Alba, in hopes of regaining the two legions which had revolted from him, and were quartered in that city; but they shutting the gates against him, he hastened from thence to Tibur, where he had lodged great store of ammunition and provisions, with a design to drive Decimus Brutus out of Cisalpine Gaul. At Tibur he was joined by the tenth legion, lately arrived from Macedon, by several senators, and a great number of Roman knights, who came to offer him their service. Many veterans likewise, who had formerly served under him, flocked to him from all parts of Italy; so that he began his march towards Ariminum at the head of five legions, and a considerable body of Roman knights. Octavianus was in the mean time at Alba, with the two legions that had abandoned Antony, one of new-raised soldiers, and two of such veterans as had served under his father. From this place he wrote to the senate, complaining of the inconstancy of some members of that august body, who, after the most solemn protestations of friendship to him, had basely abandoned his party and joined that of his rival. At the same time, he offered to march with all his forces against Antony, as a common enemy. The senate commended the young general's zeal, but adjourned all deliberations on so weighty an affair, till the election of new consuls. But the soldiers pressed him to take upon him the title of proprætor, without waiting till the senate or consuls conferred it upon him, and in that quality to head head them againſt Antony. Octavianus well knew that this would give great umbrage to the ſenate, whoſe favour he deſigned to court till he had got rid of Antony; and therefore he refuſed the title, with which his legionaries were willing to honour him. When his moſt intimate friends, whom he uſed to conſult in all affairs of moment, remonſtrated to him, that his troops would ſcruple to obey a citizen without any title or magiſtracy, he acquainted them with the reaſons which induced him to refuſe the title offered him by the army. The ſenate, ſaid he, has declared for me, not out of friendſhip to me, but becauſe they are afraid of Antony: their deſign is to make uſe of me to deſtroy him, and afterwards to deſtroy me by the hands of thoſe who have aſſaſſinated my father; but this is not a proper time to let them underſtand, that I have penetrated ſo far into the myſteries of their policy, which I ſhould certainly do, if I accepted of thoſe honours which the army offers me: this they would look upon as an incroachment upon their authority, and hate me as much as they do Antony. Let us therefore diſſemble for a while; my pretended reſpect and ſubmiſſion to them will engage them to confer on me a dignity, which they know, my ſoldiers are diſpoſed to give me in ſpite of them. And indeed the conſcript fathers, deceived by his ſeeming modeſty, conferred on him that very title which he had lately refuſed; nay, at the motion of Cicero, deſirous of having in him a powerful and hearty protector againſt Antony, they ordered a ſtatue to be erected to him, gave him a place in the ſenate, and enabled him to hold the conſulate ten years ſooner than was allowed by law. Thus was the timorous orator ſecuring a protector to himſelf at the expence of the public ſafely [d].

Octavianus's affected modeſty and private views.

In the mean time, Antony from his camp at Ariminum diſpatched a meſſenger to Decimus Brutus, acquainting him with the decree of the people, which deprived him of the government of Ciſalpine Gaul, and conferred it on himſelf. To the decree of the people Brutus oppoſed that of the ſenate, confirming all the acts of Cæſar. After ſeveral meſſages and deputations, Antony at length threatened to have him declared an enemy to the republic, if within a limited time he did not reſign to him the government of a province, which had been allotted to him by the Roman people. Brutus, without being in the leaſt frightened by his threats, returned anſwer, that he had been appointed governor of Ciſalpine Gaul by a decree of the ſenate, and would not quit his province, till thoſe who had placed him in it thought fit to recall him. Hereupon the conſul, breaking into the province at the head of a numerous army, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral cities, and even laid ſiege to Mutina, now Modena, whither Brutus had retired with a troop of gladiators and three legions, two of which he had formerly commanded under Cæſar. The ſiege of Mutina was looked upon by the ſenate as a declaration of war; but they poſtponed all deliberations on ſo important a ſubject, till the new conſuls entered upon their office. Theſe were Caius Vibius Panſa and Aulus Hirtius, who had both ſerved under Cæſar, and were great friends to Cicero. Hirtius was the author of that relation of the Alexandrian and African wars, which is annexed to Cæſar's commentaries. They no ſooner entered upon their office, than they aſſembled the ſenate, and, after having ſet forth in a very pathetic ſpeech the evils with which the republic was threatened, they propoſed the two following queſtions to the conſideration of the conſcript fathers, viz. what rewards the two legions deſerved, that had abandoned Antony to ſide with Octavianus, and what expedients they judged proper to be taken in order to bring Antony to renounce his pretenſions to the province of Ciſalpine Gaul? It was unanimouſly reſolved, that the two legions ſhould be rewarded, and the conſuls were impowered to confer on them what rewards they thought proper. As for Antony, ſome were of opinion, that a deputation ſhould be ſent to him, entreating him in the name of the ſenate to raiſe the ſiege of Mutina and abandon that province. But Cicero, in a ſpeech, which has reached us, viz. his fifth Philippic, ſhewed, it was beneath the dignity of the Roman people to treat with a revolted citizen, and that negotiations would only give him time to ſtrengthen himſelf in the province he had uſurped; he was therefore of opinion, and promoted his opinion with great warmth and eloquence, that war ſhould be forthwith proclaimed againſt him, as a common enemy. His ſpeech was filled with moſt bitter invectives againſt Antony and the higheſt commendations of Octavianus; which ſeems to confirm the truth of what M. Brutus wrote to his friend Atticus, viz. that Cicero did not, in ſiding with young Cæſar, intend to deliver his country from tyranny, but to procure a bountiful maſter to himſelf. Others are of opinion, that Cicero, deceived by the affected modeſty and feigned proteſtations of the young politician, really believed, that he had nothing elſe in view but to guard himſelf and the the republic againſt the ambitious attempts of Antony. However that be, after warm debates, which laſted three days, Cicero, who bore great ſway in the ſenate, prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to paſs a decree, commanding Antony to raiſe the ſiege of Mutina without delay, to quit the province of Ciſalpine Gaul, and marching his troops over the Rubicon, which parted Gaul from Italy, to wait on the banks of that river for further commands from the ſenate. All this he was ordered under pain of being declared an enemy to his country. But Antony, who had a numerous army under his command, and could not perſuade himſelf, that Octavianus would employ his forces againſt him in favour of one of the conſpirators, paid no manner of reſpect either to the deputies of the ſenate, who were ſent to acquaint him with the decree, or to the decree itſelf. Hereupon, at the motion of Cicero, Antony was declared an enemy to his country, and the two conſuls were ordered to raiſe troops and haſten to the relief of Brutus, who was cloſely beſieged, and already reduced to great ſtreights in Mutina. At the ſame time, Octavianus was commanded by the ſenate to join his forces to thoſe of the conſuls, and to act in concert with them againſt the common enemy. He was inveſted with a power equal to that of the conſuls, and it was decreed, that the veterans, who ſerved under him, ſhould be rewarded with lands as ſoon as the war was ended, and be exempted for ever from the ſervice [e].

He is at the motion of Cicero declared an enemy to his country.

WHILE the two conſuls were buſy in raiſing troops, news was brought to Rome of the death of Caius Trebonius, who by a decree of the ſenate had been ſent into Aſia in quality of proconſul. The manner of his death is thus related by Cicero. Dolabella having obtained, as we have related above, by means of Antony, the government of Syria, haſtened thither; but on his arrival found Trebonius in poſſeſſion of ſeveral cities, which he had ſeized as lieutenant to Brutus, who had been firſt appointed governor of that province. As Dolabella was not in a condition to diſpoſſeſs him by force of the places he held, he invited him to an interview, in which it was agreed that they ſhould abſtain from all manner of hoſtilities, and live in perfect amity and friendſhip; for Dolabella pretended now, as he had had done formerly, to be in his heart a friend and well-wiſher to Brutus and his followers. The credulous republican, relying on the promiſes of Dolabella, continued quietly at Smyrna as in the moſt peaceable times; but his treacherous rival, taking advantage of his ſecurity and indolence, ſurpriſed the city in the dead of the night, and having taken Trebonius himſelf priſoner, delivered him up to a Roman exile, by name Samiarius; who, after having made him ſuffer by Dolabella's orders, for two days together, the moſt exquiſite torments which rage and cruelty could invent, cauſed his head to be cut off, and his body to be dragged through all the ſtreets of Smyrna, and then thrown into the ſea. His head was carried on the point of a ſpear all over the city, and afterwards ſet up over-againſt the tribunal, where he uſed to adminiſter juſtice. From thence it was taken down by the ſoldiers, who being incenſed againſt Trebonius, as privy to the death of their general, abuſed the poor remains of his body in the groſſeſt manner [f] (N). Thus

(N) Appian, Dion Caſſius, and Velleius Paterculus relate this affair in a different manner. They tell us, that Trebonius, who had been ſent into Syria by Brutus as his lieutenant, refuſed to admit Dolabella, though conſul, into the cities of Smyrna and Pergamus; but nevertheleſs, out of reſpect to the conſular dignity, ſupplied his army with proviſions, and ſent word to the Epheſians, that they might open their gates to him. While the conſul was marching towards Epheſus at the head of his army, Trebonius detached a ſmall body of troops after him to obſerve his motions. As he quietly purſued his rout to Epheſus without committing any hoſtilities, the greateſt part of Trebonius's troops returned to Smyrna. Then Dolabella, turning back unexpectedly upon thoſe who remained, cut them all to a man in pieces, and advancing by the favour of the night to Smyrna without being perceived, ſurpriſed the city, and put all thoſe to the ſword who offered to oppoſe him. A party of his ſoldiers, breaking into the houſe where Trebonius lodged, ſeized him in bed. The proconſul earneſtly intreated the centurion, who commanded the party, to carry him to Dolabella, "We will carry you to the conſul," anſwered the centurion, who was one of Cæſar's old ſoldiers: "But your head "muſt remain here." Accordingly he immediately cut off his head, which was kicked about by the incenſed ſoldiery in a moſt contemptuous manner (49).

(49) Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 69. Appian, l. iii. p. 542, §43. Dio, l. xlvii. p. 344.

Thus was Trebonius, the firſt of all the conſpirators, inhumanly ſacrificed to the manes of Cæſar. He was one of the dictator's chief favourites, had been raiſed by him to the conſulate for the three laſt months of the year 708, and had been two years before truſted with the government of Hither Spain, whither he was ſent to ſtop the progreſs of the ſons of Pompey. He ſerved the dictator with great fidelity, till he began openly to aſpire at the ſovereign power; and then, the love of his country getting the better of all private obligations, he joined Brutus, and ſhared with him the glory of delivering, at leaſt for ſome time, his fellow-ſubjects from ſlavery. When the news of his death, and ſoon after the remains of his mangled body were brought to Rome, the ſenate, highly provoked at the cruelty and tyranny of Dolabella, declared him, at the motion of Cicero, a rebel and enemy to his country. At the ſame time, they paſſed a decree enacting, that Brutus ſhould have the government of Macedon and Illyricum, and the command of the forces in thoſe provinces, till ſuch time as the republic recovered her antient majeſty; that he might make uſe of the fleet, which Apuleius had, by Cæſar's orders, got ready, together with all the proviſions, military ſtores, and money, to the amount of ſeven thouſand talents, which Cæſar had lodged in the city of Demetrias, and deſigned for his Parthian expedition; that Caſſius ſhould take upon him the government of Syria, and the charge of making war upon Dolabella and revenging the death of Trebonius; and, laſtly, that all governors and commanders of forces belonging to the republic ſhould receive orders from theſe two generals [g].

Antony endeavours to gain over Hirtius and Octavianus.

Antony, being informed by his emiſſaries of ſuch an extraordinary ſtep taken by the ſenate, laid hold of this opportunity to raiſe ſuſpicions and jealouſies in the minds of the conſul Hirtius and young Octavianus againſt the conſcript fathers. He writ a letter to them in common, putting them in mind of the many favours they had received at the dictator's hands, upbraiding them with ingratitude for baſely betraying the cauſe of their benefactor to embrace that of his murderers, and laying open to them the ſecret deſigns of the ſenate, which were to make them the inſtruments of each others ruin. Theſe remonſtrances made a deep impreſſion on Octavianus, and inclined him to a reconciliation with his rival. But, as his own intereſt was the ſole rule of his conduct, and he apprehended, that if he joined Antony, that general would pretend to be acknowledged the head of the party, he ſtill purſued his former meaſures, which were to court the favour of the ſenate, till ſuch time as he had got rid of ſo powerful and formidable a rival. Purſuant to this ſcheme, he not only pretended to be quite unacquainted with the private views of the conſcript fathers, but, to give proof of his deference to the conſuls, readily ſurrendered to Hirtius the legions of Mars and the fourth, which had quitted Antony's party, and which the conſul, by a ſecret order from the ſenate, required him to deliver up to himſelf. After this he joined the remainder of his forces to thoſe of Hirtius, and marched with him into Ciſalpine Gaul to the relief of Decimus Brutus, while Panſa, the other conſul, continued in Italy to raiſe more troops there. Hirtius and Octavianus took Bononia and ſeveral other cities which Antony had ſeized, and then advancing to the neighbourhood of Mutina, encamped at a ſmall diſtance from Antony's lines, with a deſign to cut off his communication with the neighbouring country, and by that means oblige him, for want of proviſions, to raiſe the ſiege. In the mean time, P. Ventidius, a ſoldier of fortune, who had ſerved under Cæſar and was a particular friend to Antony, quitting Rome, where Cicero governed with an abſolute ſway, viſited all the colonies which Cæſar had lately eſtabliſhed in Italy; and as he was well known for his valour, and greatly beloved by the ſoldiery, he raiſed in a ſhort time two legions, conſiſting wholly of veterans, with a deſign to march them to the relief of Antony. But firſt, he cauſed ſeveral of them to enter Rome privately with orders to ſeize upon Cicero, who was daily inveighing againſt Antony, and wholly taken up in raiſing money, at the expence of Antony's friends, to pay the troops of Octavianus and the conſuls. But the orator, having timely notice of his deſign, abandoned the city, with ſeveral other ſenators, and concealed himſelf in the country. Hereupon Ventidius, finding his deſign had got vent, marched in all haſte towards Mutina; but all the paſſes being ſeized by Hirtius and Octavianus, he was obliged to retire into Picenum, where he raiſed another legion, keeping his troops in a readineſs to march on the firſt opportunity that offered of ſerving his friend and party [h].

In the mean time, Panſa, having raiſed four legions in Rome, left the city, and, taking his rout towards Ciſalpine Gaul, arrived at Bononia. As the country between that city and Mutina was full of woods and marſhes, Hirtius and Octavianus upon the news of his approach detached the legion of Mars, which conſiſted wholly of veterans, with their guards, or prætorian cohorts, under the command of Carfuleius, to cover his march. On the other hand, Antony ſent out in the night-time his two beſt legions, the ſecond and thirty-third, with orders to conceal themſelves among the ruſhes of a large moraſs, which lay on each ſide of the Æmilian way, through which the conſul Panſa was to march. Carfuleius joined the conſular army with his detachment before they reached the moraſs, and was marching in the van at the head of the legion of Mars and the guards of Hirtius and Octavianus, when upon entering the cauſway, which led acroſs the marſh, he obſerved ſome armed men lying among the ruſhes. However, he advanced boldly on the cauſway with the legion of Mars; but was not gone far before he ſaw himſelf inveſted by Antony's two legions, who, ſtarting up from among the reeds and ruſhes, fell upon him with incredible fury. At the ſame time, Antony appeared in perſon at the head of his cavalry, in the neighbouring plain. The conſul Panſa, at the head of two of his legions, flew to the aſſiſtance of the legion of Mars, which was engaged with two of Antony's legions; but thoſe brave veterans, refuſing to admit the conſul's raw and undiſciplined levies into their ranks, for fear they ſhould rather incumber than relieve them, the conſul paſſing the moraſs, marched in good order into the plain, to prevent Antony from lending any aſſiſtance to his legions and guards on the cauſway, where both parties fought with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. Antony's two legions were bent on revenging themſelves on the Martial legion for having abandoned their party; and on the other ſide the Martial legion was reſolved to maintain that honour and reputation which they had gained in many battles under Cæſar. Thus the engagement became a particular quarrel between the ſoldiers; and never did troops fight with more rage and emulation. As their numbers were pretty equal, Antony's two legions being ſupported by his guards, and the Martial legion by the guards of Hirtius, and Octavianus, the battle laſted from morning to night without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. Octavius's guards were almoſt to a man cut in pieces, but thoſe of Hirtius, after having made a dreadful ſlaughter of the enemy, obliged Antony's ſecond legion to give ground, which they did in good order. The Martial legion and Antony's thirty-third fought the whole day, driving each other in their turns from the cauſway, into the moraſs, till Carfuleius drew off his men to relieve the conſul Panſa, who was engaged with Antony in the plain and hemmed in by his cavalry. But, as Carfuleius's legionaries were greatly fatigued after ſo long and obſtinate an engagement, before they reached the plain, the conſul was mortally wounded and his troops put to flight. Torquatus, quæſtor of the conſular army, had, during the battle, formed a kind of camp, to ſerve as an aſylum for his party, in caſe of any misfortune. Thither the conſul's legions retired, carrying with them their general, who had run through the body with a javelin. Antony purſued them, not doubting but he ſhould eaſily force their intrenchments, which were not yet completed. But the conſular legions, though wholly conſiſting of raw ſoldiers, who had been juſt defeated in the plain, made ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that Antony, fearing Hirtius might come upon him in the mean time, thought it adviſeable to content himſelf with the advantage he had gained, and return to his camp before Mutina. But while his troops were marching back in diſorder, as often happens after a victory, Hirtius unexpectedly appeared at the head of twenty choſen cohorts, and, falling upon them before they could form their ranks, cut many of them in pieces. However, thoſe brave veterans, tired as they were, made a vigorous reſiſtance, and, being encouraged by the example of their general, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion in a moſt eminent manner ſtood their ground a great while; but were at length entirely defeated, and forced to ſave themſelves by flight croſs the marſhes on each ſide of the Æmilian way. Hirtius, who in this action diſcharged the duty both of an experienced general and a valiant ſoldier, would not ſuffer his men to purſue the fugitives for fear of ſome ambuſcade, it being already dark, and the country full of woods and marſhes. As for Antony, he paſſed a melancholy night with part of his forces in a ſmall village called Forum Gallorum, at preſent Caſtel Franco, whence he returned greatly dejected by day-break to his camp before Mutina. His cavalry rallied in the dark, and, taking up their wounded behind them, reached their camp by midnight, being quite ſpent with the fatigue of two battles, and a march of ſixty furlongs through woods and marſhes. As for Octavianus, ſome writers tell us, that he was at the firſt battle; nay, Antony afterwards upbraided him with having fled, in a cowardly manner, before him, after having quitted his his horſe and thrown away his arms, that he might with more eaſe ſave himſelf, croſs the woods and marſhes, where, according to him, he lay concealed two days, being both aſhamed and afraid to ſhew himſelf. Others ſay, that he remained in his camp in the neighbourhood of Mutina, and there repulſed with great bravery a ſtrong detachment from Antony's camp, which attempted to force his intrenchments. They add, that for ſo gallant an action, which was, we may ſay, his firſt eſſay in the art of war, he was honoured by the ſenate with the title of Imperator, as were likewiſe the two conſuls for their courageous behaviour in the two battles. The loſs on both ſides was pretty equal; in the firſt battle Octavianus's guards, with a great number of Panſa's legionaries, were cut in pieces; but in the ſecond Hirtius loſt only a ſmall number of men, whereas the ſlaughter of the enemy was very great [i].

AFTER the battle both armies returned to their reſpective camps in the neighbourhood of Mutina. Antony reſolved only to defend his lines, and in the mean time carry on the ſiege with all poſſible vigor. On the other hand, Hirtius and Octavianus, fearing the place, if not relieved, might ſoon be obliged to capitulate, were for venturing another engagement. But as Antony kept cloſe within his lines, the two generals reſolved to make a bold puſh, in order to throw ſome ſuccours into the inveſted city. Accordingly, leaving a ſufficient number of forces to guard their camp, they marched with the reſt cloſe up to Antony's lines, with a deſign to force them where they appeared weakeſt. Antony immediately ſent out all his cavalry againſt them; but his horſe being put to the rout, after a ſharp engagement, by the enemy's legionaries, who had poſſeſſed themſelves of an eminence, he cauſed two legions to advance, which were ſo vigorouſly attacked by Hirtius, that they ſoon began to give ground and retire in diſorder to their intrenchments. The conſul purſued his advantage, and, ſuffering himſelf to be carried away by his courage and ardour, entered the lines pell-mell with the fugitives, and penetrated, in ſpight of all oppoſition, as far as the general's quarters, where he received a blow, which laid him dead on the ground. And now, by the death of one of the conſuls, and the abſence of the other, who had been conveyed to Bononia after the firſt battle, in which which he was mortally wounded, Octavianus was left commander in chief of the whole army. He is ſaid by ſome writers to have given on this occaſion ſignal proofs of an extraordinary courage, and to have conducted the action with all the prudence of an old and experienced commander, For at the head of ſome brave legionaries he reſcued the body of the dead conſul out of the enemy's hands, and one of his ſtandard-bearers being killed, he carried the eagle himſelf, fighting like a private man in the firſt line. But, as he obſerved the conſular troops ſomewhat diſcouraged by the death of their leader, he retired in good order out of the enemy's camp into the neighbouring plain, where the action being renewed, he gained a complete victory, and obliged the enemy to ſeek for ſhelter behind their intrenchments. Some aſcribe the whole glory of this action to Decimus Brutus, who, ſallying out of the city, and falling upon the enemy's rear while they were engaged with Octavianus, forced them to give ground and retreat in the utmoſt confuſion to their camp (O) However that be, Antony, weakened by theſe loſſes and fearing the event of a third battle, raiſed the ſiege the next day; and, not being in a condition to keep the field before a victorious army, retired towards the Alps, and took the road to Tranſalpine Gaul, with a deſign to join Lepidus, Plancus, and Aſinius Pollio, who were in thoſe large provinces at the head of conſiderable armies [k].

Antony obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Mutina.

Decimus Brutus, being thus delivered from a long and troubleſome ſiege, was for ſome time at a loſs how to behave with Octavianus, who, he knew, bore him an irreconcileable hatred, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance he had lent him againſt Antony, At length, by the advice of his friends, he diſpatched a meſſenger to him, inviting him to an interview on on the banks of the Scultemnis, now the Panaro. Octavianus received the meſſenger with great coldneſs, but agreed to his propoſal; which Brutus no ſooner underſtood, than he cauſed the bridges on the river, which parted the two armies, to be broke down, and by a ſecond meſſage required, that the conference might be held in the preſence of their troops, and with the river between them. Theſe were not unſeaſonable precautions, it being well known, that Octavianus had vowed the deſtruction of all thoſe who had been any ways concerned in the death of his father; for this was the pretence he made uſe of on all occaſions, to deſtroy ſuch as were true friends to their country and enemies to tyranny. Octavianus having agreed to theſe conditions, both he and Brutus appeared on the oppoſite banks of the river; when the latter thanked him in a very obliging manner for the aſſiſtance he had lent him, and acknowledged himſelf indebted to him for the liberty he enjoyed. To this polite diſcourſe Octavianus anſwered with great ſurlineſs, that Brutus owed him no obligations, ſince he had relieved Mutina, not for his ſake, but to chaſtiſe the inſolence of Antony, who nevertheleſs might one day become his friend, whereas he ſhould ever maintain a mortal enmity to Brutus, and all thoſe who had embrued their hands in the blood of his father. Brutus piqued at this haughty and threatening anſwer, replied ſmartly, that ſince Antony was already ſufficiently humbled, he had no further buſineſs in the province of Ciſalpine Gaul, which had been confirmed to him by a decree of the ſenate, forbidding any other general to enter it without his leave. Octavianus was highly offended at the boldneſs of Brutus; but, being appriſed that he was ſupported by the ſenate, he thought it adviſable to ſtifle his reſentment for the preſent, and quitting the neighbourhood of Mutina to return to Bononia, where he found the conſul Vibius Panſa lying at the point of death He no ſooner heard of the arrival of Octavianus, than he ſent for him, and, tenderly embracing him, ſpoke to him in the following manner: "I always loved your father more than myſelf, "and when he was ſlain, would have ventured my own life to "ſave his, had I been armed. I never laid aſide the deſire, "nor the hopes, of revenging one day his death, though ſome "prudential reaſons, to which even you have ſubmitted, "have tied my hands, and kept me in the party of the ſenate. Panſa's laſt advice to Octavianus.

Nothing

" Nothing has pleaſed them more than to ſee you fall out " with Antony, and they flatter themſelves with the hopes " of finding you become the inſtruments of each other's " ruin. If they have declared for you, it was only becauſe " they thought you the weakeſt, and the man they could the " more eaſily overcome. This they have declared more than " once to Hirtius and to me. The friendſhip therefore, with " which Cæſar once honoured me, obliges me to give you " ſuch advice, as I myſelf would follow on the like occaſion. " Agree with Antony; for you have no other means of " ſaving your life and advancing your fortune. My deſign " was not, as the ſenate believed, to deſtroy Antony, but to " compel him by force of arms to be reconciled with you, " and afterwards to join our armies, and in conjunction pur- " ſue the murderers of our common benefactor. I return to " you your two legions, and would willingly ſurrender up to " you the reſt of the army, but they do not entirely de- " pend upon me. The commanders are moſt of them the " ſpies of the ſenate, who have private orders to obſerve your " conduct. Suffer me therefore to put them into the hands " of Torquatus." The words of the dying conſul made a deep impreſſion on the mind of Octavianus, and produced at length the famous triumvirate. Panſa died preſently after, having firſt delivered up his army to Torquatus one of his lieutenants [1] (P).

Panſa dies of his wounds.

In

[1] Appian. bell. civil. l. iii.

(P) Octavianus was ſuſpected of having murdered both the conſuls; Hirtius with his own hand in the heat of the battle, and Panſa after it, by cauſing poiſon to be poured into his wound by Glyco his phyſician. It is certain Glyco was ſeized, and even condemned to the torture, but ſaved by the credit of his maſter Octavianus. Decimus Brutus indeed wrote to Cicero in behalf of the phyſician, whom he ſeems to have thought incapable of ſo black a crime. But notwithſtanding Brutus's declaration, who was known to be a humane and good-natured man, the report was credited by many in Rome. As for the conſul Hirtius, Aquilius Niger wrote, that Octavianus killed him undeſignedly in the hurry of the battle; we will not warrant the truth of theſe reports; but neither can we look upon them as calumnies altogether groundleſs as ſome modern writers call them, broached by enthuſiaſtic republicans to blacken the reputation of ſo great a man. But of the treachery, ingratitude, and horrid cruelties of this great man, we ſhall have many, too many, inſtances in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

In the mean time, the ſenate, upon the news of the advantages gained over Antony by the generals of the republic, decreed, at the motion of Cicero, fifty days ſupplications to return thanks to the gods for the ſucceſs of the campaign. By the ſame decree large ſums were ordered to be paid immediately out of the public treaſury, to ſuch of the victorious legionaries as remained alive, and to the widows and heirs of thoſe who had died in the battle, or ſince of their wounds; which had never been done before on account of any victory.

The bodies of the two conſuls were, by an order from the ſenate, conveyed to Rome, and with the utmoſt magnificence interred in the Campus Martius at the expence of the public; an honour which had been hitherto granted to none but the moſt eminent perſonages of the republic. The bodies of three other officers of diſtinction, viz. of Caius Peduceus, Decimus Carfuleius, and Pontius Aquila, were conveyed to Rome with thoſe of the conſuls, and interred with great pomp in the burying-places of their reſpective families, moſt of the ſenators attending their obſequies [m].

The bodies of the two conſuls carried to Rome, and interred with great pomp.

And now the conſcript fathers, conceiving Antony to be utterly undone, began to ſlight Octavianus, for whom they believed they ſhould have no further occaſion. He demanded a triumph, which was refuſed to him and granted to Decimus Brutus, though Octavianus, it muſt be owned, had at leaſt as juſt a claim to that honour as Brutus. Cicero indeed was for granting an ovation, but could not, with all his eloquence, prevail upon the ſenate to allow him even that mark of diſtinction. On the other hand, they heaped all ſorts of honours on Decimus. They ordered Torquatus to deliver up to him the troops which the conſul Panſa had commanded: they appointed him commander in chief of all the forces in Ciſalpine Gaul, charging him, without ſo much as mentioning Octavianus to purſue Antony, and treat him as a public enemy. All the temples of Rome were opened, and public prayers appointed for the ſucceſs of his arms: as the ſiege of Mutina had been raiſed on his birth-day, the ſenate decreed, that it ſhould be for ever deemed a lucky day, and as ſuch marked in the faſti. At the ſame time, the conſcript fathers, as if they had taken pleaſure in mortifying Octavianus, paſſed a decree, enacting, that a ſtatue ſhould be raiſed at the public expence to the memory of Pontius Aquila, one of the conſpirators who had been killed in the battle of Mutina; and

and that all the charges he had been at, and the losses he had sustained during the war, should be made good to his heirs out of the public treasure. So many marks of distinction heaped upon the conspirators, left Octavianus no room to doubt of the disposition of the senate toward him. From that moment he resolved to follow the last advice of Pansa, and to be reconciled to Antony. With this view he sent back to him a great number of officers, who had been taken prisoners in the last battle, and among the rest Decius, one of Antony's most intimate friends, after having signified to him in ambiguous words his intention. Ventidius as we have observed above, had raised three legions for Antony, and was attempting to join him after the battle of Mutina. Octavianus overtook and surprised him with a superior force, and might easily have defeated him; but he suffered him to escape, after having had a private conference with him, wherein he charged him to tell Antony in his name, that he was ignorant of his true interest, and acted directly contrary to it. At the same time he opened himself without reserve to Lepidus, Plancus, and Asinius Pollio, all old officers of the dictator, and with whom he had always maintained a secret correspondence. He wrote to them, that the senate, entirely addicted to the assassins of his father, were resolved to destroy him; that they ought not to expect a more favourable treatment; that their common enemies studied only how to divide them, in order to crush them the more easily one after another; that for their own safety they ought to unite their forces, and join in maintaining the party, and revenging the death, of their late general, &c. He added some complaints of Antony; but in so artful a manner, that it was easily seen he was no ways averse to a reconcilation. [n].

Who resolves to be reconciled with Antony.

In the mean time, Antony, pressed by Brutus, endeavoured to gain the Alps with a design to pass those mountains, and join Lepidus, who commanded seven legions in Transalpine Gaul, and who, he imagined, would stand his friend in consideration of the many kind offices he had done him, during his late consulship and in the dictator's life time. Brutus, having thus driven him out of Italy, wrote to the senate, that he had dispersed his army, and that Antony himself was skulking some where among the Alps, where he could not avoid falling into his hands. The senate, overjoyed at this news, cried out, that the republic had at length recovered its antient tient liberty, and appointed, as if Antony had been actually taken, ten commiſſioners to try him. They talked of nothing leſs than repealing all the laws which had been enacted by him during his conſulſhip, and even including in this repeal all the ordinances of the dictator, in order to ſettle the commonwealth on its antient foundation. At the motion of Cicero a decree immediately paſſed, confiſcating all Antony's effects, and thoſe of his friends and adherents, with grievous menaces againſt ſuch as ſhould dare to conceal any part of his effects. While Cicero, at the head of the ſenate, was thus venting his rage upon Antony, that general was ſtruggling among the Alps with all the hardſhips and miſeries that can be imagined. Brutus, having obliged him to quit Italy, he attempted to paſs the mountains, without his baggage and the neceſſary proviſions for ſo long and painful a march. His men were forced to feed firſt upon the fleſh of their horſes, and afterwards on ſuch wild fruits and roots as they could find in that mountainous and inhoſpitable country, and which no man had ever taſted before; nay they were at laſt ſo pinched with hunger, that they devoured the very bark of trees. Plutarch tells us, that in this extremity, Antony though accuſtomed to luxury and eaſe, was a moſt illuſtrious example of patience to the whole army, and that in misfortune he could not be eaſily diſtinguiſhed from a virtuous man. He ſuffered all hardſhips imaginable with the conſtancy of an hero, and fell into a behaviour, which no one could have expected from a man wholly addicted to his pleaſures, But after all he muſt have periſhed with his whole army, if Culeo, one of Lepidus's lieutenants, who guarded the paſſes, had performed his duty. But the venal commander ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by Antony, and for a ſum of money granted him a free paſſage. Antony no ſooner entered Gaul, than he wrote to Lepidus, Plancus, and Aſinius Pollio, reminding them of their antient friendſhip, and exhorting them to join him againſt the murderers of Cæſar, their common enemies. Lepidus was greatly ſurpriſed at his arrival and quite at a loſs how to behave in ſo critical a conjuncture, He was a man of an illuſtrious family, but of ſlender parts, of a narrow mind, and at the ſame time of an unbounded ambition. He was afraid, that if he joined Antony, who was greatly beloved by the troops, he might get the aſcendant over him, and ſcarce leave him the rank of a lieutenant in his own army; and upon this conſideration alone he rejected Antony's propoſals, and wrote him word, that, ſince the ſenate had declared

clared him an enemy to his country, he could not join him without drawing upon himſelf a decree of the ſame nature; but he aſſured him at the ſame time, that whatever orders he received from the ſenate, he would carefully avoid coming to an engagement, or any ways moleſting him. Aſinius Pollio on the contrary no ſooner received Antony's letter, than he aſſured him that he ſhould find him always ready to concur with him in all his meaſures, for he had been one of Cæſar's particular friends, and bore an irreconcileable hatred to all thoſe who had been concerned in his death. As for Plancus, he kept a ſecret intelligence with both parties, and carefully avoided declaring himſelf openly for either ſide, till he ſaw which was moſt likely to prevail. In the mean time, Antony marched ſtrait up to Lepidus's army, and marked out his camp near his, but without fortifying it, as if they had been of the ſame party and intereſt. He ſent out immediately ſome of his officers to him, putting him in mind of their antient friendſhip, and conjuring him by Cæſar's memory to concur with him in revenging the death of their common benefactor. But Marcus Juventius Laterenſis, one of Lepidus's moſt intimate friends, and in his heart a zealous republican, did all that lay in his power to diſſuade him from joining Antony. To conceal his attachment to the party of the conſpirators, he artfully repreſented to Lepidus, that, having ſeven legions under his command, he was one of the moſt powerful generals of the republic, and would be of great weight, what ſide ſoever he choſe; but that, if he joined Antony, he would be obliged to ſubmit to the authority of ſo haughty and imperious a commander, and would make but a very poor figure. By this means the zealous patriot ſtrove to prevent a conjunction, which he was well appriſed would prove fatal to his country. But Antony, who ſaw his ruin unavoidable, if Lepidus ſhould be at length prevailed upon to act in concert with Decimus Brutus, reſolved to puſh his fortune and venture all. His hair was long and diſordered, nor had he ſhaved his beard ſince his late defeat. In this condition and with a mourning mantle flung over him, he went boldly into the camp of Lepidus, and there began to harangue the ſoldiers, who had all ſerved with him under Cæſar. They were all greatly moved at his habit, and more at his ſpeech; which Lepidus obſerving, ordered the trumpets to ſound, that he might be heard no longer. This raiſed in the ſoldiery a great ſenſe of compaſſion; inſomuch, that they ſecretly ſent Clodius and Lælius diſguiſed in women's cloaths, adviſing adviſing Antony to attack Lepidus's camp, and aſſuring him, that the greater part were diſpoſed to receive him with open arms, and even to diſpatch Lepidus, if he would give them orders for ſo doing. Antony would by no means ſuffer any violence to be offered to Lepidus; but early the next morning he marched at the head of his troops, ſounded a river (Q), which lay between the two camps, and was the firſt who flung himſelf into the water to gain the oppoſite ſide. The ſoldiers of Lepidus no ſooner ſaw him than they ran in crouds to receive him, and began to beat down the works, and level the ramparts to make way for him. Antony entered the camp amidſt the loud acclamations of the ſoldiery, and marched ſtrait to the general's quarters whom he found aſleep in his tent. We may eaſily conceive the ſurpriſe of Lepidus at the ſight of Antony, no longer in the attire of a ſuppliant, but ſurrounded by his guards and attended both by his own officers and thoſe of Lepidus. He leaped out of his bed in the utmoſt conſternation, and throwing himſelf at Antony's feet, offered him the command of the army. Antony, though now abſolute maſter both of his perſon and army, treated him with great civility, tenderly embraced him, giving him the name of father, and even left him the title and all the badges of a general, though he alone performed the functions of that office. The brave Juventius Laterenſis was ſo touched with the misfortunes which he foreſaw this fatal conjunction would bring upon his country, that, while the generals were embracing each other, he killed himſelf in the height of his grief with his own ſword [o]. This union happened on the fourth of the calends of June, as is plain from Cicero's epiſtles [p]. Aſinius Pollio, who was encamped at a ſmall diſtance from Lepidus, followed his example and joined Antony. Munatius Plancus, who had been hitherto wavering and doubtful which ſide to take, thought it now high time to declare himſelf; and accordingly, leaving his camp at the conflux of the Rhone and the Saone, where he had been truſted by the ſenate with the charge of founding a colony (R), he led all the troops under his command to Antony, who was much about the ſame time joined by Ventidius at the head of three legions. So that he, who a little before had fled from Brutus, and abandoned Italy, found himſelf now in a condition to return thither with twenty-three legions and above ten thouſand horſe.

WHILE theſe things were tranſacting in Gaul, Octavianus continued ſtill at Bononia with the fourth legion, that of Mars, and ſome others, which had remained with him after the battle of Mutina. As the ſenate had committed the whole management of the war againſt Antony to Decimus Brutus, he concluded from thence, that the conſcript fathers intended to reduce him to the ſtate of a private citizen. To ward off this blow, he reſolved to ſtand for the conſulate, which office was become vacant by the death of Hirtius and Panſa. But as he was well appriſed of the difficulties he ſhould meet with in the purſuit of that dignity from the ſenators, who were for the moſt part entirely addicted to the party of Brutus and Caſſius, he artfully applied himſelf to Cicero, with whoſe vanity and ambition he was well acquainted. He wrote a letter to him, diſcovering his deſign to him as to a boſom friend, and telling him, to flatter his ambition, that he was very deſirous of having him for his collegue in the conſulate, in order to be inſtructed by ſo great a maſter in the rules and maxims that are requiſite for the government of the commonwealth; that for his part, he only deſired the name of conſul, to make him ſome amends for the loſs of a triumph which he thought due to him, but that all the power and authority ſhould be left to him; ſo that he might manage affairs as he pleaſed. Cicero, old as he was, ſuffered himſelf to be made the dupe of a child, as he uſed to call him; and, to the great ſurpriſe of all, propoſed in the ſenate the raiſing of Octavianus to the conſular dignity, as the only means of preventing him from being reconciled with Antony. He added, that, as

Octavianus

(R) The city of Lyons is commonly thought to have been founded by him. Dion Caſſius tells us in expreſs terms, that the proconſul L. Munatius Plancus ſtopt at a place called Lugudunum, and founded in that neighbourhood a colony which he called Lugdunum. The antient city was founded, according to ſome writers, in the year of Rome 364 by two brothers, named Momorus and Atepomarus, chiefs of the Gauliſh nation, and contemporaries with the famous Brennus. In proceſs of time Lugudunum and Lugdunum became one and the ſame city (52).

(52) Vid. Plut. de fluviis.

Octavianus was yet very young, the conſcript fathers ought to appoint him ſuch a collegue, as by his age and prudence might be capable of having an eye on his conduct, and be, as it were, a governor to him. At theſe words the ſenators, plainly perceiving that he pointed out himſelf as the moſt proper perſon to be choſen for Octavianus's collegue, could not help laughing out aloud; and it was no ſmall mortification to Cicero to ſee his vanity at the ſame time both expoſed and diſappointed; for all the relations and adherents of the conſpirators cried out with one voice, that to put Cæſar's ſon at the head of the republic was utterly deſtroying it [q].

But is diſappointed.

Octavianus, finding he could obtain nothing of the ſenate even by Cicero's means, reſolved to put off no longer his reconciliation with Antony, and accordingly wrote a letter to him, inviting him back into Italy, and exhorting him to forget all private injuries, and concur with him in humbling their common enemies. Antony, overjoyed to find Octavianus ſo earneſt for a reconciliation, readily conſented to it, and, without further delay, began his march towards Italy to confer there with Octavianus. He led with him ſeventeen legions and a thouſand horſe, having left ſix legions in Gaul under the command of Varius, one of his bottle companions, who on that account was nick-named Cotylon, which ſignifies a bottle.

Octavianus is reconciled with Antony.

In the mean time, the news of the conjunction of Antony and Lepidus reaching Rome, filled the city with conſternation. The ſenate immediately aſſembled, and paſſed a decree, declaring Lepidus an enemy to his country, and likewiſe the legionaries of his army, who ſhould not abandon him and return to their duty before the calends of September. This decree was enacted the day before the calends of July, as appears from one of Cicero's letters to C. Caſſius [r]. The ſtatue of Lepidus was, by order of the ſenate, thrown down, and that of the brave Juventius Laterenſis raiſed in its room. As the ſenate was quite ignorant of the reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony, and the private treaty, which by this time was concluded between them and Lepidus, they had reſource to Octavianus, and committed to him, in conjunction with Decimus Brutus the management of the war againſt Antony and Lepidus. Octavianus, who was well acquainted with all the arts of tricking and deceit, returned the ſenate thanks in the moſt humble terms, for the honour they had been pleaſed to confer upon him, and began, without delay, to raiſe troops, and make the neceſſary preparations for a new war. When he ſaw himſelf again at the head of an army, he threw off the maſk, and aſſembling his ſoldiers, told them, that the only thing the ſenate had in view was, to deſtroy all his father's friends, by ſowing diviſions among them, and arming them againſt each other; but that he, well appriſed of their wicked deſigns, had entered into a confederacy with Antony and Lepidus, who were on their march into Italy at the head of ſeventeen legions; that this was the only means of procuring ſafety for themſelves, and for ſo many brave men who had eſpouſed their cauſe: "Do you believe, ſaid "he, that thoſe who have murdered my father, will ſpare "my life or yours, if their party ſhould prevail? and prevail "they muſt, if we are divided among ourſelves. What ſe- "curity can you have for thoſe houſes, lands, and inheritan- "ces, which my father allotted you, if thoſe men got into "power, who approve of his death and are for annulling all "his ordinances? You know I am not ambititious; for you "have ſeen me refuſe the prætorſhip, which you yourſelves "offered me. But now I muſt entreat you, not for my own "ſake, but for yours, to concur with your votes and intereſt "in raiſing me to the conſulate. I ſhall be in a condition, "when veſted with that dignity, to ſecure to you the poſſeſſi- "of thoſe inheritances, which my father beſtowed upon you, "and at the ſame time to revenge his death, with the de- "ſtruction of thoſe who endeavour to deſtoy us." The ſoldiers received this propoſal with great joy, and immediately appointed deputies to go to Rome, and demand the conſulſhip for their general in the name of the legions. The ſenate received the deputies with great civility, but refuſed to comply with their requeſt, alledging Octavianus's youth, who had not yet attained the age which the laws required in a conſul. But the deputies, who had been well inſtructed beforehand, brought ſeveral inſtances of perſons who had been raiſed to the conſular dignity without any regard to their age, viz. of Rullus, of Decius, of Corvinus, of the two Scipio's, of Pompey, and of Dolabella, who had been but very lately honoured with the conſulate, though much of the ſame age with Octavianus. Theſe precedents were of no weight with the conſcript fathers: others, 'tis true, had enjoyed that honour before the lawful age; but moſt of them were perſons of unblemiſhed characters, and avowed defenders of the public liberty; whereas they had reaſon to believe, that Octavianus would make uſe of his power to oppreſs his country. As for Dolabella, he had been raiſed to the faſces by Cæſar without out the consent of the senate. The fathers therefore, without casting any reflections on Octavianus or declaring their real motives, under divers other pretences, endeavoured to elude the request of the legionaries; when one of those armed embassadors, by name Cornelius, laying his hand on his sword, "If you will not make him consul," said he, "this shall." Having thus spoke, he left the senate with his companions, and they all returned to give their general an account of the bad success of their negotiation. The soldiers, provoked at this refusal, pressed Octavianus to lead them to Rome, saying, that he, as heir to Cæsar, had a right to dispose of the consulate as he pleased. The ambitious youth heard this with pleasure, and, taking advantage of the present disposition of the soldiery, marched immediately towards Rome with eight legions. He passed the Rubicon, as his father had done, when he began the first civil war, and, dividing his army into two bodies, he advanced with one by long marches towards the capital, in order to surprise his enemies, and ordered the other to follow him leisurely. The unexpected news of Octavianus's approach filled the city with dread and confusion. Several senators, among the rest the cowardly Cicero, abandoning the city, withdrew into the country. Those who remained, assembled in haste, and came to the following resolutions; viz. that the money, which the senate had promised to the two legions, the fourth and that of Mars, should be immediately sent them; that the same sum should be promised in the name of the republic to the other legions under the command of Octavianus, and that he, though absent, should be allowed to stand for the consulate. Deputies were immediately dispatched to acquaint him with these resolutions. They were scarce gone, when the conscript fathers, reflecting cooly on their behaviour, began to be ashamed of their pusillanimity in thus submitting to a boy, and giving way to the insolence of the soldiery. At the same time two legions, which had been in Africa, arrived at the gates of Rome. These the senate looked upon as a supply sent them by the gods, and taking courage, resolved, with them and a legion which Vibius Pansa had sent back to guard the city, to put themselves in a posture of defence. Two prætors, viz. Quintus Gallius Lupercus and Marcus Cornutus, had governed the city, and supplied the room of consuls ever since the death of Hirtius and Pansa. The former favoured in his heart the party of Octavianus, and therefore continued inactive; but the latter, who was a zealous republican and an avowed friend to Brutus and his followers, left nothing untried to encourage the conſcript fathers, and inſpire them with reſolutions becoming the rank they held in the republic. He ordered all the citizens, who were fit to bear arms, to appear on the ramparts, placed guards in all the avenues to the city, and detached a good number of cohorts to garriſon the Janiculum, whither the public money had been conveyed. In the mean time, Octavianus drew near, and poſting himſelf on the Quirinal, then without the walls, he ſent from thence emiſſaries into the city, aſſuring the people, that both their lives and eſtates were ſafe. Hereupon they flocked out in crouds to ſee their friends and relations, who ſerved under Octavianus, carrying them refreſhments, and freely converſing with them. Many of the ſenators themſelves and of the chief nobility, mixed with the people, went out to pay their compliments to the young general, who, finding the people generally inclined to favour him, entered the city the next day amidſt the loud acclamations of the multitude, being attended by a choſen body of legionaries. He was met by his mother and ſiſters, who had concealed themſelves among the veſtals, and accompanied by them and a numberleſs croud to his houſe, whither all the nobility flocked to make their court to him. Cicero, who had returned to the city upon the arrival of the two African legions, was one of the laſt who came to pay him his devoirs. Octavianus received him coldly, and when the orator congratulated him on his return to the city, "You "are the laſt of my enemies," anſwered Octavianus with an ill-natured ſneer, "who have honoured me with a viſit." He well knew, that Cicero was entirely in the intereſt of Brutus and Caſſius, and beſides, he had been told by ſome of his emiſſaries, that the orator, in the ſpeech which he made to the conſcript fathers, when he demanded the conſulate for him, had uſed a very odd and equivocal expreſſion; "Egre-"gius iſte juvenis," ſaid he, "laudandus, honorandus, & tol-"lendus eſt," that is, "The brave youth ought to be praiſ-"ed and honoured;" but as to the laſt word, it ſignifies, equally to be "advanced," and to be "cut off." The next day, the three legions that were in the city went out to join Octavianus, who thereupon ordered his troops to march into the city and encamp in the field of Mars. From thence he ſent a detachment to ſeize on the Janiculum and the public money lodged there, out of which he immediately paid two thouſand five hundred drachmas to each ſoldier under his command. The prætor Quintus Gallius ſummoned the people to meet in the Campus Martius, in order to proceed to the election of new conſuls. But his collegue Marcus Cornutus, foreſeeing foreſeeing the evil conſequences that muſt inevitably attend the promotion of Octavianus, gave up the republic for loſt, and, ſcorning to ſubmit to the yoke of his fellow-citizen, laid violent hands on himſelf. A memorable inſtance of the old Roman ſpirit, which in the virtuous ages of Rome would have been celebrated with the higheſt encomiums, but is ſcarce taken notice of by the ſlaviſh writers, who flouriſhed under Auguſtus and his ſucceſſors. On the day appointed for the election, Octavianus withdrew from the city, that the comitia might have, at leaſt, ſome appearance of liberty. When the people met, they unanimouſly declared Octavianus firſt conſul, and appointed Quintus Pædius, one of his relations, and a legate of the dictator for his collegue. Upon the news of his election he returned to the city, where, as he was ſacrificing according to cuſtom, ſix, as ſome ſay twelve, vultures are ſaid to have been ſeen, the ſame number that appeared to the founder of Rome. Hence he concluded, that he ſhould one day be inveſted with the ſame power and authority as Romulus. This year is reckoned by moſt of the antient hiſtorians and modern chronologers the firſt of the long reign of Octavianus, known afterwards by the name of Auguſtus. However, his authority was not yet either full or peaceable, but for ſome time divided with Antony and Lepidus, and warmly diſputed by the republican party both in the eaſt and weſt. Livy ſays, that Octavianus was but nineteen years old, when he was created conſul [s]: but Suetonius writes more freely, that he uſurped the conſulſhip in the twentieth year of his age [t]. Plutarch tells us, out of Octavianus's own commentaries, that he was ſcarce twenty years old, when he was honoured with the conſular dignity [u]. He was declared conſul, ſays Velleius Patercules [w], the day before he was twenty years old, on the tenth of the calends of October. But Velleius was certainly miſtaken, for there wanted a whole month and five days to the completing of the twentieth year of Octavianus's age; neither did he obtain the conſulate in the month of September, in which he was born, but in that of Sextilis, which was thence called Auguſtus, as is manifeſt both from Suetonius [x] and the decree of the ſenate, which is to be ſeen in Macrobius [y]. Dion obſerves, that on the nineteenth of Auguſt he was made conſul the firſt time, and that he died on the ſame day [z]; and Tacitus tells us, that the the ſuperſtitious multitude after Auguſtus's death admired the ſtrange events of his fortune, "That the laſt day of his "life and the firſt of his reign were the ſame," &c [a]. And thus far of the diſturbances which happened in the weſt from the death of the dictator to the firſt conſulate of Octavianus. We ſhall now briefly relate what paſſed in the eaſt, during the ſame period of time; for there likewiſe a war was kindled, and thoſe vaſt provinces involved in the ſame fate with Italy and Gaul.

What happened in the eaſt, from the death of Cæſar to the conſulate of Octavianus.

To return therefore to Brutus and Caſſius; theſe two chiefs of the republican party, having left Rome to eſcape the fury of the populace whom Antony's artful ſpeech and the ſight of Cæſar's dead body had ſtirred up againſt them, retired firſt to Antium, with a deſign to return to the city, and there diſcharge the functions of their office, for they were both prætors, as ſoon as the rage of the unſettled multitude was abated. But Antony raiſing daily new diſturbances, they wrote to their friends, that ſince it was not ſafe for them to reſume the functions of their office in the city, they were determined to ſpend the reſt of the year in Italy as private citizens; which the ſenate, who favoured them underhand, no ſooner underſtood, than they committed to them the care of ſupplying the city with corn, which Brutus was appointed to ſend out of Aſia, and Caſſius out of Sicily [b]. The deſign of the conſcript fathers in charging them with ſuch a commiſſion was, to give them an opportunity of aſſembling fleets, and privately engaging the governors of thoſe provinces in their cauſe, which all good citizens looked upon as that of the republic. But, in the mean time, Octavianus arriving from Apollonia at Rome, the city began to be divided into two factions, ſome ſiding with him, and others with Antony, and the legionaries, without any regard to their country, publicly ſelling themſelves to the higheſt bidder. Hereupon Brutus and Caſſius, deſpairing of being able to do their countrymen any ſervice in Italy, reſolved to paſs over into Greece, and from thence into the eaſtern provinces, where they hoped to gain over the many legions that were diſperſed about thoſe countries. Accordingly, Brutus, croſſing Lucania came to Elea, a maritime city, in order to embarque there and ſail for Athens. From Elea he thought it adviſeable to ſend back to Rome his beloved Porcia, who had accompanied him thither. That illuſtrious matron, though overwhelmed with grief grief at the thoughts of parting from ſo tender a huſband, yet concealed her affliction with a conſtancy worthy of the greateſt heroes, till it was accidentally betrayed, in ſpite of her many reſolutions, by a picture which ſhe happened to obſerve in the houſe where they lodged. It repreſented Hector, parting from Andromache to go and engage the Greeks, and giving his young ſon Aſtyanax into her arms, while ſhe fixed her eyes upon him with an earneſt and affectionate look. The reſemblance this piece bore to her own caſe, and the remembrance of the misfortunes which befel Hector, made her burſt out into tears. She often went to the place where the picture hung, gazing at it, and weeping before it (S), when ſhe reflected on the dangers to which her huſband, like a ſecond Hector, was going to expoſe himſelf. Brutus was extremely troubled, and not without reaſon; yet he did not ſuffer himſelf to be ſo carried away by his private grief, as to neglect the public concerns. After having tenderly embraced his dear Porcia and recommended her to the protection of the gods, he went on board a ſmall veſſel, and ſet ſail for Athens, while ſhe, bathed in tears, took her rout towards Rome. At Athens Brutus was received with loud acclamations, and all poſſible demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem. The Athenians ſtill retained thoſe noble ſentiments of honour, virtue, and liberty, for which their forefathers

(S) Plutarch tells us, that on this occaſion Acilius, one of Brutus's friends, repeated out of Homer the following verſes, ſpoken by Andromache:

Yet, while my Hector ſtill ſurvives, I ſee
My father, mother, brethren, all in thee. Pope.

To which Brutus replied with a ſmile; but I muſt not anſwer Porcia as Hector did Andromache:

"For though the natural weakneſs of her body hinders her from "acting what only the ſtrength of man can perform, yet ſhe has "a mind as valiant and as active for the good of her country as "the beſt of us." This Plutarch borrowed, as he tells us, from the memoirs of Brutus, written by Bibulus the ſon of Porcia (53). For Porcia, when Brutus married her, was the widow of M. forefathers had been ſo renowned; and therefore could not help admiring a man, who had ſo generouſly ſacrificed his private intereſt to the public welfare. They compared him and his faithful companion Caſſius, who joined him a few days after his arrival at Athens, to Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, two brave Athenians, who, by the death of the tyrant Hipparchus, had delivered their country from ſlavery. Their anceſtors, to perpetuate the memory of ſo glorious an action, had, near five hundred years before the times we are now writing of, by a public decree, erected ſtatues to thoſe two deliverers of their country: and the preſent Athenians, thinking the enterpriſe of Brutus and Caſſius equally glorious, in imitation of their anceſtors, by a public decree ordered ſtatues to be erected to them over-againſt thoſe of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. How different were the ſentiments of the Athenians from thoſe of the greater part of our modern writers! Notwithſtanding theſe public demonſtrations of honour and eſteem, Brutus ſeemed to have laid aſide all thoughts of public buſineſs, that he might be wholly at leiſure for the ſtudy of philoſophy. He lived privately with one who had been formerly his gueſt, and conſtantly attended the lectures of Theomneſtus the Academic and Cratippus the Peripatetic, as if he intended to paſs the remainder of his life in quiet and retirement. But all the while, being unſuſpected, he was ſecretly making preparations for war; in order to which he made it his chief buſineſs to gain the affections of the young Roman noblemen, who were attending their ſtudies at Athens. Among theſe was Marcus Tullius, Cicero's ſon, of whom he uſed to ſay, "That whether ſleeping or waking, he could not help admiring a young man of ſo great ſpirit, and ſuch an enemy to "tyrants. As Brutus, during his ſtay at Athens, began to want money, young Marcus generouſly ſupplied him with as much as he could ſpare; for in one of his letters to Tiro, wherein he ſpeaks of thoſe who boarded him, "I have hired," ſays he, "a place hard by me for Brutus, and, as much "as my poverty allows me, relieve his want. I intend to "declaim in Greek before Caſſius, but before Brutus I will "perform my exerciſe in Latin," &c. [c]. Caſſius by this time, it ſeems, had left Greece to go into Syria, whither we ſhall ſoon follow him. As for Brutus, he continued ſome time longer in Athens, whence he ſent one Heroſtrates, whom he had gained over to his intereſt, into Macedon, to found found the Roman troops quartered in that province. Heroſtrates diſcharged his truſt with no leſs fidelity than addreſs; for he either found the Macedonian troops ready to ſide with Brutus, or dexterouſly prevailed upon them to do ſo. Hereupon Brutus pulled off the maſk, began to act openly and raiſe troops in all the cities of Greece, whither many Romans had retired, being diſſatisfied with the preſent ſituation of affairs at home. He wanted money; but his want was ſoon ſupplied by a very lucky accident. For being informed that the quæſtor Vetus Antiſtius his particular friend, who had been charged with the care of conveying to Rome the tributes of Aſia, was in his courſe to touch at Caryſtus, a city of Eubœa; he went thither to meet him, and eaſily perſuaded him to deliver up to him great part of the treaſure (T). Brutus on his birth-day made a ſplendid entertainment for the quæſtor, at which, while the company were drinking merrily to the victory of Brutus and liberty of Rome, Brutus, calling for a larger bowl and holding it in his hand, pronounced aloud this verſe, which was ſpoken to Hector by Patroclus at the point of his death:

Raiſes troops and prepares for war.

"Fate and Apollo againſt me conſpire (U)."

(T) Plutarch tells us, that Antiſtius, out of the money he was carrying to Italy, gave Brutus. πεντήκοντα μυριάδας, five hundred myriads, which the Latin interpreter rendered twenty thouſand ſeſterces; and this ſum Brutus himſelf acknowledges in an epiſtle, wherein he commends him to Cicero, as Antiſtius was going to Rome to ſtand for the prætorſhip (54). Pomponius Atticus likewiſe ſent him a preſent of C M. ſeſterces, when he left Italy, and ordered three hundred more to be remitted to him in Epirus (55).

(U) Plutarch pretends, that Brutus quoted this verſe on a ſudden without any premeditation, or any preceding circumſtance to prompt him to it. But this is highly improbable, as madam Dacier well obſerves. According to her, Brutus ſpoke this verſe in the perſon of Cæſar, ſignifying thereby, that in putting Cæſar to death, he had only lent a helping hand to fate and Apollo, and that his death was purely owing to the gods and his deſtiny. Some hiſtorians, quoted by Plutarch, tells us that the word Brutus gave his men at the battle of Philippi was Apollo; whence they concluded, that the line quoted on this occaſion was a preſage of that overthrow (56).

It was no ſooner known, that Brutus was raiſing forces, than all the remains of Pompey's army, who, ever ſince the defeat of their general, had wandered about Theſſaly, readily and joyfully joined him. With theſe he obliged Cinna, who was leading five hundred horſe to Dolabella in Aſia, to deliver up that body to him. Young Cicero gained over to him an entire legion, which Piſo deſigned to convey over to Marc Antony in Italy. And now Brutus's army being greatly encreaſed, the prudent leader embarqued with a ſtrong detachment for Demetrias, a town of Theſſaly, which we have often mentioned in the hiſtory of Greece, and there ſeized a prodigious quantity of arms, which had been formerly amaſſed in that city by Cæſar for his Parthian expedition, and were now deſigned for Antony. Macedon was then governed by Hortenſius, the ſon of the famous orator, who was Cicero's rival in eloquence. As he was a ſincere friend to his country, he declared, without the leaſt heſitation, for Brutus; and before the arrival of Caius Antonius, who was appointed to ſucceed him and already on his march, he reſigned to that chief of the republican party both his province and his troops; nay, he raiſed new forces for him in all the countries under his juriſdiction, and appeared as ſanguine in the great cauſe of liberty as Brutus himſelf. And now, Brutus being at the head of a powerful army and maſter of Greece and Macedon, all the petty kings and princes round about flocked to join him, and offer him their ſervice. Among the reſt a queen of Thrace, by name Polemocratia, whoſe huſband had been lately murdered by his rebellious ſubjects, had recourſe to him, and, delivering up to him all her treaſures, put herſelf and her ſon under his protection. Brutus received her with that humanity which was peculiar to him, and ſent her to Cyzicum in Aſia Minor, to live there far from danger, till a favourable opportunity offered of reſtoring her to her kingdom [d].

In the mean time, news being brought, that Caius, the brother of Antony, having croſſed the Adriatic, was advancing to join Gabinius, or as others call him, Vatinius, who commanded three legions in Dyrachium and Apollonia, Brutus reſolved to be beforehand with him. Accordingly, he moved forwards in all haſte with the few troops he had then with him. His march, though rugged places and a deep ſnow, ſnow, was ſo expeditious, that he left thoſe who were to bring his proviſions a great way behind. When he got near to Dyrrachium, he was ſeized with a diſtemper, which the Greeks call Bulimia, that is a violent hunger (W). As he grew very faint for want of food, and none in the army could ſupply him with any, his attendants were forced to have recourſe to the enemy, and, advancing to the very gates of the city, acquainted the centinels, who were there upon duty, with the ſad ſtate of Brutus, and begged them to relieve him. They were touched with compaſſion, and immediately flew to his relief with ~~plenty of~~ proviſions. Brutus on this occaſion won ſo much upon the affection of thoſe legionaries by his obliging behaviour, that they all joined him to a man, Gabinius himſelf not excepted, whom Cicero commended on that ſcore, laying aſide the hatred he had formerly bore him. Caius Antonius, receiving intelligence of what had happened at Dyrrachium, advanced with all poſſible expedition to Apollonia, and ſummoned all the ſoldiers, who were quartered near that city, to join him there. But finding they went all over to Brutus, and ſuſpecting that the garriſon of Apollonia were inclined to the ſame party, he abandoned that city, and haſtened to Buthrotus, now Butronto, on the Ionian ſea. Brutus purſued him cloſe, and on his march cut in pieces three of the ſeven cohorts that attended him. Upon this ſucceſs Brutus wrote to the ſenate, acquainting the conſcript fathers with what he had done in Greece and Macedon. His letter was read in the ſenate, by the conſul Panſa, who was ſtill in Rome, and his generous concern for the welfare of his country ſet forth by Cicero in his tenth Philippic? at whoſe motion a decree paſſed, appointing Brutus to govern Macedon, Illyricum, and all Greece, in quality of proconſul [e]. By the ſame decree both he and Caſſius were empowered to make uſe of the public money, and to raiſe what ſums they pleaſed in the provinces ſubject to Rome. The kings and cities of the eaſt, in alliance with the Roman people, were at the ſame time ordered to lend them all the aſſiſtance they could [f].

(W) The word Bulimia is compounded of the two Greek words, Βοῦς, an ox, and λιμός, hunger, and ſignifies an ox-like hunger, an inſatiable appetite, which proceeds from a too ſharp ferment in the ſtomach.

In the mean time, young Cicero, whom Brutus had detached with his light-armed foot in purſuit of Caius Antonius, coming up with him near Byllis, or Bullis, a city of Illyricum on the Adriatic, attacked him, and gave him a total overthrow. Caius fled with his troops to a neighbouring marſh, where he was ſurrounded by Brutus, without any poſſible means of making his eſcape. Brutus might with great eaſe have cut him off with all his troops: but he would not ſuffer his men to fall upon them, ſaying, that in a little time they would be all of his ſide; which accordingly happened, for they went all to a man over to Brutus, and even delivered up to him their general; ſo that Brutus had now eight legions under his command, a numerous body of horſe, and a great many archers and ſlingers, with ſeveral companies of Macedonians, whom he daily exerciſed after the Roman manner [g]. As for Caius Antonius, Brutus treated him with the utmoſt civility, and even ſuffered him to enjoy the title of proconſul, and all the badges of that dignity, though ſeveral ſenators, and particularly Cicero, ſolicited him by letters to rid the public of ſo dangerous an enemy. But finding at length that he abuſed his good-nature, and made uſe of the liberty, which, through an exceſs of kindneſs, was allowed him, to corrupt the officers and raiſe ſeditions among the ſoldiers, he confined him on bord a ſhip, and there kept him cloſe priſoner. Several ſoldiers, whom he had privately ſeduced, abandoning Brutus, retired to Apollonia, whence, repenting of the ſteps they had taken, they ſent him word, that if he would come thither, they would return to their duty. Brutus anſwered, that "this was not cuſtomary among the Romans, but that it became thoſe, who "had offended, to come to their general and beg forgive-"neſs of their crimes;" which they did, and were received with great kindneſs by their humane and good-natured general [h].

Caius Antonius defeated and taken priſoner.

About this time Brutus received a letter from the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, in which was incloſed, it ſeems, the copy of one written by Cicero to Octavianus after the battle of Mutina; wherein he firſt congratulated him on his late victory, and then told him, "that it was deſired and ex-"pected of him, that he would ſuffer thoſe citizens to lead "a quiet and peaceable life, whom all good men and the peo-"ple of Rome loved and eſteemed, meaning Brutus and his "followers.

followers. As this was tacitly acknowledging an authority in Octavianus above the laws, Brutus highly resented it, and expressed his resentment in the letters he wrote to Atticus and Cicero himself. "I had rather not live," says he, writing to Cicero, "than owe my life to him. I do not be- Brutus's letter to Ci-
"lieve that the Roman people have provoked the wrath of "the gods to such a degree, that Octavianus must be entreat-
"ed for the safety of one private citizen, much less for that
"of the deliverers of the world [i]". Cicero had, it seems, on what occasion we know not, reproached Casca with the murder of Cæsar, and was employing all his interest in favour of Octavianus. This drew several letters in very sharp terms from Brutus, which are still extant among Cicero's epistles, and will be lasting monuments of the honour, virtue, and truly noble spirit of that brave patriot, in spite of the many ill-natured reflections with which the flatterers of Augustus, and, since his time, the abetters of absolute power have endeavoured to blacken his character.

Brutus, being now at the head of a powerful army, and master of all Greece, Illyricum, Macedon and Thrace, resolved to pass into Asia and there join Cassius, whose progress in those eastern provinces, from the time he parted with Brutus in Athens to the consulate of Octavianus, we are now to relate. We have observed above, that P. Cornelius Dolabella, by the interest of Marc Antony, obtained of the people, in spite of the senate, the government of Syria. This Cassius no sooner understood, than he left Athens, and sailed first into Asia, which province was then governed by Trebonius, one of the conspirators, in quality of proconsul. It had been allotted to him a few days after Cæsar's death, and he, upon the arrival of Octavianus at Rome, had quitted the city and retired to his government, as is manifest from several of Cicero's epistles [k]. Cassius was well received by Trebonius, and also by P. Lentulus, who had been sent with him in quality of proquæstor extraordinary, his ordinary quæstor being L. Patiscus. This we gather from Cicero's epistles [l], which some writers seem not to have consulted, or to have misunderstood. These supplied Cassius with money; and he was soon soon after joined by a body of horse, which Dolabella had sent into Asia, with orders to pursue their march into Syria, and there wait for him. Lentulus, in one of his letters to Cicero, ascribes to himself the glory of having brought over these troops to Cassius's party [m]. It was no sooner known in Asia and Cilicia, that Cassius was raising forces, than the Romans, who were dispersed about those provinces, flocked to him from all quarters; so that seeing himself at the head of a considerable army, he left Asia, we mean Asia properly so called, and marched into Syria, with a design to seize on that province, before the arrival of Dolabella. He was scarce gone when Dolabella landed on the Asiatic coast, laid waste the country, made himself master of Tarsus, where Cassius had left a garrison, and murdered in a most cruel and treacherous manner the proconsul Trebonius, as we have related above. Cassius, on his arrival in Syria, found Statius Murcus, and Marcius Crispus carrying on the siege of Apamea against Q. Cæcilius Bassus, as we have related above. These two leaders immediately joined him with all their forces, and Bassus's soldiers forced him to do the same; whereupon the city being delivered up to Cassius, an end was put to the siege, and the army of that general, by this new addition, encreased to the number of eight legions. From this time he took upon him the title of proconsul, as appears from his letters to Cicero [n]; though Cicero, in his letters to him, does not acknowledge that title, as not yet granted him by the senate [o]. Both Murcus and Crispus heartily embraced Cassius's party; the former was by him appointed governor of Syria, and also admiral of his fleet; but Bassus, not caring to engage in this war, was permitted quietly to retire [p]. Cassius, being thus strengthened, soon made himself master of all Syria, which he did the more easily on account of the great reputation he had formerly acquired in that province, by defending it against the Parthians after the overthrow of Cassius at Carrhæ, as we have related at length in the history of the Parthians [q]. From Syria, he passed into Phœnice and Judæa, and secured to himself those countries [r]. While he lay there, he was informed, that Allienus, one of Dolabella's lieu-lieutenants, was marching through Paleſtine with four legions, which Cæſar had left in Egypt after the Alexandrian war. Upon this advice he went to meet them, and coming upon them unawares, obliged both Allienus and his legions to ſide with him, which, with thoſe he had before, made up the number of twelve legions. Of theſe forces he gave a particular account to Cicero, in a letter dated the nones of March from his camp at Tarichæa in Galilee [s]. For the maintaining of ſo numerous a body of men, he was forced to lay the country under heavy contributions; and Judæe being taxed at ſeven hundred talents, Antipater, took ſpeedy care for the anſwering of this ſum, committing it to the charge of his two ſons, Phaſael and Herod, and to Malichus and ſome others, ordering them to raiſe the ſum forthwith, and aſſigning to each of them their proper diſtricts for this purpoſe. Herod, having brought in his quota the firſt, gained by that means the favour of Caſſius. But Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and ſome other cities of Judæa, being backward in raiſing their quotas, Caſſius cauſed the inhabitants to be ſold for ſlaves to the beſt bidder, for the more ſpeedy payment of the ſum required. He was provoked to ſuch a degree againſt Malichus, who was very dilatory in this matter, that he would have put him to death, had not Hyrcanus appeaſed him with a preſent of an hundred talents, which he ſent him by Antipater [t]. In the mean time, Dolabella, after a long ſtay in Aſia, where he burdened the cities with new taxes and oppreſſed the inhabitants in a moſt cruel and tyrannical manner [u], paſſed firſt into Cilicia, and thence into Syria, with two legions, whither his fleet, compoſed of veſſels hired of the Lycians, Pamphylians, and Cilicians, ſailed ſoon after under the command of L. Figulus [w]. Upon his arrival in Syria, he attempted to enter Antioch, as governor of that province; but being repulſed by the inhabitants and the garriſon, which Caſſius had left there, with the loſs of about an hundred of his men, he abandoned the enterpriſe, and retired in the night towards Laodicea. During his march, moſt of the troops he had raiſed in Aſia abandoned him, ſome of them returning to Antioch, where they joined Caſſius's men, and others retiring over mount Amanus into Cilicia [x]. As the inhabitants of Laodicea were entirely devoted to Cæsar's party, they received Dolabella with open arms, and put him in possession of their city; which Cassius no sooner heard, than he hastened thither, leaving Herod governor of Cœle-Syria, with a strong detachment from his army to keep that province in awe [y]. Upon his arrival, he found Dolabella encamped under the walls of the city, nay, as we learn from a letter of Cassius Parmensis, and not of Cassius Longinus, as we conjecture, to Cicero, he had beat down part of the walls, and joined his camp to the town [z].

Where he is besieged by Cassius.

As Laodicea was placed on a peninsula, Cassius, to prevent Dolabella from making his escape by land, carried on a wall two furlongs in length cross the isthmus, with materials brought from the neighbouring villages and sepulchres. At the same time he dispatched messengers to the Phænicians, Lycians, and Rhodians for ships, with a design to block up the harbour. But the Sidonians alone complied with his summons, and sent him what vessels they had already equipped in their harbour. They were scarce arrived, when Dolabella's fleet under the command of L. Figulus appeared off Laodicea.

Cassius' fleet defeated.

Cassius, though his fleet was far inferior in number to the enemy's, yet would by all means venture an engagement, in which both parties fought with incredible bravery. But at length Cassius's fleet was overpowered, and five of his ships taken with all the mariners on board. Hereupon Cassius dispatched messengers anew to those who had slighted his first summons, and besides to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, and to Serapion, who commanded her forces in Cyprus. The Tyrians, Aradians, and also Serapion, without the knowledge of his mistress, obeyed the second summons, and sent what ships they could assemble. But Cleopatra herself, who had been greatly favoured by Cæsar, and consequently bore an irreconcileable hatred to all those who were concerned in his death, refused to lend them any assistance, under pretence, that Egypt was then afflicted with a plague and famine. The Rhodians and Lycians declared, that they designed to maintain a strict neutrality, though it was well known, that Dolabella's fleet consisted mostly of Lycian and Rhodian vessels. Of this Lentulus, who was proquæstor extraordinary of Asia, complained in his letters both to the senate and to Cicero; for Dolabella had been declared an enemy to the people of Rome, and the republic had lately renewed her alliance with the Rhodians [a]. However Statius Murcus, the admiral of Cassius's

Caſſius's fleet, having got together a conſiderable number of ſhips of war in Phænice and on the coaſts of Aſia, ventured two other engagements, in the firſt whereof they parted upon equal terms; but in the ſecond Dolabella's fleet was entirely defeated. Then Murcus blocked up the port with his victorious fleet; ſo that no proviſions could be conveyed into the beſieged city either by ſea or land, the wall, which Caſſius had begun to croſs the iſthmus, being now completed. The place being thus reduced to the utmoſt extremity, Dolabella attempted ſeveral times to ſally out at the head of the garriſon, but was conſtantly driven back into the city, which was at length, without his knowledge, delivered up to the enemy by one Quintius, a chief officer of his army. Dolabella, ſeeing the enemy in poſſeſſion of the city, and fearing Caſſius would retaliate upon him his cruel treatment of the unfortunate Trebonius, ordered one of his guards to cut off his head; which he did accordingly, and then killed himſelf with the ſame ſword. The example of Dolabella was followed by M. Octavius his lieutenant, and Q. Marſus, another of his chief officers. Caſſius ordered their bodies to be decently interred, though they had refuſed that honour to the poor remains of Trebonius, which they threw into the ſea, after having inſulted them in the groſſeſt manner. But Caſſius, at the ſight of Dolabella's head, ſeemed to have forgot the vengeance he owed to the manes of his friend. As for the ſoldiers, who ſerved under the deceaſed general, though they had been declared enemies to the republic as well as himſelf, Caſſius generouſly forgave them, and, having obliged them to take the military oath to him, incorporated them among his legionaries [b]. Appian tells us, that Caſſius plundered both the temples and treaſury of Laodicea, that he laid heavy taxes on the inhabitants, and put all the nobility to the ſword; ſo that the city was reduced to a moſt miſerable condition [c]. What Appian ſays has not been a little exaggerated by the authors of the Roman hiſtory now publiſhing at Paris: for they tell us, that "the ſtreets in an inſtant were covered with dead bodies; that the blood ran "in ſtreams; that neither temples nor palaces were ſpared; "that thoſe, whom the conqueror thought fit to pardon, "were forced to pay ſuch exhorbitant ſums that death ſeem-

Theſe reverend writers, men indeed of great learning, but avowed champions of arbitrary power, omit no opportunity of throwing what dirt they can upon thoſe who ſtand up in defence of their liberties. They conſtantly follow thoſe authors, whoſe accounts are the leaſt favourable to them, without taking notice of what others, leſs partial and biaſſed, have wrote on the ſame ſubject. In the preſent caſe, Dion Caſſius diſagreeing, as he often does, with Appian, after having told us, that Caſſius gave quarter and impunity to Dolabella's troops, adds, "neither puniſhed he the inhabitants of Laodicea, "otherwiſe than by obliging them to pay a ſum of money [e]." No mention here of "ſtreams of blood, of ſtreets covered "with dead bodies, of exorbitant taxes which made death "itſelf deſireable.

The government of Syria confirmed to Caſſius.

And now Caſſius, after the reduction of Laodicea, become maſter of all Syria, acquainted the conſcript fathers with the ſucceſs of his arms; who thereupon confirmed to him the government of thoſe vaſt provinces, as they did to Brutus that of Greece, Macedon, and Illyricum, ordering all the ſtates and cities, in alliance with, or ſubject to, Rome, to obey their orders and aſſiſt them to the utmoſt of their power [f]. Thus Brutus and Caſſius, who had fled from Rome, as Plutarch obſerves [g], like deſpicable exiles, without money or arms, without ſhips, ſoldiers, or one ſingle city to rely on, were now maſters of large provinces, had above twenty legions under their command, and were in a condition to keep in awe and withſtand the united forces of Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus. Thus was the Roman ſtate, taken in its utmoſt extent, divided between two oppoſite parties, the Cæſareans, that is, thoſe who were for introducing abſolute government, and arbitrary power; and the republicans, that is, zealous defenders of their liberties and the antient cuſtoms and laws of the republic. The latter prevailed in the eaſt; and the former in the weſt: where they were obeyed by all the nations between the ocean and the ſtreights of Meſſana, or the moſt ſouthern borders of Italy. As for Sicily, it was held at this time by Sextus Pompeius, the younger ſon of Pompey the Great, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of thls hiſtory. Such was the ſituation of affairs at the beginning of Octavianus's firſt conſulate. What happened in Italy and

and the ſeveral provinces ſubject to the diſtracted and expiring republic, from his conſulate to the death of Brutus and Caſſius, ſhall be the ſubject of the following chapter.

CHAP. XV.

The Hiſtory of Rome, from the firſt conſulate of Octavianus to the death of Caſſius and Brutus.

THE firſt ſtep Octavianus took, after he had entered upon his conſulate, was, to get his adoption confirmed in a general aſſembly of the people. In the next place, he prevailed upon the ſenate to revoke their decree, declaring Dolabella, whoſe death was not yet known at Rome, an enemy to his country [h]. Soon after his collegue Q. Pædius, at his inſtigation, propoſed a law for impeaching, trying, and condemning all thoſe who had been any ways concerned in the death of Cæſar. Purſuant to this law which paſſed without oppoſition, L. Cornificius took upon him to accuſe Brutus, and the famous M. Vipſanius Agrippa (X) appeared againſt

(X) Marcus Vipſanius Agrippa was according to Suetonius (37), of a mean decent, but of an equeſtrian family accoring to Cornelius Nepos (38). The former writer tells us, that the emperor Caligula, aſhamed to acknowledge Agrippa for his grandfather, gave out, that his mother Agrippina was not the daughter of Agrippa, but the fruit of an inceſtuous commerce, between Julia the wife of Agrippa and her father Auguſtus; chuſing out of a fooliſh and ſhameful vanity, to owe his birth rather to an inceſt, than a lawful marriage (39), Agrippa was brought up from his infancy with Octavianus, and ſerved him to the laſt with the utmoſt fidelity. We ſhall have occaſion to make frequent mention of him in the ſequel of this hiſtory. Velleius Paterculus, a ſcandalous flatterer of the Cæſars, tells us, that his uncle Capito joined Agrippa in accuſing Brutus (40).

againſt Caſſius. The conſpirators were all ſummoned to take their trials; and we are told, that when the herald pronounced the name of Brutus, both the people and ſenate expreſſed their concern for ſo worthy a citizen with ſighs and tears. Among the many judges, who were choſen for the deciſion of ſo important a cauſe, Silicius Coronas was the only perſon who had courage enough to declare in their favour, which coſt him his life; for though Octavianus thought it then adviſeable to diſſemble his reſentment, and pretended even to be reconciled to Silicius, yet he ſoon after ſacrificed him to his revenge. Notwithſtanding the oppoſition of that generous citizen, the conſpirators were all condemned, without being heard, to perpetual baniſhment, and their eſtates confiſcated [i]. But as Brutus and Caſſius were at the head of twenty legions, Octavianus rightly judged, that it would not be eaſy for him to deſtroy them, without the aſſiſtance of Antony and Lepidus. He therefore diſpatched truſty meſſengers to theſe two chiefs, deſiring them to march with all poſſible expedition into Italy, that they might, with their united forces, fall upon Brutus and Caſſius, and drive them out of the provinces which they had ſeized. Hereupon they both ſet out without delay, and paſſing the Alps, at the head of ſeventeen legions, entered Ciſalpine Gaul. The ſenate, alarmed at their approach, and ſtill ſtrangers to the private managements between them and Octavianus, ordered the latter to march out againſt them, and make war upon them as public enemies. Octavianus with great joy embraced this opportunity of putting the laſt hand to the treaty, which had been begun ſome time ſince between him and his rival. But, before he left Rome he gave private inſtructions to Quintus Pædius his collegue and creature, to inſinuate, as of his own motion, to the ſenate, that it was for the advantage of the commonwealth to repeal their decree againſt Antony and Lepidus, and not drive ſuch men to deſpair, eſpecially Antony, who was as great a commander, and no leſs to be dreaded than, Sylla and Marius. This propoſal was no-ways agreeable to the ſenate; but nevertheleſs, as they ſuſpected Octavianus to be at the bottom of the whole, they wrote to him for his advice in ſo nice a point. The crafty general readily conſented to the repealing of the decree, as we may well imagine; but, to deceive the ſenate, told them in his letter, that his conſent had been in a manner extorted extorted by the earneſt entreaties of his ſoldiers. However, the conſcript fathers began now plainly to ſee, that Octavianus's deſign was to gain over Antony to his party, and to act in concert with him againſt the defenders of the public liberty. But they were no longer in a condition to withſtand him, and therefore ſolemnly diſannulled all the decrees againſt Antony and his adherents. In acknowledgment of this good turn, Antony marched immediately againſt Decimus Brutus, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Mutina with ten legions, four whereof conſiſted of veterans, but who were in a very bad condition on account of the diſtempers and fatigues they had ſuffered during the late ſiege; the ſix others were newly raiſed, and quite unacquainted with military diſcipline. So that Brutus, not finding himſelf in a condition to oppoſe the united and ſuperior forces of Antony and Lepidus, reſolved to quit Ciſalpine Gaul, and by the way of Aquileia paſs into Illyricum, and from thence into Macedon, where M. Brutus commanded. But finding all the paſſes ſeized, on that ſide, by Octavianus's troops, he took his rout towards the Alps with a deſign to paſs the Rhine, where that river divides Tranſalpine Gaul from Germany, and through the latter country purſue his march into Macedon. But the apprehenſion of the fatigues and dangers of ſo long a journey had ſuch an effect on the minds of the new-raiſed troops, that they all abandoned Brutus and went over to Antony. Their example was ſoon followed by the other four legions; ſo that Brutus's army was ſoon reduced to a few ſquadrons of Gauliſh horſe; and to ſuch of theſe alſo, as betrayed any unwillingneſs to follow him, Brutus not only gave leave to return home, but generouſly ſupplyed them with money to defray the charges of their journey. Thus guarded only by three hundred horſe, he marched as far as the Rhine, the ſight of which rapid river ſo frightened the few Gauls he had with him, that they ſtole away one after another, except ten, who ſeemed determined never to forſake him. In this extremity he laid aſide all thoughts of entering Germany, and dreſſing himſelf after the Gauliſh manner, as he ſpoke the language like a native, he reſolved in that diſguiſe to return through Gaul into Italy, not without hopes of reaching at length Macedon undiſcovered. But he had not gone far, before he had the misfortune to be taken by a band of freebooters, who conducted him, at his requeſt, to the lord of that diſtrict, by name Camillus, or, as others call him, Camelius, who had received a thouſand favours at his hands in the dictator's life-time. But the ungrateful wretch, after having having received him in a friendly manner, diſpatched a meſſenger to Antony, acquainting him, that he had Brutus in his power, and was ready to diſpoſe of him as he pleaſed. Antony was touched with compaſſion at the misfortunes of a man ſo conſiderable for his birth and the great offices he had borne. But nevertheleſs, as it was for the intereſt of his party that he ſhould be cut off, he wrote word to Camillus to diſpatch him and ſend him his head: which the treacherous Gaul did accordingly, without any regard to the ſacred laws of hoſpitality. Dion Caſſius, Valerius Maximus, and Seneca tell us, that Brutus behaved on this occaſion in a manner very unbecoming a man of his rank and ſtation, and that he earneſtly begged for his life, even after Helvius Blaſia, his intimate friend and inſeparable companion, had killed himſelf in his preſence, to animate him by his example [k]. Cicero on the contrary, who was intimately accquainted with him, ſpeaks of him as a man, "who was never afraid, or even diſturbed [l];" and the authority of Cicero is more to be relied on, than that of all the hiſtorians, who wrote long after, put together. However, the learned fathers Catrou and Rouille, in their Roman hiſtory, take no notice of this paſſage, which would have left no room for their long deſcants on the cowardice of that perfidious wretch, that cruel traytor, that inhuman aſſaſſin, as they are pleaſed to ſtile Brutus for conſpiring againſt ſo fine a man as Cæſar, guilty of no fault but that of tyranny and uſurpation. When his head was brought to Antony, he looked on it with ſome concern, and then delivered it to his friends, by whom it was decently buried [m]. Thus died Decimus Junius Brutus, a year and a half after the death of Cæſar. He had been always honoured by the dictator with particular marks of friendſhip and confidence, as appears both from his will, and from the great employments to which he raiſed him. For he was appointed one of his ſecond heirs, in caſe any of his great nephews ſhould renounce the inheritance; and had been general of his horſe; governor firſt of Tranſalpine, and afterwards of Ciſalpine, Gaul, and named conſul, according to Velleius Paterculus, for the year after the conſulate of Hirtius and Panſa [n]. And indeed Decimus ſerved him with the utmoſt fidelity, till he began openly to aſpire at the ſovereign power; and then, conſidering him no longer as a friend, but as a tyrant, he preferred the public welfare welfare to his private intereſt, which the abetters of arbitrary power look upon as an enormous crime. Antony immediately acquainted Octavianus, that he had ſacrificed Decimus to the manes of his father, and then advanced with Lepidus at the head of his army to meet him. The place they choſe for their private conferences was a ſmall iſland formed by the river Rhenus, now the Reno, which falls into the Po, after having watered the territory of Bononia or Bologna (Y). Both armies advanced to the oppoſite banks of this river, from whence by two bridges a communication was opened with the iſland. Lepidus entered the firſt into the iſland, to view whether it was ſafe for the other two to venture into it. Such was the unfortunate condition of thoſe ambitious men, who, even in the midſt of a reconciliation, could not help miſtruſting each other. Lepidus having made the ſignal that was agreed on, the two generals entered the iſland from the oppoſite banks, each of them guarded by three hundred men, who remained at the head of the bridges, while the two chiefs advanced to the place of the interview, which was a riſing ground, whence they could be equally ſeen by their guards and both armies. After they had ſaluted and embraced each other in a polite and friendly manner, they took their ſeats, the other two yielding to Octavianus, as conſul, the moſt honourable place. The conference laſted three days, during which time they had the precaution to ſpeak conſtantly ſo low, notwithſtanding ſome warm debates, that not a ſingle word could be heard even by their guards, who ſtood but at a ſmall diſtance. At length they agreed on the following articles: "1. That Octavianus ſhould forthwith reſign the conſulate, "which gave him a kind of preeminence over the other "two, to Ventidius one of Antony's lieutenants. 2. That the "ſupreme authority ſhould be divided among them three, and "kept by them for the ſpace of five years, under the name "of triumvirs, and in quality of reformers of the common-"wealth. 3. That they ſhould cauſe this authority to be "confirmed

(Y) Appian will have the triumvirs to have met in an iſland formed by the river Labinius in the neighbourhood of Mantua (41). But, in the firſt place, the Labinius, or, as others call it, the Lavinus, is at a great diſtance from Mantua, and rather in the neighbourhood of Bononia; and beſides, is not large enough to form an iſland, being in reality not a river, but a rivulet, known at preſent by the name of Lavino.

" confirmed by the Roman people. 4. That Antony ſhould " have all Tranſalpine and Ciſalpine Gaule, except Nar- " bonne, which together with both Spains ſhould be " yielded to Lepidus; and that Octavianus ſhould have for " his ſhare Africa, with Sicily and Sardinia. 5. That Italy " and the eaſtern provinces, which were poſſeſſed by Brutus and Caſſius, ſhould for a while remain in common. 6. " That Antony and Octavianus ſhould forthwith join their " forces and make war upon Brutus and Caſſius, while Lepi- " dus with four legions ſtaid at Rome, to maintain the au- " thority of the triumvirate there." Thus was the empire of the world divided, as Plutarch obſerves, among theſe three chiefs, as if it had been their paternal inheritance. Beſides theſe, ſeveral other articles were ſettled. As it was of the utmoſt importance, eſpecially for Octavianus and Antony, who were to march into the eaſt againſt Brutus and Caſſius, to ſecure the fidelity of the legions, it was agreed, that each legionary ſhould receive after the war five thouſand drachmas, each centurion twenty-five thouſand, and each tribune fifty thouſand. To theſe immenſe and almoſt incredible ſums, were added other rewards, yet more ſubſtantial. The triumvirs agreed to promiſe their ſoldiers ſettlements, on their return from the eaſt, in eighteen of the beſt cities of Italy, which ſhould be choſen out by the three chiefs, and abandoned in property with their houſes and lands to the ſoldiers. As for the antient proprietors, they were by a crying injuſtice to be driven out of their old habitations, ſtript of their lands and effects, and ſuffered either to periſh with famine, or ſhift for themſelves in the beſt manner they could. Some of theſe unhappy cities were even then named, viz. Capua, Rhegium, Beneventum, Luceria, Ariminum, and Vibo. As the triumvirs had occaſion for immenſe ſums to carry on the war, and beſides were well appriſed, that there were ſtill in Rome great numbers of zealous republicans, who probably would raiſe diſturbances in Italy, during their abode in the eaſt, they came to that barbarous and inhuman reſolution, which will render their memories execrable and infamous to the lateſt poſterity; a reſolution, which brings diſgrace upon tyranny itſelf. They agreed not only to cut off all their enemies, but thoſe alſo who were either poſſeſſed of great eſtates, or were thought to retain the leaſt ſpark of zeal for their antient laws and liberties. This they looked upon as the ſureſt means of maintaining themſelves in the peaceable poſſeſſion of their uſurped tyranny, and at the ſame time of raiſing the neceſſary ſums for the ſupport of their troops. Theſe regulations were made without without the leaſt conteſt or diſpute; but the liſt of the proſcibed, when it came to be ſettled, occaſioned warm debates, each of them intending to deſtroy his enemies and ſave his friends. Antony would come to no agreement till Cicero's name was ſet down in the fatal liſt. Octavianus endeavoured to ſave him, and was for having Antony to ſacrifice Lucius Cæſar, his uncle by the mother's ſide. As for Lepidus, ſome writers tell us, that contrary to the inclination of the other two, he inſiſted upon the condemnation of his own brother L. Æmilius Paulus, who had voted the firſt in the ſenate for paſſing the decree, which declared him a publick enemy when he joined Antony. Other authors ſay, that he would fain have ſaved his brother, but that Octavianus and Antony demanded his head. However that be, the thirſt of being revenged on their enemies at length got the better of the deſire of ſaving their friends and relations. Octavianus in the end ſacrificed Cicero, to Antony; Antony his uncle Lucius to Octavianus; and Lepidus was either allowed to murder his brother Paulus, or forced to abandon him to the reſentment of the other two. The death of theſe three being agreed on, the liſt of the others, whom the triumvirs doomed to die, was ſoon drawn up, each of the three tyrants ſetting down the names of his particular enemies, and even of the enemies of his creatures. The firſt in this liſt was Paulus, the brother of Lepidus; Lucius Cæſar, Antony's uncle, was the ſecond; and Cicero the third. After theſe were named Plotius, conſul elect, and brother to Plancus one of Antony's lieutenants; Quintus, who was alſo deſigned conſul for the enſuing year, and whoſe daughter Aſinius Pollio, a great ſtickler for the triumvirate, had lately married; Thoranius, who had been governor to Octavianus, and had taken particular care of his education, and many others, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the ſequel of the hiſtory. And now the articles of this wicked confederacy being agreed on, and ſwore to by the contracting parties, the three chiefs ſeparated, after embracing each other, and went to impart the reſult of their conferences to their reſpective armies, who, overjoyed at the advantageous promiſes that were made them, heard the report with the greateſt ſatisfaction. The ſame day the two armies joined, and mutually feaſted and entertained each other (A). Thus was concluded the ſecond triumvirate

AND now the triumvirs, ſeeing their agreement, and each of the articles on which it was concluded, approved by the ſoldiery of both armies, reſolved in the firſt place to publiſh the decree of proſcription, and haſten the execution of it, before their enemies could have any notice of their wicked deſigns. Accordingly the fatal decree was drawn up and made public. It began thus: "M. Lepidus, M. Antonius, and "Octavianus Cæſar, choſen for the reformation of the com-"monwealth. If the generoſity of Julius Cæſar had not "prompted him to pardon ſome faithleſs men, and to grant "them, beſides their lives, of which they were unworthy, "honours and offices, which they deſerved as little, he had "not fallen by their treaſon, nor ſhould we have been obliged "to proceed in a manner diſagreeable to us, againſt thoſe "who have declared us enemies to our country. But the "wicked deſigns they formed againſt us, the horrible treachery "they ſhewed towards Cæſar, and the certain knowledge we "have of their execrable practices, force us to prevent the "evils with which we are threatened." Then followed a juſtification of the proceedings of the triumvirs, founded on the advantages which Cæſar had procured for the Roman people, by his victories, on the ingratitude of thoſe who had murdered him, and on the neceſſity of clearing the city of ſuch as might involve it in new troubles. They concluded thus: "No man ſhall dare to receive, conceal, help to eſ-"cape, any ways relieve thoſe who are proſcribed, or hold "any manner of intelligence with them, upon pain of being "himſelf proſcribed. Whoſoever ſhall bring to any of the "triumvirs the head of a proſcribed perſon ſhall receive, if "a freeman, twenty-five thouſand ſeſterces, and ten thouſand, "if and Octavianus might be cemented by ſome alliance, and forced in a manner the latter to divorce Servilia, the daughter of Servilius Iſauricus, whom he had married when he was very young, and to take in her room Clodia, the daughter of the famous P. Clodius, who was killed by Milo, and of Fulvia, whom Antony had married after the death of her firſt huſband (42).

" ſhall be given to ſuch as ſhall declare the place, where any
" proſcribed perſon lies concealed, and the name of the in-

" may never be known who he was." This decree, toge-ther with the firſt liſt of the unhappy wretches who were doomed to die, was immediately ſent to Rome, and at the ſame time ſome companies of ſoldiers diſpatched thither, to put the cruel orders of the triumvirs in execution. The ſoldiers arrived in the evening before the decree, and meeting four of the proſcribed perſons in the ſtreets, immediately put them to death: others were inhumanly maſſacred in their houſes; ſome while they were ſupping with their friends, and ſome in the temples, whither, upon the firſt alarm, they had fled for refuge. The city was in an inſtant filled with horror and confuſion. Nothing was heard but cries and lamentations. As the liſt of the proſcribed perſons was not yet made public, every one fancied himſelf in that number; and hence a general terror and conſternation. Some in the height of their deſpair reſolved to involve the whole city in their deſtruction, and accordingly ſet fire to it in different quarters. The darkneſs of the night, the fire which began to flame out in ſeveral places, the cries and groans of thoſe who were inhumanly butchered in the ſtreets, the running up and down of the armed ſoldiers, the flight of the people, the ſhrieks of the women, &c. filled every breaſt with dread and horror. Q. Pædius, the only conſul then in Rome, to remove the fears of the alarmed multitude and prevent diſorders, ran from ſtreet to ſtreet, cauſing it to be every-where publiſhed, that the number of thoſe, who were doomed to die, was but very ſmall, and that, as ſoon as it was day, he would cauſe their names to be fixed up in the forum. Accordingly, early next morning, the liſt of the proſcribed, containing the names only of ſeventeen perſons, was ſet up in a public place, together with the decree of the triumvirs. This reſtored tranquillity to the city for a while; but the conſul Pædius, having over-heated himſelf with running up and down the city, to calm the minds of the people and prevent diſorders, died the night following [p].

Rome in the utmoſt conſternation.

DURING theſe alarms, the triumvirs advanced, at the head of their united forces, towards Rome, which they entered on three different days, Octavianus on the firſt, Antony on the

the ſecond, and Lepidus on the third, each of them being attended with his prætorian cohort and one legion. The firſt ſtep they took after their arrival was, to get a law paſſed, inveſting them with the authority which they had uſurped. It was accordingly propoſed by the tribune P. Titius to the aſſembled tribes, who paſſed it the ſame day in the following terms: "The Roman people lawfully aſ-" ſembled have thought fit to appoint three perſons to go-" vern the commonwealth with conſular power. Theſe " are M. Antonius, M. Lepidus, and Cæſar Octavianus, " whoſe authority ſhall be acknowledged and obeyed by all " for the ſpace of five years." The decree was no ſooner paſſed, than Octavianus, purſuant to one of the articles of the confederacy, reſigned his conſulſhip, ſome ſay to C. Carrinas, others to Ventidius (B). However that be, theſe two were by the triumvirs appointed conſuls for the remaining part of the preſent year; but they made no figure, the whole power and authority of the public being lodged in the triumvirs. Theſe three tyrants, looking upon themſelves now as lawful magiſtrates, added the night following the names of an hundred and thirty perſons to thoſe they had already proſcribed; a few days after they proſcribed an hundred and fifty more, and thus they daily encreaſed the number, till it mounted at laſt to three hundred ſenators, and above two thouſand knights. It is impoſſible to paint the horrors of this bloody proſcription; by it every conſiderable man in Rome, who was diſliked, or ſuſpected by the triumvirate to diſapprove their tyranny, who was rich and had wherewithal to glut their avarice, was doomed to die. As it was death to conceal or help them, and ample rewards

(B) We have given elſewhere a particular account of the riſe, exploits, and character of Ventidius (43); and therefore ſhall only add here, that as he had been formerly a muletier, and had got his livelihood by providing mules to carry the baggage of ſuch Roman magiſtrates as were ſent to govern foreign provinces, when he was raiſed to the conſulate, the following lampoon was fixed up in all the public places of the city:

" Concurrite, omnes augures, aruſpices;
" Portentum inuſitatum conflatum eſt recens:
" Nam mulos qui fricabat, conſul factus eſt (44).

rewards were given to ſuch as diſcovered and killed them, many were betrayed and butchered by their ſlaves and freedmen, many by their treacherous hoſts and relations. Many fled to the wilderneſs, where they periſhed for want with their tender children. Nothing was to be ſeen but blood and ſlaughter; the ſtreets were covered with dead bodies, the heads of the moſt illuſtrious ſenators were expoſed upon the roſtra, and their bodies left unburied in the ſtreets and fields, to be devoured by the dogs and ravenous birds. This looked like dooming Rome to periſh at once. Many uncondemned perſons periſhed in this confuſion, ſome by malice or miſtake, others for concealing or defending their friends. Some of the antient hiſtorians ſeem to take pleaſure in deſcribing the horrors of this bloody and cruel proſcription, which reduced the populous capital of the world almoſt to a wilderneſs. They produce many remarkable and affecting inſtances of the affection of wives for their huſbands, and of the fidelity of ſlaves towards their maſters; but few, very few, as they own with great concern, of the love of children towards their parents. However, the dutiful behaviour of Oppius may ſtand for many, who like Æneas, carried his old and decrepit father on his ſhoulders to the ſea-ſide, and eſcaped with him into Sicily. His piety was not long unrewarded; for, on his return to Rome, after the triumvirs had put an end to the proſcription, he found the people ſo taken with that generous action, that all the tribes unanimouſly concurred in raiſing him to the ædileſhip; and becauſe he wanted money to exibit the uſual ſports, the artificers worked without wages, and the people not only taxed themſelves to defray the neceſſary charges attending ſuch ſhews, but gave proofs of the eſteem they had for ſo dutiful a ſon by ſuch contributions, as amounted to twice the value of his paternal eſtate, which had been confiſcated by the triumvirs. Caius Hoſidius Geta was likewiſe ſaved by his ſon, who ſpread a report, that his father had laid violent hands on himſelf, and, to render the fact more credible, ſpent the poor remains of his fortune in performing his obſequies. By this means Hoſidius, not being ſearched after, made his eſcape, but loſt one of his eyes, which he had kept too long covered with a plaiſter, the better to diſguiſe him. As for the barbarous impiety of thoſe children, who by a ſtrange apoſtaſy from nature betrayed their own parents, it ought to be buried with them in eternal oblivion. Nothing can reflect greater infamy on the memory of the triumvirs, than their countenancing ſuch impious monſters. Several ſlaves choſe rather to die on the rack, amidſt the moſt exquiſite torments, than diſcover the place where their maſters lay concealed; others, not caring to outlive them, fell by their own hands upon their dead bodies. Many illuſtrious matrons gave remarkable proofs of ir conjugal love in theſe times of calamity, which ought to be paſſed over in ſilence. The wife of Q. Ligarius, ing her huſband betrayed by one of his ſlaves, declared to the executioners who cut off his head, that ſhe had concealed him, and conſequently ought, in virtue of the decree, to undergo the ſame fate. But they not hearkening to her, ſhe appeared before the triumvirs themſelves, upbraided them with their cruelty, owned ſhe had concealed, in ſpite of their decree, her huſband, and begged death of them as a favour. Being driven away by their officers, ſhe ſhut herſelf up in her own houſe, and there, as ſhe was determined not to outlive her huſband, ſtarved herſelf to death. Acilius was betrayed by one of his ſlaves, and apprehended, but redeemed by his wife, who readily parted with all her jewels to ſave his life. Apuleius, Antiſtius, Antius, Q. Lucretius Viſpallio, Titus Vinius, and many others, were ſaved by the ingenious contrivances of their wives, after they had given themſelves up for loſt. Lucius, the uncle of Antony, was ſaved by his ſiſter Julia, in whoſe houſe he had taken refuge. The miniſters of the triumvirs endeavoured to break into the room, where he lay concealed; but his ſiſter meeting them at the door, cried out ſeveral times, "You "ſhall never kill Lucius Cæſar, till you firſt diſpatch me, "me, who gave your general his life and being." The aſſaſſins, thunder-ſtruck at theſe words, retired; but nevertheleſs Julia flew to the forum, where her ſon was ſitting on his tribunal, receiving the heads of the proſcribed, and paying the aſſaſſins the promiſed rewards. "I have tranſ-"greſſed your decree," ſaid ſhe to Antony, and am come to inform againſt myſelf. I have taken my brother into my houſe, and am reſolved to protect him, till you ſhall think fit to put us both to death. "You have behaved," replied Antony, "like a good ſiſter, but as a bad mo-"ther," and took no further notice of what Julia ſaid; but Lucius was no more enquired after. Though the country as well as the city ſwarmed with informers and aſſaſſins, yet many illuſtrious citizens found means to avoid the fury of the proſcription, and to get ſafe, either to Brutus in Macedon, or to Sextus Pompeius in Sicily. The latter kept conſtantly a great number of ſmall veſſels hovering on the coasts of Italy, to receive such as made their escape, and treated them with great kindness and civility. The most considerable persons among those who had the good luck to elude the fury of their enemies and persecutors, were, besides those we have already mentioned, Valerius Messala, Bibulus, Arianus, Metellus, Restio, Appius, Meneius, Junius, Pomponius, Hirtius, Apuleius, Aruntius, Coponius, and Ventidius. Messala and Bibulus were invited home by the triumvirs, who by a public declaration owned, that they had not been any ways accessary to the death of Cæsar; but they chose to continue with Brutus in Macedon, and signalized themselves in the battle of Philippi. Bibulus was afterwards raised to the first employments in the state. Arianus and Metellus were saved by their children, Restio, Appius, Meneius, and Junius by their slaves. Restio had marked one of his slaves on the forehead with a red-hot iron; the usual punishment inflicted on such slaves as attempted to run away from their masters. This slave, having by chance found out the place where Restio lay concealed, appeared unexpectedly before him, asking whether he could do him any service? Restio had afterwards treated the slave with great humanity, and done him many favours; but nevertheless, seeing himself now in his power, he looked upon his case as desperate, not doubting, but the slave would seize this opportunity of being revenged on him for the former affront; which the faithful and generous slave observing, addressed him thus: "Can you imagine, that "the marks, with which you formerly branded me, have "made a deeper impression on my forehead, than the fa- "vours, which you have since bestowed upon me, have done "in my heart!"

The fidelity of some slaves.

HAVING thus spoke, he led him to a cave, and there supported him for some time with what he earned by his daily labour. At length a company of soldiers coming that way, and approaching the cave, the faithful slave, alarmed at the danger his master was in, followed them close, and falling upon a poor peasant, killed him in their presence, and cut off his head, crying out, "I am now revenged on "my master for the marks with which he has branded "me." The soldiers, seeing the infamous marks on his forehead, and not doubting but he had killed Restio, snatched the head out of his hand and returned with it in all haste to the triumvirs. They were no sooner gone, than the slave conveyed his master to the sea-side, where they had the good luck to find one of Sextus Pompeius's vessels, which tranſported them ſafe into Sicily. The generoſity of the ſlaves of Appius and Meneius, or Menenius, was ſtill more heroic; for they ſuffered themſelves to be ſlain in their maſters habits, while their maſters made their eſcape in the diſguiſe of ſlaves. Pomponius, finding no other means to get ſafe out of Rome, aſſumed the habit of a prætor, and went early out of the city in that attire, being attended by his ſlaves in the diſguiſe of lictors: he travelled at the expence of the public, giving out every-where, that he was ſent by the triumvirs to negotiate a treaty with young Pompey: he was well received in all the cities on the road, and ſupplied both with horſes and proviſions: ſeveral bands of ſoldiers and aſſaſſins met him on his journey, but none of them offered to ſtop or examine an embaſſadôr of the triumvirs; ſo that he reached Sicily undiſcovered. Hirtius, Apuleius, and Aruntius killed, with the aſſiſtance of their friends, clients, and ſlaves, the ſoldiers, who were ſent to murder them, and made their eſcape ſword in hand. Ventidius, not the conſul, deceived the murderers, by pretending to be one of them himſelf, and patrolling about the country with ſome of his friends, as in ſearch of proſcribed perſons. The ſenator Coponius was ſaved by his wife at the expence of her virtue, Antony having cauſed his name to be ſtruck out of the black liſt in regard of her compliance with his unlawful demands, after ſhe had been proof for ſeveral years againſt the offers, careſſes, and menaces of the lewd tyrant. Another ſenator, being quite tired with concealing himſelf in caves and dens, and ſculking about the country in continual alarms, returned to Rome in the diſguiſe of a ſchool-maſter, opened there a little ſchool, and kept it as long as the proſcription laſted without being diſcovered, no-body imagining, that a poor pedant could have been of ſuch ſignificancy, as to be ranked among the proſcribed ſenators and knights [q].

The bold undertaking of Pomponius.

THOUGH we may perhaps ſeem to have dwelt already too long on ſo diſagreeable a ſubject, yet we muſt, before we diſmiſs it, acquaint our readers with the fate of Cicero. The great reputation of that orator, the obligations which all men of learning owe to his memory, and the inimitable works he has left behind him, require of us a particular account of his death, and the moſt minute circumſtances cumstances attending it. He was with his brother Quintus, who was likewise proscribed, at his country-house near Tusculum, when the first news was brought him of the proscription. He no sooner heard it, than he left Tusculum with his brother, taking his rout towards Astura (C), or, as some call it, Stura, another of his country-houses, on the sea-side between the promontories of Antium and Circæum. There they both designed to take shipping, and endeavour to join Brutus in Macedon. They travelled together each in his litter, oppressed with sorrow, and often joined their litters on the road to condole each other. As they had, in the first alarm and hurry, forgot to take with them the necessary money to defray the expences of their voyage, it was agreed between them, that Cicero should make what haste he could to the sea-side, and Quintus return home to provide necessaries. Thus they embraced each other, and parted with reciprocal fears. Quintus returned to Rome, and got to his house undiscovered, where he thought himself safe at least for a short time, since it had been lately searched by the ministers of the triumvirs. But, as in most houses there were as many informers as domestics, his return was immediately known, and the house of course filled with soldiers and assassins, who, not being able to find him out, put his son to the torture, in order to make him declare where his father lay concealed. But filial affection was proof in the young Roman against the most exquisite torments. However, the tender youth could not help sighing now and then, and groaning in the height of his pain. Quintus was not far off; and the reader may imagine, though we cannot express, how the heart of a tender father must have been affected, in hearing the sighs and groans of a son dying on the rack to save his life. He could not bear it; but quitting the place of his concealment, he presented himself to the assassins, Affecting circumstances of the death of his brother.

(C) Pliny speaks of Astura as a river and an island (45); and Cicero seems to insinuate in one of his letters to Atticus (46), that his house was in the island. In process of time a village was built in that neighbourhood, and called by the same name of Astura, as we learn from Servius (47).

(45) Plin. l. iii. c. 5. & 6. (46) Ad. Attic. l. xii. epist. 19. (47) Servius in Æneid. 7. v. 801.

begging them with a flood of tears to put him to death, and dismiss the innocent child, whose generous behaviour the triumvirs themselves, if informed of the fact, would judge worthy of the highest encomiums and rewards. But those inhuman monsters, without being in the least affected, with the tears either of the father or the son, answered, that "they must both die," the father, because he was proscribed, and the son, because, in defiance of the decree of the triumvirs, he had concealed his father. Then a new contest of tenderness arose between the father and the son, who should die the first; but this the assassins, destitute of all sense of humanity, and no-ways affected with such melting scenes, soon decided by beheading them both at the same time. Tho' Quintus Cicero's life was not perhaps without reproach, his death, it must be owned, was truly glorious; as for that of his son, it has been, and ever will be, celebrated by the writers of all nations and ages, as an instance of the most heroic affection and filial duty [r].

Embarques for Macedon.

But to return to the elder brother: Cicero, having reached Astura, and by good luck found a vessel there ready to weigh anchor, went on board with a design to pass over into Macedon and join Brutus. But, either dreading the inconveniencies of such a voyage, or still depending on the friendship of Octavianus, whom he had all along supported with his credit and eloquence, he soon changed his mind, and ordered the master of the ship to set him ashore at Circæum, where he took his rout towards Rome by land. But after he had gone about two hundred furlongs, he altered his resolution anew, and returned to sea, where he spent the night in a thousand melancholly and perplexing thoughts. One while he resolved to go privately into Octavianus's house, and there kill himself upon the altar of his domestic gods, in order to bring upon him the wrath of those furies, which were deemed the avengers of violated friendship. But the fear of being taken on the road, and the apprehension of the cruel treatment he expected, if taken, soon made him drop that resolution. Then falling into other thoughts equally perplexing, and wavering between the hopes he had in Octavianus's friendship, and the fear of death, he at last suffered his domestics to convey him by sea to a country-house, which he had in the neighneighbourhood of Gaieta. Near the place, where he was to land, ſtood a little temple dedicated to Apollo, from which, it is ſaid, a flight of crows, coming with great noiſe, made towards Cicero's ſmall veſſel, as it was putting into port, and perching on the ſails and rigging, pecked them with a hideous noiſe; which was looked upon by all as a bad omen. However, Cicero went aſhore, and entering his houſe, lay down upon his bed to take ſome reſt. The crows followed him, and, fluttering about the windows of the room where he lay, made a dreadful noiſe. One of them was ſo bold as to fly into the chamber, and making to the bed where Cicero was repoſing with the cloaths caſt over his head, pecked them off by degrees and uncovered his face. The example of this creature rouſed his indolent domeſtics, who began to reproach each other for neglecting to ſave the life of a man, for whoſe preſervation the very birds of the air ſeemed concerned: wherefore, partly by force partly by entreaty, they put him again into his litter, and carried him towards the ſea-ſide. They were ſcarce gone, when a band of ſoldiers under the command of Herennius, a centurion, and Popilius Lænas, a military tribune, came to the houſe. Cicero had formerly undertaken the defence of Popilius, when he was under a proſecution for the murder of his own father, and by his triumphing eloquence had god him abſolved by thoſe very judges, who a little before were ready to condemn him to a moſt cruel death. But the ungrateful wretch, unmindful of former obligations, and wholly intent on currying favour with Antony, had promiſed to find out Cicero, where-ever he lay concealed, and bring him his head. He found the doors of his houſe ſhut, but breaking them open and ſearching in vain every corner, he threatened to put all the ſlaves in the houſe to the torture, if they did not immediately declare where their maſter lay concealed. But the faithful ſlaves, without betraying the leaſt fear, anſwered with great conſtancy and reſolution, that they knew not were he was. At length a young man, by name Philologus (D), who had been diſcovered.

A band of ſoldiers in ſearch of him.

Is diſcovered.

(D) Plutarch ſeems to queſtion what ſome authors have wrote of the treachery of Philologus; at leaſt he tells us, that this circumſtance was unknown to Tyro, Cicero's emancipated ſlave, who publiſhed an account of his life, which in Plutarch's time was in great requeſt, but has not reached ours. Appian tells us, that Cicero was betrayed and diſcovered by one Cyrillus, who had formerly ſerved Clodius, his mortal enemy;

been ſlave to Quintus, and afterwards enfranchiſed by him, and inſtructed by Cicero in the liberal arts and ſciences with all the tenderneſs of a father, diſcovered to the tribune, that Cicero's domeſtics were then carrying him in a litter through the cloſe and ſhady walks to the ſea-ſide. Upon this information, Popilius with ſome of his men haſtened to the place, where he was to come out, while Herennius with the reſt followed the litter through the narrow paths. As ſoon as Cicero perceived Herennius, he commanded his ſervants to ſet down his litter, and ſtroaking, according to his cuſtom, his beard with his left hand, he put out his head, and looked at the aſſaſſins with great intrepidity. This conſtancy, which they did not expect from him, his face diſfigured and emaciated with cares and troubles, his hair and beard neglected and in diſorder, &c. ſo affected the ſoldiers who attended Herennius, that they covered their eyes with their hands, while he cut off his head, and, purſuant to Antony's directions, his right hand, with which he had wrote the Philippics. With thoſe trophies of their cruelty, Herennius and Popilius haſtened back to Rome, and laid them before Antony while he was holding an aſſembly of the people for the election of new magiſtrates. The cruel tyrant no ſooner beheld them, than he cried out in a tranſport of joy, "Now let there be "an end of all our proſcriptions; live Romans, live in "ſafety; you have nothing more to fear." He took the head in his hand, and looked on it a long time with great ſatisfaction, ſmiling at a ſight, which drew tears from all who were preſent. After he had ſatiated his cruel and revengeful temper with ſo diſmal a ſpectacle, he ſent, as we are told by ſeveral writers, the head of the orator to his wife Fulvia, who was naturally more cruel than the triumvir himſelf, and had borne an implacable hatred to Cicero, ever ſince the time of her firſt huſband P. Clodius, who was ſlain by Milo. That infernal fury, after having inſulted the poor remains of her enemy with the moſt injurious reproaches, took that venerable head in her lap, and drawing out the tongue of the deceaſed, which had uttered many bitter invectives againſt both her huſbands, pierced it ſeveral times with a golden bodkin, which ſhe wore in her hair. When Fulvia had ſatiated her impotent rage, Antony ordered both the head and the hand to be ſet up on the roſtra, where Rome could not without horror behold the remains of a man, who had ſo often triumphed in that very place by the force and charms of his eloquence [s] (E). Thus fell the greateſt orator Italy or any other country ever bred; "a man who," as Cæſar the dictator uſed to ſay, "had obtained a laurel as much above all triumphs, "as it was more glorious to extend the bounds of the "Roman learning than thoſe of the Roman empire." In his conſulate, which was truly glorious, he diſcovered with wonderful ſagacity the moſt ſecret plots of the ſeditious Catiline, defeated his beſt concerted meaſures, and ſaved, we may ſay, Rome from utter deſtruction; whence he was deſervedly honoured with the glorious title of "the father "of his country." The Roman people, no doubt, owed him much; and he took care to put them frequently in mind of their obligations; "for he was quoting on all occaſions, in "and out of ſeaſon, the nones of December," as M. Brutus obſerved in one of his letters to Atticus. He loved his country; but his zeal did not carry him ſo far as to make him ſacrifice his private intereſt to the public welfare. This Brutus, who ſincerely loved him, but knew his foible, inſinuates in ſeveral letters to their common friend Pomponius Atticus. "We are "too much afraid," ſays he in one of his epiſtles, "of death, "baniſhment, and poverty. Theſe things appear to Cicero "as great evils, who, provided he be allowed what he de-"ſires, provided he be reſpected and praiſed, reckons an ho-"nourable ſlavery as nothing, if honour is compatible with "ſo great infamy." (E) We have followed Plutarch's account; but other writers tell us, that Cicero's ſlaves and domeſtics, ſeeing Popilius and Herennius purſuing their maſter, put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and ſeemed determined to defend his life at the expence of their own; but that Cicero would not allow them to uſe any violence, ſaying, "Let us obey the decrees of deſtiny, "and avoid ſhedding more blood than it has pleaſed the gods "to require". Having thus ſpoke to his domeſtics, he encouraged Popilius to advance, and putting his head out of the litter, "Draw near, veteran," ſaid he, "and ſhew us what you "can do." At theſe words the tribune came cloſe to the litter, and with one blow cut off his head (48).

(48) Appian. l. iv. & Val. Max.

" maſter; for, what uſe do we ſee him make of all he has " written concerning the liberty of his country, true honour, " death, and baniſhment?" &c. Plutarch tells us, that though Brutus and his followers both loved and truſted Cicero, yet none of them ever thought of imparting their deſign to him, becauſe they were determined to admit into the conſpiracy ſuch only as were bold, brave, and deſpiſers of death; whereas Cicero was by nature a coward, and beſides become ſo wary and over-cautious by old age, that he would not have made one ſtep without the greateſt ſecurity, which would have blunted the edge of their forwardneſs and reſolution, in an affair that required all the diſpatch imaginable [s]. But after all, the intrepidity, with which he offered himſelf to death, ought to make us in a manner overlook the timorouſneſs, puſillanimity, and irreſolution, which he betrayed in moſt occurrences of his life. He died on the ſeventh of the ides of December, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age, and was greatly lamented by all ranks of men. Antony himſelf made ſome ſort of reparation to his memory; for, inſtead of rewarding the perfidious Philologus, who betrayed his maſter and benefactor, he delivered him up to Pomponia, the widow of Quintus Cicero and ſiſter of Pomponius Atticus, who, after having glutted her impotent rage and deſire of revenge with the moſt exquiſite torments cruelty itſelf could invent, obliged the miſerable wretch to cut off his own fleſh by piece-meal, boil it, and eat it in her preſence. But Tyro, Cicero's freedman, has not ſo much as mentioned the treachery of Philologus, as we have obſerved above out of Plutarch. Octavianus, who ſhamefully ſacrificed Cicero to his moſt cruel and bitter enemy, declared ſeveral years after the eſteem he had for him: for viſiting one day his daughter's ſon, and finding him with a book of Cicero's in his hand, the boy for fear endeavoured to hide it under his gown; which Octavianus perceiving, took it from him, and turning over a great part of the book ſtanding, gave it him again, ſaying, " This, " my child, was a learned man, and a lover of his country [t].

The cruelty of Pomponia towards the ſlave who betrayed him

WHILE the proſcription was ſtill raging, and Rome in the utmoſt conſternation in ſeeing herſelf daily deprived of ſome of her beſt citizens, Lepidus took it in his head to triumph, on account of ſome inconſiderable advantages he had formerly gained over the revolted Spaniards. The decree, impowering him to enjoy this honour, was iſſued by himſelf with the conſent conſent and approbation of his two collegues, and began thus: "To all thoſe who ſhall honour our triumph with ſacrifices, "feaſtings, and other demonſtrations of joy, health and good "fortune; but to others miſery and proſcription." This decree drew greater crouds to his triumph than had ever been ſeen on the like occaſion: he was attended by all the nobility of Rome, who ſtrove to outvie each other in offering ſacrifices for the ſafety of Lepidus and his collegues, and in feaſting their friends and the friends of the triumvirs. L. Munatius Plancus was likewiſe decreed a triumph for ſomething, we know not what, he had done in Gaul [u]. As it was cuſtomary for the ſoldiers to ſing, during the triumphal proceſſion, ſatyrical verſes on the victorious generals, the following were often repeated on this occaſion; "De Germanis, "non de Gallis, duo triumphant conſules." The Latin word Germanis, ſignifies equally brothers, and, the inhabitants of Germany, ſo that the verſes might be underſtood as importing, either that the deſigned conſuls triumphed over the Germans, or over their brothers; for they had both procured the proſcription of their brothers, or at leaſt conſented to it [w].

The cruelty and avarice of the triumvirs.

AND now the triumvirs, having glutted their revenge with the blood of ſo many illuſtrious citizens, began to think of raiſing the neceſſary ſums for the carrying on of the war againſt Brutus and Caſſius. In order to this they publiſhed daily new liſts of proſcribed perſons, containing the names of the richeſt citizens in Rome, whom they cauſed under ſeveral pretences, to be inhumanly murdered, and then ſeiſed on their eſtates, defrauding the poor widows and orphans of their right of inheritance and ſucceſſion. They burdened the people with moſt grievous taxes, ſeized all the gold and ſilver, whether in plate or ſpecie, they could lay their hands on, and took away by force immenſe ſums, belonging both to ſtrangers and citizens of Rome, which had been depoſited in the hands of the veſtal virgins. But with all this, not being able to make up the ſum of two hundred thouſand talents, which they judged neceſſary to defray the charges of the war, they drew up a liſt of fourteen hundred of the richeſt ladies of Rome, mothers, daughters, relations, or any ways allied to ſuch perſons as they had proſcribed, and taxed them all equally, and at an extravagant rate, though moſt of the alliances were very far fetched. Hereupon the ladies, after having had recourſe in vain to the female relations of the triumvirs, agreed to go all in a body, and plead their cauſe at the tribunal of thoſe magiſtrates, while they were adminiſtering juſtice in the forum. Accordingly, having made their way through the croud and the numerous guards attending the tyrants, they demanded to be heard. The triumvirs, alarmed at ſuch an unuſual ſight, ordered their guards to diſperſe them; but this occaſioning great murmurs among the people, one of them was at length permitted to ſpeak, and the perſon the ſuppliants choſe for this purpoſe was Hortenſia, the daughter of the celebrated orator Hortenſius, who addreſſed the triumvirs thus:

" The unhappy women you ſee here imploring your juſtice " and bounty, would never have preſumed to appear in this " place, had they not firſt made uſe of all other means, " which their natural modeſty could ſuggeſt to them. Tho' " our appearing here may ſeem contrary to the rules of de- " cency preſcribed to our ſex, which we have hitherto ob- " ſerved with all ſtrictneſs, yet the loſs of our fathers, chil- " dren, brothers, and huſbands, may ſufficiently excuſe us, " eſpecially when their unhappy deaths are made a pretence " for our further misfortunes. You pretend, that they had " offended and provoked you; but what injury have the wo- " men done, that they muſt be impoveriſhed? If they are as " blameable as the men, why do you not proſcribe them too? " Have we declared you enemies to your country? Have we " ſuborned your ſoldiers, raiſed troops againſt you, or op- " poſed you in the purſuit of thoſe honours and offices which " you claim? We pretend not to govern the republic; nor " is it our ambition, which has drawn the preſent misfortune " on our heads. Empire, dignities, and honours are not for " us. Why ſhould we contribute to a war, wherein we " have no manner of intereſt? 'Tis true indeed, that in the " Carthaginian war our mothers aſſiſted the republic, which " was at that time reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs: but nei- " ther their houſes, their lands, nor their movables were ſold " for that ſervice; ſome rings and a few jewels furniſhed the " ſupply: it was not conſtraint and violence that forced it " from them; what they contributed was entirely owing to " their own good will and generous diſpoſition. What dan- " ger at preſent threatens the city? If the Gauls or Parthians " were encamped on the banks of the Tiber or the Anio, " you ſhould find us no leſs zealous in the defence of our " common country, than our mothers were before us. But " we ought not, and will not be any ways concerned in civil " wars. Neither Marius, nor Cæſar, nor Pompey, ever " thought of obliging us to take part in the domeſtic troubles

" which their ambition raiſed; nay, not Sylla himſelf, who " firſt ſet up tyranny in Rome; and yet you aſſume the glo- " rious title of reformers of the ſtate, a title, which will turn " to your eternal ignominy, if, without the leaſt regard to " the laws of equity, you perſiſt in your wicked reſolution " of plundering thoſe of their eſtates and fortunes, who have " given you no juſt cauſe of offence." The triumvirs, provoked at the boldneſs of this ſpeech, and fearing it might occaſion ſome ſudden tumult, ordered their lictors to drive away ſuch troubleſome ſuppliants; but the people crying out againſt ſuch violence, they adjourned the affair to the next day, when, to appeaſe the multitude, who had openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the women, they reduced their number from one thouſand four hundred to four hundred; but at the ſame time taxed above an hundred thouſand men, as well ſtrangers as citizens, without exempting the prieſts themſelves, obliging them to pay immediately the fiftieth part of their eſtates, and a whole year's revenue. In the levying of this tax the ſoldiers committed ſuch unheard-of cruelties, that the triumvirs were obliged to charge one of the conſuls to watch them, and puniſh the offenders with the utmoſt ſeverity. But the cowardly magiſtrate, fearing to diſguſt the legionaries, winked at the diſorders committed by them, and exerted his authority only againſt a few ſlaves, whom he cauſed to be crucified for the enormous cruelties they had exerciſed, in the diſguiſe of ſoldiers, on ſome of the moſt illuſtrious citizens [x].

Many of the ladies exempted from paying the tax.

And now the triumvirs, having cauſed about three hundred ſenators and two thouſand knights to be inhumanly maſſacred, and raiſed by a thouſand extortions the neceſſary ſums for their eaſtern expedition, aſſembled at laſt the few ſenators they had left alive, and, entering the ſenate-houſe, declared, that the proſcription was at an end. Lepidus endeavoured to juſtify their paſt proceedings, and aſſured the conſcript fathers, that for the future he at leaſt ſhould give them no occaſion of complaint. But Octavius, not yet ſatiated with ſo many butcheries, openly declared, " That he ſtill reſerved to " himſelf the liberty of puniſhing the guilty." And indeed Suetonius tells us, that though he was at firſt unwilling to ſign the fatal decree, which doomed ſo many citizens to die, yet he was the moſt cruel and inexorable of the three in the execution of it [y]. Some of the antient and moſt of the modern writers writers endeavour to clear him from that reproach, and lay all the blame upon Antony; nay, they cry him up for one of the moſt mild, humane, and moderate princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter. But we meet with too many inſtances in hiſtory, which evidently ſhew that cruelty was the natural bent of his temper. We ſhall give only one here, which we have omitted in our account of his ſhort conſulate, and reſerve the reſt for their proper places. The prætor Quintus Gellius had on all occaſions aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of his power, and employed all his intereſt in his behalf, when he firſt ſtood for the conſulate. Octavianus therefore no ſooner obtained that dignity, than he appointed him governor of Africa with the title of proconſul: but ſoon after, taking it into his head that the prætor deſigned to murder him, he cauſed him to be ſeized by a band of ſoldiers in his ſeat of juſtice, and to be hurried away, without further enquiry, to the rack, like the meaneſt ſlave. He confeſſed nothing, nor indeed had any ſuch thing ever entered into his thoughts; for he had been always greatly attached both to Cæſar and Octavianus. But neither could his great quality and high ſtation, nor his innocence, exempt him from the hands of the executioner. The gentle conſul condemned him to die, but firſt cauſed the venerable magiſtrate to be brought before him, that he might have the cruel and brutal pleaſure of digging out his eyes with his own hands; which he did accordingly, and then ordered the executioner, leſs cruel than himſelf, to diſpatch him [z]. Is not this ſingle inſtance an undeniable proof of the cruelty of his temper?

The triumvirs appoint conſuls, prætors, &c. for ſeveral years.

AFTER the triumvirs had declared, to the inexpreſſible joy both of the ſenate and people, that the proſcription was at an end, they appointed of their own authority, without ſo much as aſſembling the people, the conſuls for the enſuing year. Theſe were M. Æmilius Lepidus, the triumvir, and Lucius Munatius Plancus. After this, as Antony and Octavius were wholly intent on their grand expedition into the eaſt, againſt Brutus and Caſſius, they named, in concert with Lepidus, conſuls, prætors, and ædiles for ſeveral enſuing years, chuſing for theſe great offices ſuch perſons as they all approved of, and could ſafely rely on. This precaution ſeemed neceſſary, to prevent the people from raiſing to theſe dignities, during their abſence, men of ſeditious tempers, or ill-affected to the triumvirate. When they had thus ſettled matters in the city, Antony and Octavianus firſt divided both the money and troops, and and then set out, the former for Brundusium, and the latter for Rhegium, where the fleets, appointed to transport them into the Levant, were ready to take the forces on board, and put to sea with the first favourable wind. But, before we relate the great events, which determine the fate of the unhappy republic, we must give a succinct account of what passed in the east, from the taking of Laodicea by Cassius, to the arrival of Antony and Octavianus in Macedon.

Cassius resolves to invade Egypt.

Cassius, having, by the reduction of Laodicea, made himself master of all Syria, resolved in the next place to invade Egypt; for Cleopatra had not only declared for the triumvirs, but was ready to join them with a powerful fleet; but as he was on his march, he was recalled by Brutus, who, by letters after letters, pressed him to come and join him against the triumvirs, who were making a dreadful havock of their friends in Italy, and assembling forces with a design to pass over into Macedon. "It is not," said he in one of his letters, "to gain an empire for ourselves, but to "relieve our country, that we have assembled such power- "ful armies. We ought not so much to think of gaining "glory by new conquests, as of destroying those who have "enslaved Rome. Let us remember what we have under- "taken, and persevere in our first intentions. It is high time "for us to turn our thoughts upon Italy, which now groans "under the oppression of tyrants. Let us make what haste "we can thither, and endeavour to relieve our fellow-citizens."

But is recalled by Brutus.

As Cassius had a great esteem and veneration for Brutus, he dropt his enterprize upon Egypt; and, committing the government of Syria to his brothers son with one legion, he set out with all the rest to meet him. On his march he detached a body of horse into Cappadocia, with orders to put king Ariobarzanes to death, upon an information that he had conspired against him, and kept up a private correspondence with his enemies. His orders were put in execution, and, after the king's death, great sums raised on his subjects, who were looked upon by Cassius as disaffected to the republican party. As he passed by Tarsus, being touched with compassion on the miserable condition of that unhappy city, he remitted the rest of the heavy tax, which he had formerly laid on the inhabitants for siding with Dolabella, and refusing to supply with provisions the troops which Tullius Cimber, one of the conspirators, was leading into Syria. This conduct of the Tarsenses, after they had entered into an alliance with Cassius, and even presented him with a crown of gold, so provoked the republican general, that he condemned them to pay fifteen hundred talents; for the raiſing of which ſum they firſt ſold the lands belonging to the public, and the ornaments of their temples, afterwards their children of both ſexes, and at laſt their women and old men. As the money accruing from theſe ſales did not amount to the ſum of fifteen hundred talents, they were at laſt forced to ſell ſome of their young men, who were fit to bear arms; but the unhappy wretches, preferring death to ſlavery, laid violent hands on themſelves; which Caſſius no ſooner heard, than he forgave them the reſt of the payment, and exempted them from all tributes for the future. From Tarſus he purſued his march into Aſia to join Brutus [a]. That general, ſeeing himſelf maſter of all Grecee, Macedon, and Illyricum, had reſolved to paſs over into Aſia with the greater part of his army, and was already on his march, when news was brought him, that Caius Antonius, whom he had taken priſoner, as we have related above, and treated with the utmoſt civility, had raiſed a ſedition among the troops that were left in Macedon. Hereupon he turned back, quelled the tumult, and having put Caius under cloſe confinement in the city of Apollonia, purſued his march, and paſſed over into Aſia, where he was joined by all the princes of that country, and among the reſt by Dejotarus, king or tetrarch of Galatia, tho' he had refuſed to ſend any ſuccours to Caſſius. While Brutus was in Aſia, Caius Antonius, having found means, even in his confinement, to debauch many of the ſoldiers, attempted to make his eſcape; but the plot being diſcovered, Antonius was more cloſely confined, and the guilty ſoldiers forced to take refuge on a neighbouring hill, where they ſeemed determined to ſtand it out, and rather undergo any hardſhips, than ſubmit to the will of their officers. Hereupon Caius Clodius, to whoſe cuſtody Brutus had committed the ſeditious priſoner, fearing he might raiſe new diſturbances, and at length make his eſcape, put him to death; but whether of his own authority, or by Brutus's orders in uncertain. Thus Dion Caſſius [b]. But Plutarch tells us, that Brutus no ſooner heard the news of Cicero's Death, than he ſent orders to Hortenſius to kill Caius Antonius; and adds, that on this account, Antony having afterwards taken Hortenſius in the battle of Philippi, ſlew him on his brother's tomb. However that be, Brutus, fearing the death of Antonius might occaſion diſturbances in Macedon, left Aſia, and haſtened back thither. On his arrival, he put put himself at the head of a legion, and marched against the mutineers, whom he soon forced to sue for mercy. As Brutus was a man of an extraordinary mild nature, great magnanimity, and insensible of the passions of anger and revenge, he could not prevail upon himself to put any of the seditious legionaries to death, respecting, as Appian observes, the character of a Roman citizen even in an enemy. His officers pressed him to punish at least a small number of the mutineers, in order to deter others from the like practices. The good-natured general seemed to yield to their importunity; and having ordered a galley to be got ready, caused the ringleaders of the late tumult to be put on board of it, as if he intended to have them thrown into the sea, and drowned; but in the mean time, he gave private orders to the commander of the galley to convey them to some place of safety, and there leave them [c].

The great clemency of Brutus.

Brutus, having thus quieted all disturbances in Macedon, hastened back into Asia. It was, as is commonly believed, on his march thither, that he coined a new piece of money, which was for some time current in all the eastern countries. On one side was the head of Brutus, and on the reverse a pileus or cap, the badge of liberty, between two poniards, with this legend, Eid. Mar. to revive the remembrance of the ides of March, which was the last day of Cæsar's life and usurped empire. Brutus, arriving in Asia, advanced in all haste to Smyrna, where he had appointed to meet Cassius, who accordingly came after him. As they had not seen one another since they parted at Pireæus, the one for Syria, and the other for Macedon, we may easily imagine how great their joy was at their first meeting. They had been [illegible] friends long before the death of Cæsar, were nearly [illegible], Cassius having married Julia the sister of Brutus, and looked upon themselves as the only protectors of their oppressed country. Their joy was doubled, when they compared their present circumstances with the despicable condition they were both in when they left Italy. Cassius shewed all possible respect for Brutus, having a great opinion of his virtue, honesty, and integrity. On the other hand, Brutus, considering Cassius as the elder man, and of a more weakly constitution than himself, desired that their conferences might be held in his camp; for their two armies encamped separately. When they

they came to deliberate about the proper meaſures to be taken with relation to the great war with which they were threatened, Brutus was for tranſporting all their forces over into Macedon and Theſſaly, and there making head againſt the triumvirs, who, in all likelihood, would land their numberleſs troops in one of thoſe countries; but Caſſius was of opinion, that they ſhould firſt reduce the Rhodians and Lycians, that they might not leave two ſuch formidable maritime powers unſubdued behind them; for both theſe nations had refuſed to pay them any contributions, or to take part in the war, under pretence of maintaining a ſtrict neutrality, though it was well known, that they had ſent ſuccours underhand to the triumvirs. As for the numberleſs forces of the enemy, "Their great number," ſaid Caſſius, "renders "them leſs formidable; they will find a powerful enemy to "contend with in Greece, Macedon, or Theſſaly, famine. "Where will they find proviſions for ſo great a multitude? "Let us therefore turn our arms againſt their friends the "Lycians and Rhodians, and in the mean time leave them "to fight with want and famine[d]." Brutus readily came into the opinion of Caſſius, who was deemed an officer of great experience, and had given extraordinary proofs of his conduct after the unhappy battle of Carrhæ, as we have related in our hiſtory of the Parthians[e]. It was therefore agreed, that, before they paſſed farther weſtward, Brutus ſhould march againſt the Lycians, and Caſſius ſail with his fleet againſt the Rhodians; but as Brutus had ſpent great ſums in equipping a fleet, he deſired Caſſius to ſhare with him the immenſe treaſure he had amaſſed in Aſia. This demand was taken ill by the friends of Caſſius, who endeavoured to diſſuade him from complying with the juſt requeſt of Brutus, ſaying, That it was not reaſonable the money which he had ſaved with ſo much parſimony, or got with ſo much envy, ſhould be diſpoſed of to enrich Brutus's ſoldiers, and to make him popular. But Caſſius, without hearkening to their remonſtrances, generouſly gave him a third part of the great treaſure he had heaped up; after which the two generals parted, Caſſius marching againſt the Rhodians, and Brutus againſt the Lycians[f].

exercise his mariners at Mindus, a maritime city of Caria. Thither the Rhodians sent embassadors to him, putting him in mind of the victories they had formerly gained over Demetrius king of Macedon, over Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, and many others, and representing, that their nation was not easily to be conquered; that he might, in so dangerous an attempt, lose, as many others had done, all the glory he had hitherto acquired; that they had a numerous fleet at sea; that their naval forces had been always dreaded by all nations, &c. As they were going on, Cassius interrupted them: "Since you have so great an opinion of your "own valour," said he, "I will soon give you an opportu- "nity of exercising it. You have sent succours to Dola- "bella, and unless you assist me in the like manner, "neither the numerous fleet you have at sea, nor the dread "of your naval forces, shall deter me from invading your "island, and laying siege to your proud capital." This answer terrified the wiser citizens, who were for complying with Cassius's demands; but the populace, conceited of their own valour, opposed all their measures; and two orators, Alexander and Mnaseas, by magnifying the strength of the nation, the number of their ships, the experience of their mariners, the fortifications of the city and its port, prevailed upon the multitude to reject all propofals of an accommodation; nay, the people, in an assembly which was held at this time for the electing of new magistrates, appointed Alexander commander in chief of the land forces, and Mnaseas of the fleet, who immediately began to make the necessary preparations for war. However, the nobility, who dreaded the valour of the Romans, sent a second embassy to Cassius, employing for that purpose [illegible], who had formerly taught him the Greek tongue in Rhodes, and for whom the Romans had on all occasions shewed great respect and veneration. Archelaus put him in mind of their antient friendship, of the alliance that was still subsisting between the republic of Rhodes and that of Rome, and of the education he had received in that city. Cassius answered, That if Archelaus had consented to the hostilities of his countrymen against him, he had, by that means, renounced his friendship, and effaced all former obligations; but if he had advised them to embrace his interest, and they had rejected his advice, he was determined to be revenged on them for the contempt they had shewn for him. As to their alliance with Rome, he said, that in virtue of that treaty with the republic, they were obliged to aſſiſt him againſt thoſe who were uſing their utmoſt efforts to overturn the republican government, and introduce arbitrary power in its room; that he demanded ſuccours of them as prætor and proconſul appointed by the ſenate and the moſt honeſt part of the Roman people, and that, if they refuſed to acknowledge him in that character, or would not ſend him the ſuccours he demanded in the name of the ſenate and Roman people, he could not look upon them otherwiſe than as enemies to Rome, and would treat them as ſuch. Archelaus finding Caſſius inflexible, and the reaſons he alledged for making war upon the Rhodians unanſwerable, took his leave, and returned to Rhodes, where he found Alexander and Mnaſeas ready to put to ſea with a fleet of thirty three ſhips of war, and a great number of ſmaller veſſels. Theſe two commanders no ſooner heard the Roman general's final anſwer, than they weighed anchor, and went in queſt of the enemy's fleet, which they met off Cnidos, where they had formerly defeated the navy of Mithridates the Great. This they looked upon as a good omen, and therefore immediately attacked the Roman fleet, which was commanded by Statius Murcus, with incredible bravery and reſolution. The fight was long and bloody, on account of the great experience of the Rhodian mariners, and the nimbleneſs of their ſhips; but at length the Rhodians were put to flight, after having loſt a great number of ſoldiers, as well as mariners, and five of their beſt ſhips, three whereof were taken, and two ſunk. After the engagement, Caſſius, who beheld it from a neighbouring mountain, marched his army to Loryma, a maritime city of Caria, ſituated over-againſt the iſland of Rhodes, and there, without loſs of time, put his forces on board a great number of tranſports, which he had aſſembled before-hand, and ordered them to land in the iſland, and fortify themſelves there, while he with a fleet of eighty ſhips of war, inveſted the city of Rhodes by ſea, in hopes of ſtriking terror into the inhabitants, and obliging them, without further bloodſhed, to ſubmit, and comply with his demands. With this view he continued ſome days inactive before the place; but was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee the enemy's fleet unexpectedly ſail out of the harbour in good order, and offer him battle. In this ſecond engagement the Rhodians were defeated anew, with the loſs of two galleys, and forced to take ſhelter under the walls of their city, which was immediately inveſted both by ſea and land, and after a ſhort but moſt vigorous reſiſtance, forced to ſurrender at diſcretion cretion[g]. Appian tells, that some of the rich citizens to save their estates, betrayed the city to Cassius, after he had solemnly promised not to destroy it. The inhabitants seeing him master of the place, whether by force or treachery is uncertain, flocked to him from all quarters, calling him their king and master, But Cassius abhorring those titles, "I am "neither your king nor master," said he, "but the destroy-"er of a tyrant, who would have been your king and "master." He then caused a tribunal to be raised in the market-place, and seating himself on it, with a spear planted before him, as it was customary among the Roman generals, when they had taken a city by storm, he first forbad his soldiers, upon pain of death, to plunder the houses, or offer any sort of violence to the inhabitants. He then summoned fifty of the citizens before his tribunal, who had been most sanguine for war, and pronounced sentence of death upon them, which was immediately put in execution. He condemned twenty five more, who had made their escape, to perpetual banishment. Afterwards he commanded all the gold and silver, whether belonging to the temples, to the public, or to private persons, to be brought to him in a limited time, threatening those with death who should conceal any part of their wealth, and promising rewards to such as should discover it, viz. a tenth to persons of a free condition, and liberty to slaves. At first some concealed their treasures, not thinking he would proceed with so much rigour; but when they saw three or four of the richest citizens die by the hand of the public executioner, for having put out of the way part of their wealth, they desired that the time prefixed might be prolonged; which being granted, they brought to light what they had hid in tombs, wells, and other places, and laid it before Cassius, who by that means raised, at the expence of private persons, the sum of eight thousand talents, as we have related more at length in the history of Rhodes[h]. Cassius, having thus reduced and pillaged the city of Rhodes, returned to the continent, leaving Lucius Varus with a strong garrison on the island, to exact a fine of five hundred talents more, which at his departure he laid on those refractory islanders. On the continent, he was informed, that Cleopatra had left Egypt, and was sailed with a numerous fleet to join Antony and Octavianus. Upon this intelligence he sent Statius Murcus with sixty ſhips of war, and a legion on board to cruize on the coaſt of Peloponneſus, pillage that rich country, and keep near the promontory of Tænarus, in hopes of meeting there with Cleopatra's fleet; but the queen's navy was diſperſéd by a violent ſtorm, and moſt of her ſhips daſhed to pieces on the coaſt of Africa; which misfortune obliged her to return home, and lay aſide for the preſent all thoughts of ſending any ſuccours to the triumvirs. Caſſius, having now no enemies behind him, began his march to rejoin Brutus, obliging all the provinces of Aſia, as he paſſed through them, to pay, without the leaſt abatement, ten years taxes [i].

Cleopatra's fleet diſperſed by a ſtorm.

WHILE Caſſius was thus employed againſt the Rhodians, Brutus was making war in Lycia, agreeable to the ſcheme concerted between the two republican generals. Before he began hoſtilities, he ſent to the Lycians to demand a ſupply of men and money; but one Maucrates, a popular man among them, perſuaded them not to comply with Brutus's requeſt, and taking upon him the whole management of the war, poſted ſeveral bodies of troops on the frontiers, to prevent Brutus from entering the country. But the Roman general detached a party of horſe againſt them; which coming upon them unexpectedly, killed ſix hundred of them, drove the reſt from their poſts, and opened a paſſage into the country for the whole army [k]. Dion tells us, that the Lycians, who were a brave and warlike people, met Brutus on their frontiers, with all the forces of their nation, and gave him battle; but were overcome by the Romans, who made themſelves maſters of the enemy's camp, and all their baggage [l]. However that be, Brutus, after this firſt ſkirmiſh or battle, entered their country, and finding no enemy in the field to contend with, made himſelf maſter of all their cities and villages, except Xanthus (F) their capital, whither the flower of the nation retired, with a deſign to ſtand a ſiege. (F) Xanthus was, according to Strabo (49), the metropolis of all Lycia. The river, which watered it, is ſaid by Stephanus to have borrowed its name from the city, and the city from its founder Xanthus, who was, according to ſome, an Egyptian, according to others, a native of Crete.

and great magnanimity, being unwilling to ſhed the blood of thoſe unhappy wretches, ſet all the priſoners he had taken free without ranſom, hoping to win the whole nation by his clemency; but the Lycians, deſpiſing his humanity, and good-nature, would hearken to no terms; ſo that Brutus was forced, to his great grief, to lay ſiege to the place, which, he foreſaw, would bring innumerable evils on a brave and gallant people. Xanthus was reckoned one of the ſtrongeſt cities of Aſia; its walls were of an extroardinary height and thickneſs, and ſurrounded with a ditch fifty foot deep, and broad in proportion. The inhabitants had cut down the woods to a great diſtance, deſtroyed all the neighbouring villages, and conveyed away the materials; which obliged Brutus to ſend parties a great way off to fetch the neceſſary timber for building his machines, and even the earth to fill up the ditch, the country round about being very rocky; but notwithſtanding the many difficulties which he had to ſtruggle with, and which he did not himſelf expect to ſurmount in many months, as Appian tells us, he in a few days built his machines, filled up the ditch, and began to batter the walls with the ram: ſo great was the eagerneſs and ardour of the ſoldiery, animated by the example of their general, who ſhared with them all the toils and dangers of ſo difficult an undertaking. The beſieged made a moſt vigorous defence, and behaved in their ſallies with unparalleled bravery; but were always beaten with great loſs, Brutus keeping the half of his army night and day under arms. A breach being at length made in the wall, the Xanthians began to think of making their eſcape; and accordingly ſome of them threw themſelves into the river, which ra[illegible]gh the city, hoping to ſave themſelves by ſwimmi[illegible]d diving under water; but they were taken in nets let down for that purpoſe, with little bells faſtened to them, to give preſent notice when any of the unfortunate wretches were intangled in them; but the greater part, deſpairing to hold out any longer, reſolved to make a general ſally, and, forcing their way through the enemy's camp, to retire to the neighbouring mountains. Brutus, ſuſpecting their deſign, ordered his men to retire from before the gate; which the Xanthians ſuppoſing to have happened through the negligence of the guard, ſallied out in the dead of the night; but were repulſed with great ſlaughter by the Romans, who lay in wait for them. The next day about noon, they made another ſally, ſet fire to the engines of the aggreſſors, and retired in great haſte within their walls. The Romans

purſued them cloſe, and entered the city, to the number of two thouſand, with the beſieged; but the port-cullis falling, either by a ſtratagem of the enemy, or by the breaking of the ropes from which it hung, many of the Romans were cruſhed to pieces, and others ſhut in, without any poſſible means of retiring, or receiving the leaſt aſſiſtance from their friends. In this deſperate condition they reſolved at leaſt to ſell their lives dear, and with this view marched in good order through ſhowers of darts, which were diſcharged upon them from all parts, to a temple dedicated to Sarpedon king of Lycia, who was ſuppoſed to have been killed in the Trojan war. There they fortified themſelves, and ſuſtained a ſiege in the very heart of the city. In the mean time, Brutus and his men exerted their utmoſt efforts to relieve their fellow-ſoldiers; but all their endeavours were to no effect, the Xanthians defending it with a bravery and reſolution which ſurpriſed the Romans themſelves. As they could neither move nor break down the port-cullis, which was trelliſed with iron-bars, they endeavoured to ſcale the walls, uſing for that purpoſe not ſcaling-ladders, (for the beſieged had burnt them together with the wooden towers when they firſt ſallied out) but long ropes, to which they faſtened iron hooks. Theſe they threw upon the walls, and by that means attempted to get over them; but the beſieged by puſhing the aggreſſors down with their bucklers, or cutting the ropes with their ſwords, rendered this attempt likewiſe unſucceſsful. While Brutus was under the utmoſt concern for his men, who were to the number of two thouſand, ſhut up in the city, a company of Oenoandes (G), who ſerved under him and bore an irreconcileable hatred to the Xanthians, climbing up a ſteep rock adjoining to the walls, threw themſelves from thence into the city, and opening a poſtern to ſome Romans who followed them, they went all in a body to one of the chief gates, which they broke down, notwithſtanding the oppoſition they met with, and let in the reſt of the Roman army. But, in the mean time,

(G) Oenoanda, or, as others write it, Oeneanda, was, according to Pliny and Stephanus, ſituated on the confines of Cabalia, a ſmall province of Lycia. It was ſtill in being in the ſixth century of the chriſtian æra, and is mentioned in the notitia of the empire of Conſtantinople, commonly aſcribed to the grammarian Hierocles. The inhabitants of this city bore an irreconcileable hatred to the Xanthians their neighbours, and therefore readily joined Brutus againſt them.

ſome ſparks of fire being carried by a violent wind from the machines, which burnt with great fierceneſs, to the battlements, and from thence to the adjoining houſes, the flame was in a trice ſpread all over the city, and the conflagration became general. Brutus, fearing the whole city ſhould be deſtroyed, ordered his ſoldiers to lay aſide all thoughts of revenge, and aſſiſt the inhabitants in quenching the fire; but the Xanthians, ſeized with a kind of frenzy, which Plutarch calls "a violent deſire of dying," ſtrove to drive away the ſoldiers who came to their aſſiſtance; nay, they themſelves, gathering together reeds, wood, and other combuſtible matter, ſpread the fire over the whole city, feeding it with what fuel they could get. Brutus, ſeeing the flame blaze out in a moſt frightful manner, and extremely deſirous of having an opportunity to ſhew his clemency to a gallant people, who had fought with ſuch bravery in defence of their liberty, mounted on horſeback, and riding round the walls, ſtretched forth his hand to the inhabitants, begging of them that they would ſpare their own lives and ſave their town. But his entreaties were not regarded; the Xanthians were immoveably determined not to outlive the loſs of their liberty, and therefore repulſed with ſhowers of arrows the Romans, whom the good-natured general ſent to their aſſiſtance. Some of them cut the throats of their wives, their children, and their ſlaves, before the ſoldiers faces, and then leaped into the flames. Not only the men, but the women, nay, even the children, ran like wild beaſts, on the enemy's ſwords, or threw themſelves headlong from the top of the walls. Some children were ſeen offering their throats, or opening their breaſts to their fathers ſwords, and begging they would take away that life which they had given. How great is the power of education! The Xanthians had inſpired their children, from their very infancy, with the moſt heroic ſentiments of liberty, and an utter abhorrence to ſlavery and ſubjection, often relating to them, how their forefathers had ſuffered themſelves to be buried under the ruins of their country, rather than ſubmit either to Harpagus, Cyrus's lieutenant, or to Alexander of Macedon, the famous conqueror of Aſia; for they had in the Perſian and Macedonian wars ſet fire to their city after the ſame manner, and deſtroyed themſelves. When the city was almoſt wholly reduced to aſhes, a woman was found, who had hanged herſelf with her children faſtened to her neck, and the torch in her hand, with which ſhe had ſet fire to her own houſe. When this was related to Brutus, he burſt into tears, and declining to ſee ſo tragical an object, he proclaimed a reward to any ſoldier who ſhould ſave a Xanthian; but with all his care and good-nature he could only preſerve one hundred and fifty, and thoſe much againſt their will [m]. Appian tells, that only ſome ſlaves were ſaved, and one hundred and fifty women, who wanted huſbands to kill them; and adds that Brutus found means to preſerve ſome of the temples from ſo general a conflagration [n].

Brutus endeavours to gain the Patarenſes by gentle methods.

FROM Xanthus Brutus led his army againſt Patara (H), another city of Lycia; but being deſirous to ſave the place and the lives of the inhabitants, before he began hoſtilities, he ſent deputies to them, begging they would not force him to treat them as he had done the Xanthians. With the deputies he ſent the few priſoners he had taken at Xanthus, hoping, that they, by giving the Patarenſes an account of their misfortunes, might deter them from following their example. But all was to no purpoſe; the inhabitants ſeemed determined to ſtand a ſiege, and undergo any miſeries, rather than ſubmit. This gave Brutus great uneaſineſs; he ſtudied all means to win them by gentle methods, fearing the ſame frenzy which had driven the Xanthians to deſtruction, might ſeize them. Notwithſtanding the anſwer they ſent him, which was "That they choſe rather to die like "brave men, than purchaſe their lives at the expence of "their liberty and reputation," the humane general withdrew his troops, and granted them the reſt of that day to reflect more ſeriouſly on their preſent circumſtances. In the mean time, to get the better of their obſtinacy, he ſet at liberty ſuch of the Xanthian captives as were any ways allied to them, ſending them into the city as a preſent from him to their relations: but the Patarenſes ſtill continued inflexible. Brutus therefore, finding he could not gain them by gentle methods, had had recourſe to ſeverity, and cauſing the Xanthian captives to be brought out one by one, he ordered them to be ſold to the beſt bidder under the very walls of Patara; but as this was contrary to the bent of his inclination, after a few of thoſe unfortunate wretches had been ſold, he ſet the reſt at liberty, declaring, that he could not find in his heart to reduce brave men to ſlavery, who had fought ſo valiantly in defence of their liberty. While he was under the greateſt concern imaginable for the Patarenſes, whoſe obſtinacy rendered all the meaſures abortive, which his good-nature could ſuggeſt for their preſervation, a lucky accident put him at length in the way of triumphing over their ſtubborn and inflexible temper. One of his parties, in ſcouring the country, happened to meet ſome of the chief women of Patara, whom they took priſoners, and carried to Brutus, who immediately diſmiſſed them all without ranſom. Theſe returning into the city, and there crying up the politeneſs, juſtice, and temperance of Brutus, prevailed upon their huſbands and relations, who were all leading men, to ſubmit to ſo good-natured a general, and put the city into his hands. Brutus treated them with great humanity, pardoning even thoſe who had been to the very laſt for ſtanding a ſiege. Plutarch tells us, that the Roman general exacted only an hundred and fifty talents of the whole nation, a very inconſiderable ſum, if compared with that of eight thouſand talents, which Caſſius extorted from the Rhodians. Appian writes, that Brutus, after the example of Caſſius, ordered the Patarenſes, on pain of death, to bring to him all their gold and ſilver, promiſing rewards to ſuch as ſhould diſcover any hidden treaſures. Upon this a ſlave belonging to a rich citizen, informed againſt his maſter, and diſcovered to a centurion, who was ſent for that purpoſe, the place where he had buried the greateſt part of his wealth. The citizen was immediately ſeized, and brought, together with the treacherous informer, before Brutus. The mother of the accuſed followed them, declaring with many tears, that ſhe had hid the treaſure without her ſon's knowledge, and conſequently ought to be puniſhed. On the other hand, the ſlave ſtood to his firſt information, maintaining, that his maſter, and not his mother, had tranſgreſſed the edict. Brutus heard both parties with great patience, and being in the end convinced, that the accuſation of the ſlave was chiefly founded on the hatred he bore to his maſter, he commended the tenderneſs and generoſity of the mother, reſtored the whole ſum to the ſon, and condemned the ſlave to be crucified. This judgment, which was immediately publiſhed all over Lycia, gained him the hearts of the inhabitants, who came in flocks to him from all quarters, offering him, of their own accord, what ready money they had by them [n].

(H) Patara ſtood on the peninſula, which Stephanus calls the Lycian Cherſoneſus. Livy (50) honours this city with the title of caput gentis, the metropolis of the nation. In our hiſtory of Lycia we have given an account of this city, and of the famous oracle of Apollo, who was ſuppoſed to reſide ſix months at Patara, and as many at Delos (51).

AND now Brutus, having reduced, more by the fame of his clemency than by force of arms, all Lycia, left that country, and entered Ionia, where he found the famous rhetorician Theodotus, who had the moſt contributed to the death of Pompey the Great, as we have related in the hiſtory of Egypt. The unhappy wretch had fled out of Egypt on the arrival of Cæſar at Alexandria, and ever ſince that time ſculked about in Aſia, wandering from town to town, hated and abhorred by all men. Brutus no ſooner heard he was in Ionia, than he cauſed him to be ſeized, and ſacrificed to the manes of the illuſtrious Roman, who, by his advice, had been inhumanly murdered, as he himſelf had the impudence to boaſt [o]. This memorable act of juſtice was greatly applauded by every honeſt Roman, and all the princes of Aſia, who had a great veneration for the memory of Pompey. From Ionia Brutus marched into Lydia, and ſtopping at Sardis, the metropolis of that country, waited there for Caſſius, who, after the reduction of Rhodes, was, by agreement, to rejoin him in the neighbourhood of that city. As Caſſius drew near, Brutus went out to meet him; and the joy, both of the generals and armies, was exceeding great on this occaſion. The ſoldiery expreſſed their ſatisfaction in ſeeing each other again with joyful acclamations, and ſaluted both generals with the title of imperator. As ſeveral jealouſies of each other and complaints had paſſed between the two generals, as ſoon as the uſual compliments and civilities were over, they withdrew into a private apartment, with a deſign to ſettle all differences between them, before they entered upon any other buſineſs. What was the ſubject of their debate, we know not; but they diſputed with great warmth, reproaching and accuſing each other with hard words, and at laſt burſting out into tears. Their friends, who ſtood without, hearing them ſo loud and angry, began to be afraid, leſt their quarrel ſhould be attended with dangerous conſequences; but yet they durſt not interrupt them, having been commanded not to enter the room. But, notwithſtanding this prohibition, M. Favonius, a wild and frantic pretender to virtue, and one who valued himſelf himſelf more upon a ſort of Cynical liberty of ſpeaking what he pleaſed, than upon the dignity of a ſenator, breaking through the attendants who kept the door, entered the room, and, without knowing the ſubject of the diſpute, pronounced with a mimical voice this verſe, which Homer puts in the mouth of Neſtor;

"Be rul'd, for I am elder than you both.

This made Caſſius laugh; but Brutus, offended at the impertinent behaviour of the pretended Cynic, thruſt him out, calling him "a dog," in alluſion to his ſect, and "a "counterfeit philoſopher." This, however, put an end to the diſpute; Caſſius provided a ſupper that night, and Brutus invited his friends to it. As they were ſitting down, Favonius came in, and took the moſt honourable place, tho' Brutus, calling out aloud, told him, that he was not invited; but, after all, he diverted the company, and the entertainment was ſeaſoned both with mirth and learned diſcourſes [P].

THE next day, Brutus, upon the accuſation of the inhabitants of Sardis, publicly condemned and branded with infamy Lucius Pella, who had been formerly cenſor, and often employed by Brutus himſelf in offices of truſt, for having embezzeled the public money. This ſentence offended Caſſius, who but a few days before had abſolved in public two of his own friends, and continued them in their offices, tho' accuſed of the ſame crime, contenting himſelf only with reprimanding them in private. He did not conceal his ſentiments on this head from Brutus, whom he accoſted in a friendly manner of too much rigor and ſeverity, when gentleneſs and favour were more neceſſary, and would prove of greater ſervice to their cauſe. In anſwer to this, Brutus put him in mind of the ides of March, the day on which they had killed Cæſar, who himſelf neither vexed nor oppreſſed mankind, but was the ſupport of thoſe who did. He deſired him to conſider, that if juſtice could be neglected under any colour or pretence, it had been better to have ſuffered the injuſtice of Cæſar's friends, than to give impunity to their own; "for then," ſaid he, "we could have been ac- "cuſed of cowardice only; whereas now, if we connive at "the injuſtice of others, we make ourſelves liable to the "ſame accuſation, and ſhare with them in the guilt." From this this we may perceive, as Plutarch obſerves, what was the rule of all Brutus's actions [q].

Antony and Octavianus paſs over into Macedon.

AND now the two republican generals, being maſters of all the eaſtern provinces from Macedon to the Euphrates, after ſeveral conſultations, reſolved to march from Sardis to Abydus, and, croſſing the Helleſpont, advance into Macedon againſt Antony and Octavianus, who, notwithſtanding the oppoſition they had met with from Statius Murcus, Caſſius's admiral, had tranſported their troops, without the loſs of one ſingle ſhip or man, to Dyrrachium. From thence they detached Decidius Saxa and Caius Norbanus, with eight legions, to ſeize on the ſtreights leading from Thrace into Macedon, in order to prevent Brutus and Caſſius from coming upon them, and ravaging the country, before they had filled their magazines, and got together the neceſſary proviſions for the ſupport of their two armies. Brutus and Caſſius, upon the firſt intelligence of thoſe motions, left Sardis, and marched in all haſte to Abydus, where they had appointed the Lycian fleet to meet them, and tranſport their forces out of Aſia into Europe.

It was on this march that Brutus is reported to have ſeen a ghoſt or ſpectre in his tent. This memorable ſtory is thus related by Plutarch [r], Florus [s], and Appian [t]: Brutus, being uſed to great moderation in his diet, was much given to watching, and allowed but a very ſmall portion of time for ſleep. Plutarch tells us, that he never ſlept in the day-time, as was cuſtomary among the Romans, and in the night then only when he had diſpatched his affairs, and when, every one elſe being gone to reſt, he had no body left to keep him company. At this time the war being begun, and he very careful and ſolicitous about the event of it, he uſed to lie down for a ſhort while juſt after ſupper, and ſpend the reſt of the night either in diſpatching his affairs, or reading till the third watch, when the centurions and tribunes uſed to wait on him for their orders. According to this cuſtom, he was one night, before he paſſed out of Aſia, very late alone in his tent, with a dim light burning by him, there being a general ſilence all over the camp, eſpecially about his tent. As he was muſing with himſelf and very thoughtful, he heard on a ſudden an unuſal noiſe at the door of his tent, which at the ſame time flew open. Brutus, caſting his eye towards the place whence the noiſe came, ſaw a ter-a terrible and ſtrange figure of a huge and frightful body coming towards him without ſpeaking; but he undauntedly addreſſed the ſpectre, aſking it, "What art thou? a god, "or a man? or upon what buſineſs doth thou come to us? "I am," ſaid the ghoſt, "thy evil genius, Brutus; thou "ſhalt ſee me again near Philippi." Brutus, without betraying the leaſt fear, anſwered boldly, "Well, I will "ſee thee there:" upon which the apparition vaniſhed. Brutus inmediately called his ſervants, who all told him, that they had neither ſeen nor heard any thing. He continued watching the reſt of the night, and, as ſoon as it was day, went to give an account of what had happened to Caſſius, who, as he had been bred up in the principles of the Epicurean philoſophy, aſcribed the viſion wholly to the weakneſs of his ſenſes and the force of imagination, which eaſily moves and varies them into all manner of ideas. This he maintained by the example of dreams, where the fancy, forming different images, affects the organs of the body after the ſame manner, as they would be moved by outward objects. "But that there "is any ſuch thing as ſpirits or demons," ſaid he, "let us "never believe it, much leſs that ſpirits can have human "ſhape or voice, or any power over us; tho' I could ear-"neſtly wiſh it were ſo, that we might not only rely on "the powerful armies and fleets that attend us, but "likewiſe on the aſſiſtance of thoſe immortal beings who "could not but be favourable to a cauſe ſo juſt and ſacred "as ours is (I)." This diſcourſe ſatisfied Brutus, who was not under the leaſt apprehenſion for himſelf, but very

(I) As Caſſius had been bred up in the principles of the Epicurean philoſophy, and had often diſputed with Brutus concerning matters of this nature, he ſpoke to him thus, as Plutarch informs us: "It is the opinion of our ſect, O Brutus, "that all we feel or ſee is not real and true; but that our ſen-"ſes, being apt to receive all ſorts of impreſſions, are very treach-"erous; and the imagination, which is more quick and ſubtle, "moves and varies them into all manner of ideas which have "no real exiſtence in nature, as readily as we imprint any "form upon wax; ſo that it is eaſy for the ſoul of man, which "has in itſelf both that which forms, and that which is form-"ed, to vary it into what ſhapes it pleaſes. This is evident "from the ſudden changes of our dreams, in which the ima-"gination, upon very ſlight principles, repreſents to us all ſorts "of paſſions of the ſoul, and appearances of things; for it is very ſolicitous about the fate of his friends and country. Both generals purſued their march to Abydus, and croſſing the Helleſpont, took their rout through Thrace, with a deſign to diſlodge Saxa and Norbanus, who had ſeized the paſſes between that country and Macedon. Plutarch tells us, that on their march two eagles flew to them, and lighting upon the two foremoſt enſigns, continually attended the army, and were fed by the ſoldiers, till they came to Philippi, where the day before the battle they diſappeared. Upon their arrival in Thrace, they were joined by Rhaſcupolis, a petty king of that country, at the head of three thouſand horſe, and conducted by him, as he was well acquainted with the country, through by-roads to the place where the two generals of the triumvirs were encamped with their eight legions. There Brutus and Caſſius thought it adviſeable, before they attempted to force the paſſes which were guarded by ſo numerous a body of the enemy, to review their forces, offer a ſolemn ſacrifice for

" the nature of the mind to be in perpetual motion, and that " motion is our imagination, and thought. But beſides all this,
" in our caſe, the body, being tired and worn out with con" tinual labour and cares, naturally works upon the mind, and " keeps it in ſuſpenſe and trouble; but that there ſhould be any " ſuch thing as demons or ſpirits, or, if there were, that they
" ſhould have human ſhape or voice, or power that can reach
" us, is altogether improbable, though, I confeſs, I could wiſh
" there were ſuch beings, that we might not rely upon our " arms only, and our horſes, and our navy, but might be " likewiſe confident of the aſſiſtance of the gods in this our
" moſt ſacred and honourable attempt (52)". 'Tis true, as Caſſius obſerves, that our imagination, when heated, may impoſe upon us falſe objects, which we ſee with the ſame certainty as if they were real; but to ſay, that there are no ſuch beings as ſpirits, who can appear to us, ſpeak to us, and foretel future events, is carrying this principle too far. Caſſius, after inſinuating that the notion of ſpirits is falſe and groundleſs, makes it appear that it were to be wiſhed there were ſuch ſpirits; for in that caſe, they would not come to foretel to them unfortunate, but happy, events; an effectual way of removing Brutus's apprehenſions: for, by this way of reaſoning, be there ſpirits, or be there not, the phantom which Brutus imagined to ſee was falſe, and a mere illuſion of the imaginative faculty of the mind.

for the ſucceſs of their arms, and put their ſoldiers in mind of the juſtice of the cauſe in which they were engaged. Accordingly both armies paſſed in review before the two generals, and were found to conſiſt of eighty thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe, counting Romans and auxiliaries. In the next place, a ſacrifice was offered with the utmoſt ſolemnity, and innumerable victims killed. When this ceremony was over, the two generals appeared on a tribunal erected for that purpoſe, having on their right hand the Roman ſenators and magiſtrates of their party, and on the left the foreign kings and princes who had joined them. Caſſius, who was the elder man, took upon him to ſpeak, and, after having enlarged on the juſtice of their cauſe, on the unheard of cruelties committed by the triumvirs in Italy, on the miſerable condition to which Rome was reduced, &c. he concluded with acquainting them, that Brutus and he had agreed to give immediately two thouſand five hundred drachmas to each ſoldier, five thouſand to each centurion, and double that ſum to each tribune. This cauſed an univerſal joy in the army; nothing was heard but ſhouts of joy and loud acclamations, the ſoldiers and officers ſtriving to outdo each other in proteſtations of fidelity, and an inviolable attachment to the intereſt of their leaders, which, they ſaid, was the ſame with that of their country. The money was immediately diſtributed, and, beſides, conſiderable preſents made to the officers and commanders of the foreign troops; ſo that the whole army marched with great alacrity towards the plain of Oricum, which was bounded towards Macedon by the ſtreights we have mentioned above. Norbanus, who was encamped there, upon the firſt notice of the enemy's march, diſpatched an expreſs to Decidius, who guarded the coaſt of the Meliac gulf, entreating him to make what haſte he could to join him. The two bodies thus united, poſted themſelves ſo advantageouſly in the narrow paſſes, that it ſeemed impoſſible to diſlodge them. Hereupon Brutus, being greatly at a loſs what to do, adviſed with Rhaſcupolis, who, as he was by birth a Thracian and well acquainted with that country, told him, that there was another paſſage over the mountains; but that they could not go that way in leſs than three days, and beſides would meet with no water during their march; but, if they would take water with them, he engaged to conduct them the fourth day to the river Arpeſſus, which was but one day's march from the city of Philippi, by ways unknown even to the wild beaſts.

And diſtribute large ſums among the ſoldiers.

They get beyond the ſtreights of Symbolon poſſeſſed by the enemy.

The ſoldiers took courage, provided themſelves with water, and, truſting entirely to the conduct of Rhaſcupolis, ſet out on their march, Bibulus, ſon-in-law to Brutus, marching with the Thracian prince in the van, and Brutus and Caſſius bringing up the rear. The hardſhips they underwent on their rout can hardly be expreſſed. The fourth day they were ready to fall upon Rhaſcupolis, ſuſpecting him of treachery, when their ſcouts, diſcovering the river, ſignified their joy to the haraſſed troops with loud ſhouts, which were anſwered by the whole army, and heard even in the camp of Norbanus and Saxa, who thereupon abandoned their poſt, and retired in all haſte to Amphipolis, for fear of being ſurrounded. At the ſame time they diſpatched an expreſs to Antony and Octavianus, acquainting them, that the enemy had paſſed the ſtreights, and were advancing towards the frontiers of Macedon. Hereupon Antony, to prevent the enemy from poſſeſſing themſelves of Amphipolis on the Strymon, which the triumvirs deſigned to make their place of arms, quitted the neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, and by long marches reached Amphipolis. His arrival was ſo ſudden, and his march ſo expeditious, that Brutus and Caſſius could not believe he was come, till they ſaw his van-guard advancing into the plains of Philippi. This city, famous for the battle which was fought here, and for the epiſtle which St. Paul afterwards wrote to its inhabitants, belonged, properly ſpeaking, to Thrace, but is placed by moſt geographers in Macedon, purſuant to the diviſion which obtained ever ſince the time of Philip the father of Alexander, who, having reduced the country lying between the Strymon, the antient boundary of Macedon, and the Neſſus or Neſtus, added it to his hereditary kingdom; whence that tract was ever after looked upon as part of Macedon, and is called in the Acts, The chief city of that part of Macedon, that is, of that part beyond the Strymon, which was added to antient Macedon [u]. The city of Philippi, ſo called from Philip the father of Alexander, who fortified it againſt the incurſions of the Thracians, was ſituated on a riſing ground, which abounded with ſprings and had on the north ſeveral hills covered with woods, on the ſouth a marſh, which reached to the Ægean ſea, on the eaſt the ſtreights we have mentioned above, which ſome writers call the ſtreights of Topiris, others the ſtreights of Symbolon; and on the weſt a large plain plain extending as far as the river Strymon. In this plain, at a ſmall diſtance from the city, was a riſing ground, and there Brutus entrenched himſelf, while Caſſius took poſſeſſion of a poſt equally advantageous, about three miles from Brutus's camp, and nearer the ſea. They drew lines of communication from one camp to the other, aud built a ſtrong wall, which covered the interval between the two entrenchments; ſo that they could not have wiſhed for a more advantageous ſituation, having the plains of Philippi before them, the Strymon and the marſh on their left, the ſtreights of Topiris on their right, and behind them the ſea, by which means they could be eaſily ſupplied with all manner of proviſions from Aſia and Sicily, which iſland was in the hands of young Pompey [w].

Brutus and Caſſius poſt themſelves advantageouſly in the ſame plain.

ANTONY was informed at Amphipolis of the advantageous ſituation of the enemy; but nevertheleſs, having left in that city one legion, under the command of Pinarius, he advanced boldly into the plain, and encamped in ſight of the republican generals; but did not attempt any thing till the arrival of Octavianus, who came up ten days after, having been detained at Dyrrachium by a fit of ſickneſs, which ſeized him the ſame day he landed there. And now, the two moſt powerful armies Rome had ever raiſed being in ſight of each other, the world ſtood with dread and terror, expecting the ſucceſs of a general action, which they foreſaw, would ſoon enſue and decide the fate of the Roman empire. The army of Brutus and Caſſius conſiſted of nineteen legions and twenty thouſand horſe, and that of the triumvirs of the ſame number of legions, but more complete, and thirteen thouſand horſe; ſo that the forces of both parties were pretty equal: but the troops of Brutus far excelled thoſe of the triumvirs in the richneſs of their apparel and arms, which were for the moſt part adorned with gold and ſilver; for tho' Brutus in other things had accuſtomed his ſoldiers to uſe all frugality and moderation, yet he thought, that the riches, which they carried about them in their hands and on their bodies, would inſpire them with courage, and make them more bold in action to preſerve their arms, which were in a manner their eſtates. This was likewiſe the ſentiment of Cæſar [x] and Sertorius [y], though Mithridates and other great commanders have been of a different opinion. Antony lay encamped oppoſite to

Caſſius, and Brutus to Octavianus. The latter did nothing worth relating; but Antony was continually haraſſing the enemy, in order to draw them to a battle; for the triumvirs forces began very ſoon to be ſtreightened for want of proviſions, having only Macedon and Thrace open to them, ſince Pompey, Murcus, and Ahenobarbus had, with their ſeveral navies, cut off all communication with Africa, Spain, and Italy. But, on the other hand, Brutus and Caſſius received daily ſupplies from Aſia and Sicily, and had amaſſed great ſtore of neceſſaries in the neighbouring city of Neapolis, and in the iſland of Thaſus, whence they were conveyed without the leaſt danger to their reſpective camps. Antony indeed attempted to cut off their communication with the ſea, by opening a paſſage through the marſh, which lay between them and the ſhore, and completed this great and bold undertaking before the enemy had notice of his deſign; but Caſſius no ſooner ſaw, to his great ſurprize, caſtles and turrets appearing among the reeds, than ſetting all hands to work, he drew a line croſs the marſh, from his camp quite to the ſea, and, fortifying it with towers and caſtles at proper diſtances, maintained, in ſpite of Antony's utmoſt efforts, a free and open communication with the ſea and the cities on the coaſt. In the mean time, Thrace and Macedon being quite exhauſted, the numerous troops of the triumvirs were daily more ſtreightened for want of neceſſaries, with which thoſe countries could no longer ſupply them. This made Antony extremely deſirous of coming to a battle; which the enemy, well acquainted with the ſad condition his troops were in, and which, they knew, would become every day worſe, carefully avoided. Had they continued in this reſolution, the triumvirs muſt either have marched back to Dyrrachium, and from thence returned to Italy, or attempted to force their ſtrong entrenchments, which, in all probability, would have proved fatal to them; but Brutus ſoon changed his mind, and in a council of war, which conſiſted of all the chief officers of the army, declared, that he was for putting the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, that ſo he might either reſtore Rome to her former liberty, or elſe deliver from their miſery ſo many nations, who were haraſſed with the expences, troubles, and dangers of the war. Caſſius, on the other hand, very unwilling to put all to the hazard of a battle, enlarged on the bad poſture of the enemy's affairs, on their want of proviſions, on the extremities to which they muſt be ſoon reduced: "Their forces," ſaid he, "muſt

The triumvirs begin to be ſtreightened for want of proviſions.

Brutus inclined to fight, contrary to the opinion of Caſſius.

" muſt moulder away of themſelves : if we can but reſtrain
" for a while that unſeaſonable ardour which tranſports us, " we ſhall ſee the enemy fly before us, and leave us in " poſſeſſion of their camp and baggage, without ſtriking a " blow. But whither can they fly ? Macedon and Theſſaly " are drained of proviſions ; the ſeas are beſet with our " fleets ; ſo that a battle is their only reſource, which,
" indeed, as they are ſomewhat ſuperior to us in the num" ber of men, may retrieve their affairs, and deliver them
" from the miſeries of their preſent condition." Brutus yielded to theſe unanſwerable reaſons, and both generals kept cloſe in their entrenchments, deſpiſing the bravadoes of Antony, who advanced every day with his army in battalia to the very gates of their camp ; but, in the mean time, the undiſcerning ſoldiery began to complain, and aſcribe to cowardice the prudent meaſures of their generals ; nay, they deſerted in troops to the enemy ; which, together with the advantages the light-horſe of the republican generals had gained in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, inclined Brutus again to venture an engagement. Caſſius ſtill oppoſed it, for the reaſons we have alledged above (K) ; but moſt of the officers, fearing a general deſertion, changed their opinions to that of Brutus ; ſo that a general engagement was agreed to by a great majority, to which Caſſius himſelf yielded at laſt after having ſolemnly declared, that he was ſtill of a contrary

A general engagement agreed to by moſt of the officers.

(K) Some writers ſay, he was alſo deterred from fighting by the following omens : at the time of luſtration, one of Caſſius's officers preſenting him with a garland, which he was to wear at the ſacrifice, gave it him with the inſide outward. Some time before, at a certain ſolemn proceſſion, the perſon who carried, according to cuſtom, a golden image of victory before Caſſius, ſtumbled, and fell. Many birds of prey appeared daily about the camp, and ſeveral ſwarms of bees, which were looked upon as a bad omen, were ſeen in a place within the trenches, which the ſoothſayers ordered to be ſhut out from the camp, to remove the ſuperſtition which began to prevail among the ſoldiery (44). Theſe pretended prodigies, which a man of common ſenſe would now deſpiſe, are ſaid to have terrified and confounded Caſſius himſelf, in ſpite of his Epicurean philoſophy ; which is a plain proof both of human frailty, and of the inſufficiency of philoſophy, as to the ſtrengthening our minds againſt the leaſt terrors and apprehenſions.

trary opinion. Beſides Caſſius, one of Brutus's friends, by name Atellius, was ſtill for putting off the engagement, and ſpinning out the war till the next winter. Brutus aſked him, "What advantage he promiſed himſelf from ſuch a "delay! If I gain nothing elſe," anſwered Atellius, "yet "I ſhall live ſo much the longer." This anſwer offended Caſſius and all the officers who were preſent; but they all agreed, before the council broke up, to give battle the next day. Brutus that night invited his friends to an entertainment, at which he appeared very chearful and full of hope, diverting his gueſts with learned diſcourſes till he went to reſt. Caſſius ſupped privately with a few of his moſt intimate friends, and, during the repaſt, appeared thoughtful and ſilent, contrary to his temper and cuſtom. Valerius Meſſala, a young nobleman of great wit and learning who ſupped with him, tells us, that as Caſſius roſe from the table, he took him by the hand, and preſſing it cloſe in token of his good-will and affection, "Bear witneſs for "me, Meſſala," ſaid he to him in Greek, "that I am "forced, in the ſame manner as Pompey the Great was be"fore me, to expoſe the liberty of the Roman people to "the hazard of one battle; yet we ought to take courage, re"lying on fortune, which it were unjuſt or miſtruſt, though we "have taken bad meaſures." Theſe, Meſſala ſays, were the laſt words Caſſius ſpoke before he withdrew [z] (L).

(L) Plutarch tells us, "That, in taking his leave, he invited "him to ſup with him the next night, being his birth-day." The ambiguous manner in which the Greek writer expreſſes himſelf, leaves it a doubt, whether Caſſius invited Meſſala, or Meſſala Caſſius; whether it was the birth-day of Caſſius, or of Meſſala. Mad. Dacier has made choice of the latter conſtruction; for Caſſius, ſays ſhe, penſive and gloomy as he was, muſt have been but little diſpoſed to make an invitation for the next night. It muſt therefore have been Meſſala who did it on account of his birth-day, as the cuſtom was among friends on the like occaſion. But this learned lady ſeems here to have forgot what ſhe muſt have read in Appian, who tells us in expreſs terms, "that Caſſius was killed on the very day "he was born (45);" ſo that it was the birth-day of Caſſius and not of Meſſala. Neither was Caſſius ſo gloomy and penſive as Mad. Dacier imagines; he was only grieved to ſee himſelf

THE next morning by break of day, a ſcarlet coat of armour, among the Romans the ſignal of battle, was expoſed on the tents of the two generals, who, while the troops were putting themſelves in a readineſs to march out of their entrenchments, met in the middle ſpace between the two camps. Caſſius, deſirous to know what Brutus intended to do in caſe fortune ſhould prove their enemy, addreſſed him at their firſt meeting thus: "The gods grant, O Brutus, that we may "now overcome our enemies, and paſs the reſt of our days "together in repoſe and proſperity; but ſince the greateſt of "human concerns are the moſt uncertain, and ſince it will be "very difficult for us to ſee one another again, if the ſucceſs "of the battle ſhould not anſwer our expectation, tell me, "what are you determined to do, to ſave your ſelf by flight, "or to die?" Brutus anſwered, "When I was young, Caſſius, "and unſkilful in affairs, I condemned Cato for laying vio-"lent hands on himſelf, thinking it irreligious in itſelf, and "unworthy of a man to quit the poſt in which providence "has placed him, and not to take and bear patiently what-"ever the gods are pleaſed to ſend him. But my preſent "ſituation has made me alter my opinion; ſo that if provi-"dence ſhall not diſpoſe what we now undertake according "to our wiſhes, I am reſolved to make no further attempts "nor preparations for war, but to die contented with my for-"tune; for I ſacrificed my life to the ſervice of my country "on the ides of March, in recompence for which I have "ever ſince lived with liberty and honour[a]." At theſe words Caſſius ſmiled, and tenderly embracing him, "With "theſe noble ſentiments, ſaid he, let us advance boldly a-"gainſt the enemy; for either we ourſelves ſhall conquer, "or have no cauſe to fear thoſe who do." After this they conſulted with their friends about the order of battle. Brutus deſired of Caſſius, that he might command the right wing; which was readily granted him, tho' it was thought a poſt more fit for Caſſius, in regard both of his age and experience; nay, Caſſius placed Meſſala in the ſame wing, at the head of his beſt legions, ordering him to aſſiſt and ſupport Brutus. While the tribunes and centurions were drawing up their men, Brutus retired for a few minutes into his tent, and wrote a letter to his friend Atticus, telling him, "That his affairs "were ſelf obliged to hazard a battle, when he thought himſelf ſure of victory without running any riſques.

" were in the beſt ſtate he could wiſh; for that either he " ſhould overcome, and reſtore liberty to the people of Rome, " or die, and be himſelf free from ſlavery." In the ſame letter he blamed the conduct of Antony, " who, when he " might have been ranked among the Bruti, the Caſſii, and " the Catos, had joined Octavianus;" adding, that " if they " were not both defeated in the enſuing battle, they would " ſoon fall out and quarrel with one another [b];" which happened accordingly, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

THE two republican generals, having drawn up their men in battalia, marched out of their entrenchments, and advanced in good order into the plain, where the army of the triumvirs waited for them in battle-array. Antony commanded the right wing, and Octavianus the left; but the latter withdrew juſt before the charge was given, upon a dream, which his phyſician, by name Artorius, had the preceding night. He dreamt that he ſaw a viſion, which directed Octavianus to be removed out of the camp. The viſion was immediately obeyed, and he conveyed away very ſeaſonably. This Octavianus himſelf tells us in his memoirs quoted by Plutarch, which Dion ſeems not to have conſulted, ſince he writes, that Octavianus was in the action, but, like a ſick perſon, without his armour, not being yet recovered from his former indiſpoſition. Brutus, before he began the charge, ſent to all the commanders tickets with the parole or word of battle, which, according to ſome, was liberty, according to others, Apollo, and rid through the ranks, exhorting his ſoldiers to behave with their uſual bravery. They were ſo animated by his ſpeech, that few of them had patience to ſtay for the word or command to charge; but, before it could be given, ruſhed with loud ſhouts upon the enemy. This cauſed a great confuſion in the army, the legions being ſcattered and ſeparated from one another. Meſſala, at the head of his legions, inſtead of attacking the enemy in front, took a compaſs about, and having put ſome of the ranks in Octavianus's rear in diſorder, and killed a ſmall number of his men, fell upon his camp, and entered it ſword in hand, made a dreadful havock of thoſe he found there, and cut off among the reſt two thouſand Lacedæmonians, who were newly come to the aſſiſtance of Octavianus. He himſelf had but juſt before been conveyed away, upon the perſuaſion of Artorius, as we have related above; but the ſoldiers pierced the litter, in which he uſed to be carried, on account account of his indiſpoſition, in many places with their darts and pikes; whence a report was ſpread, and for ſome time believed, that he was ſlain. In the mean time, Brutus, charging the enemy in front, eaſily put them to flight, as they were in great conſternation for the loſs of their camp, cut three whole legions in pieces on the ſpot, and purſued the fugitives with great ſlaughter, the plain being, to a great diſtance, ſtrewed with dead bodies. Thus was the enemy's left wing entirely defeated by the brave Brutus, who as Octavianus was no-where to be found, began to believe, that the republic was delivered from the worſt of her tyrants. He was confirmed in this belief by ſome of his ſoldiers, who preſenting themſelves to him, told him, that they had killed Octavianus, ſhewed him their ſwords all bloody, and deſcribed his age and perſon [c]. But the coward was ſafe enough, either in Antony's camp, or lurking in the mire of the neighbouring marſh [d], Brutus took a great many of the enemy's enſigns and three eagles.

The cowardice of Octavianus.

Brutus, by engaging too far in the puiuit, left the wing, which Caſſius commanded, naked and ſeparated from the reſt of the army. Hereupon, Antony, who well knew how to take advantage of this overſight, charged the enemy in front, and at the ſame time detached ſome legions with orders to croſs the marſh, and fall upon their flank which was left and unguarded. The firſt ſhock was terrible; Antony, cording to ſome writers, retired into the marſh to avoid the fury of it, and did not appear again till the enemy began to give ground. Be that as it will, both parties fought with unparallelled bravery and reſolution. Antony's men, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts, could make no impreſſion upon Caſſius's front; but, in the mean time, the detached legions, having opened a paſſage through the marſh, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy's flank, and, after a long and vigorous reſiſtance, put them to the rout. The run-aways fled to their camp, whither the triumvir's men purſued them, and, finding it ill guarded, made themſelves eaſily maſters of it. This occaſioned ſo general a conſternation in the reſt of the army, who were ſtill maintaining their ground in the plain with great intrepidity, that firſt the cavalry, and afterwards the foot began to make their eſcape, and fly towards the ſea. Caſſius on this occaſion did all that could be expected from a man of courage. He returned ſeveral times to the charge at the

the head of his guards and the few men he could rally, and ſnatching an enſign out of the hand of the ſtandard-bearer, who fled, carried it himſelf; but being no longer able to keep together even his prætorian band or guards, he was forced to retire with a ſmall number of attendants to a riſing ground near the city of Philippi [d].

In the mean time, Brutus, believing he had gained a complete victory, was leading back his troops, loaded with the plunder of Octavianus's camp, when caſting his eyes upon that of Caſſius, he was ſurpriſed that he could not ſpy any tents ſtanding there, not even the general's, which uſed to appear at a great diſtance above the reſt. Some who were about him, and had a more quick and diſcerning ſight, acquainted him, that they diſtinguiſhed a great many arms ſhining about his tent, and ſilver targets moving to and fro, which, they thought, could not belong to thoſe who had been left to guard the camp. On the other ſide, there did not appear ſo many dead bodies about the place, as would have been after the defeat of ſo many legions.

Brutus marches to the aſſiſtance of Caſſius.

However, Brutus ſuſpecting Caſſius's misfortune, left a ſufficient guard in the enemy's camp, called back his troops from the purſuit, and marched with all poſſible expedition to the relief of his collegue, who, from the top of the hill, whither he had retired, diſcovered nothing as he was ſhort-ſighted, except the deſtruction of his camp, and even that in a confuſed manner; but thoſe who were with him, acquainted him, that they ſaw a great body of horſe moving towards him. As Caſſius knew nothing of the victory and march of Brutus, he took them to be a party of the enemy ſent in purſuit of him. However, he ordered out Titinius, one of his moſt intimate friends, to get more certain intelligence. As ſoon as Brutus's horſe ſaw him, thoſe who were his more familiar acquaintance, ſhouting for joy and alighting from their horſes, ſaluted and embraced him, while the reſt who knew him to be one of Caſſius's chief favourites, rid round him, as it were in triumph, aſking him, "What news of his general?" Caſſius obſerving this, and believing the horſemen, who diſmounted to embrace Titinius, had taken him priſoner, cryed out, "Alas! to preſerve the remains of a miſerable life, I have "expoſed my beſt friend to be taken by the enemy before "my face." Having thus ſpoke, he retired into a tent with with Pindarus, one of his freed-men, whom he had reserved for such an occasion ever since the unhappy battle of Carrhæ. We have no good account of what passed there; but Cassius's head was found lying severed from his body, and Pindarus never appeared afterwards, whence some suspected he had killed his master without his command [e]. Livy [f] and Plutarch [g], in the life of Cæsar, tell us, that Cassius dispatched himself with the same dagger with which he had killed Cæsar; but all other historians, nay, Plutarch himself in the lives of Brutus and Antony, agree in the circumstances of his death, which we have related. A few minutes after Cassius's death, his attendants perceived who the horsemen were, and saw Titinius, crowned with garlands in token of Brutus's victory, making what haste he could towards them with the cavalry: but their joy was soon turned into the deepest melancholy and affliction. Titinius especially was inconsolable, when he was informed of the unfortunate mistake and death of his general. He burst into tears, and crying out, "My long "stay has been the occasion of his death," he drew his sword and killed himself upon the body of his friend. Brutus, upon the first advice of the defeat of Cassius, flew to his assistance; but heard nothing of his death till he came near his camp. Then shedding many tears over his body, he called him "the last of the Romans," meaning thereby that Rome would never produce another man equal to him. He caused his body to be privately conveyed to the island of Thasus, lest the celebrating of his funeral within the camp might dishearten the troops, and occasion some disorder. He then assembled the soldiers of the deceased general, comforted them, and, to make them amends for the losses they had sustained, promised to each man two thousand drachmas. Cassius was generally esteemed one of the best commanders of his age, and had given signal proofs of an extraordinary courage and consummate knowledge of the military art, in Crassus's unhappy expedition against the Parthians. He was to the very last against engaging the triumvirs, and would, in all probability, if he had lived, brought over Brutus to his opinion; which could not but prove fatal to the enemy, who were already reduced to great streights for want of provisions, and must in a short time have have inevitably periſhed with famine. The good opinion which Brutus entertained of his honeſty and virtue, and the elogium, with which he honoured him after his death, are a ſufficient confutation of the many ill-natured reflections, with which the mercenary flatterers of the Cæſars have endeavoured to blacken his reputation and aſperſe his memory. It was indeed commonly ſaid, as Plutarch informs us, "that Brutus hated the tyrannical power, and Caſſius "only the tyrant," on account of ſome private grudge (M); but that writer, tho' no friend to Caſſius (N), clears him from this

(M) Caſſius pretended to have received many injuries from Cæſar. Among the reſt he complained of his having taken ſome lions from him; for when Caſſius was deſigned for ædile, he had cauſed many lions to be taken, and conducted to Megara, in order to make uſe of them in the ſhews, which, in virtue of his office, he was to exhibit to the people. But Cæſar finding them in Megara, when that city was taken by Fuſius Calenus, one of his lieutenants, after the defeat of Pompey, ſeized them for himſelf. This, ſome writers ſay, was what chiefly ſtirred up Caſſius againſt Cæſar; but Plutarch clears him from this imputation, as we have obſerved in the text. Caſſius bore a private grudge to Cæſar on another account: he and Brutus ſtood both for the prætura urbana, or the prætorſhip of the city; and Cæſar is ſaid to have given privately each of the competitors hopes of his favouring their pretenſions, with a view to foment ſome ſmall differences that had ariſen between them on other accounts. When they came to lay their claims before Cæſar, Brutus had only the reputation of his honour and virtue to oppoſe to the many gallant actions, which Caſſius had performed in his youth againſt the Parthians. However, the dictator, having heard both parties, ſaid, in deliberating about the matter among his friends. "Caſſius indeed pleads with moſt juſtice; but Brutus muſt have "the firſt prætorſhip." Accordingly the prætorſhip of the city was given to Brutus, and another to Caſſius; but the gaining of this did not ſo much oblige him, as he was incenſed for the loſs of the other (46). Caſſius, who was of a harſh and paſſionate temper, was, no doubt, fired againſt Cæſar on account of theſe private injuries, which, it is not improbable, contributed in ſome degree to the reſolution he afterwards took; but what chiefly prompted him to it was, as Plutarch himſelf owns, his natural rancour and hatred againſt the whole race of tyrants (47).

(N) Plutarch was highly prejudiced againſt Caſſius, as muſt evidently appear to every impartial reader, who peruſes his

this charge, and tells us, that from his infancy he bore an irreconcileable hatred to the whole race of tyrants, whereof he gives us the following inſtance: when he was but a boy, and went to the ſame ſchool with Fauſtus the ſon of Sylla, hearing him one day bragging of the unlimited power of his father, he roſe up, and gave him two or three boxes on the ear. The relations of Fauſtus complained of this affront to Pompey, who thereupon ſummoned the two boys to appear before him; but young Caſſius was ſo far from yielding to the remonſtrances of Pompey, or giving any ſatisfaction to Fauſtus, that he threatened to ſtrike him again, even in Pompey's preſence, if he dared to utter the words which had provoked him. He was ſomewhat inclined to covetouſneſs, naturally paſſionate, and commanded rather by fear than love. But who is without faults? Caſſius in the mean meant well, and would, in all likelihood, if he had lived a little longer, ſaved his country from utter ruin.

BRUTUS, now the ſole commander of two numerous armies, thought it adviſeable to withdraw his troops from the camp of Octavianus, which he had taken. Antony likewiſe, when informed of the total overthrow of his colegue, abandoned Caſſius's camp, which he did not think himſelf in a condition to defend againſt the victorious troops of Brutus; ſo that both armies returned to their former poſts. Brutus was under the utmoſt concern for the loſs of Caſſius, having no commander of reputation to put in his room. On the other hand, the triumvirs, not yet informed of the death of Caſſius, were quite out of heart, having loſt above ſixteen thouſand of their beſt legionaries: whereas works. This prejudice was probably owing to the ſeverity with which the republican general uſed the Rhodians, a Greek nation. "Caſſius having taken Rhodes," ſays Plutarch, "behaved himſelf there with great cruelty." But, with his leave, we cannot look upon the puniſhment of fifty mutiniers as an inſtance of cruelty. As he took the city by ſtorm, he might, after the example of other Roman generals, put all the inhabitants whom he found in arms to the ſword, but he contented himſelf with puniſhing fifty of the ringleaders. As for the wealth of the inhabitants, it belonged to him by right of war; but, as Plutarch was a Greek, the love of his country has, on ſeveral occaſions, got the better of his philoſophy; a proof that no man, however philoſophical, can boaſt an entire exemption from prejudices.

whereas on the enemy's ſide there were not ſlain eight thouſand men, reckoning even the ſuttlers and ſervants of the army. Beſides, proviſions were become very ſcarce in their camp, without any poſſible means of receiving new ſupplies, either by ſea or land. Theſe melancholy reflections had almoſt reduced them to deſpair, when a ſervant of Caſſius, by name Demetrius, coming in the evening to Antony, gave him an account of the tragical end of Caſſius, and at the ſame time delivered to him the garment, which he had taken from his maſter's dead body, and his ſword ſtill bloody. Antony, overjoyed at this news, immediately imparted it to his collegue; and they both agreed to draw out their men next morning by day-break, to try whether they could bring Brutus to a battle, before his men recovered themſelves from the terror and conſternation, which, they were well appriſed, the defeat and death of Caſſius muſt have occaſioned; but Brutus, having his own camp filled with priſoners, who required a numerous guard, and finding that of Caſſius in great diſorder, the ſoldiers, who had been defeated, burning with a ſecret envy and indignation againſt thoſe who had conquered, kept cloſe in his entrenchments, and deſpiſed the enemy's bravadoes. As his troops, elated with their late victory, ſhewed a great eagerneſs to venture a ſecond engagement, he aſſembled the ſoldiers of both armies, and, after having commended their valour, and ſlightly reproved his own men for falling upon the enemy in diſorder, without waiting either for the word, or the command of their general, he enlarged on the deplorable ſtate to which the enemy was reduced, and aſſured them, that if they could but reſtrain their ardor for a while, they would have the pleaſure of ſeeing the armies of Antony and Octavianus either periſh with famine, or, by a ſhameful flight, abandon Greece and Macedon. "But "to hazard a ſecond battle," ſaid he, "is to put ourſelves "in the power of fortune, when we are ſure of victory "by continuing inactive in our camp." After this he cauſed a thouſand drachmas to be given to each ſoldier of both camps, and diſmiſſed them highly ſatisfied with the generoſity of their leader, to whoſe orders they promiſed an entire obedience and ſubmiſſion, whether he thought proper to engage the enemy, or continue in a ſtate of inaction [h].

Antony and Octavianus, upon the news of the death of Caſſius, endeavour in vain to draw Brutus to a ſecond battle.

In

[h] Plut. in Bruto. Appian. p. 656. Dio. p. 355.

In the mean time, provisions growing daily more scarce in the enemy's camp, Antony and Octavianus, finding they could not bring Brutus to a battle, were greatly at a loss what measures to take. All their dependence was on a fleet which they expected hourly from Italy, having on board great store of provisions, two legions of veterans, one of which was that of Mars, a prætorian cohort, and a considerable body of cavalry; but while they were comforting themselves with the hopes of the speedy arrival of this powerful supply, news was brought them that their fleet under the command of Cneius Domitius Calvinus, had been entirely defeated, and most of their ships, with the soldier on board, either sunk or taken by Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Lucius Statius Murcus, the two admirals of the adverse party. Some of their ships indeed found means to save themselves among the rocks of the Adriatic sea; but being there blocked up by the enemy, both the soldiers and mariners, after having consumed all their provisions, were forced by famine to feed upon the sails and tackle of their ships, which they boiled with the pitch and grease, they had prepared for the careening of their vessels. This victory was gained by the admirals of the republic the same day in which the battle of Philippi was fought; and the news of so great an overthrow, which soon reached the triumvirs, so disheartened them that they now began to look upon their affairs as quite desperate, being not only streightened for want of necessaries, but without any prospect or possible means of procuring new supplies. Besides, as they were encamped in a low ground, surrounded with marshes, and a great quantity of rain, as it usually happens in autumn, had fallen after the battle, which filled their tents with mire and water, distempers began to reign in both armies, and daily carry off great nnmbers of men. On the other hand Brutus had sufficient provisions to support his army for a long time, was very advantageously posted, his camp being safe from the injuries of the weather, and inaccessible to the enemy; and, as he was absolute master of the sea, he could receive whatever he stood in need of from Asia, Africa, Sicily, and Spain. The triumvirs, finding themselves in this desperate condition, left nothing unattempted which could provoke Brutus's men, and make them mutiny against their general for declining an engagement. They drew out their troops day after day, and marched in battle array up to the very gates of the enemy's camp; but Brutus, who knew that their boldness and courage proceeded from despair, kept within his entrenchments, not doubting, doubting, but he ſhould ſoon ſee them moulder away, and, by a ſhameful flight abandon both Greece and Macedon to the mercy of his troops. The triumvirs, finding they could by no means bring Brutus to a battle, detached two legions to take poſſeſſion of a a riſing ground, which, tho' cloſe to Caſſius's camp, Brutus had thought proper to abandon after the late battle. About ſix hundred paces from thence, towards the ſea, they poſted ten legions, and two more at a ſmall diſtance from them, with a deſign to cut off the communication between the enemy's army and fleets. On the other hand Brutus cauſed ſeveral works to be carried on from his camp quite to the l[illegible]e, and by that means kept in ſpite of all the enemy's efforts, a free communication with the ſea; but as ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the ſoldiers of the oppoſite parties, who covered their workmen, in which Brutus's men had all the advantage, they were ſo elated with this ſucceſs, that they began to mutiny, and, aſſembling in crowds, aſk their general, "What cowardice "he had lately obſerved in them, that they muſt be thus, "like priſoners, kept within their entrenchments, and not "ſuffered to make uſe of their arms, and exert that courage, "which had but a few days before proved ſo fatal to the "enemy, who now inſulted them?" Brutus endeavoured to ſatisfy them, and reſtrain their unſeaſonable ardor, by repreſenting to them the deſperate poſture of the enemy's affairs, and the happy ſituation of their own; but all to no purpoſe, tho' the triumvirs forces were reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and a conſiderable body of German troops, to avoid ſtarving in their camp, had deſerted, and given the mutineers a full account of the miſeries, which the want of proviſions occaſioned in the enemy's army; yet, by an unaccountable obſtinacy and perverſeneſs, they ſtill perſiſted in demanding to be led out againſt the enemy, whom they deſired to conquer not by famine, but valour; nay, becauſe the prudent general refuſed to comply with their requeſt, ſeveral Romans, as well as auxiliaries, abandoned him and went over to the enemy. Among the latter were Amyntas, commander in chief of the Galatians ſent by the old king Dejotarus, and Rhaſcupolis, who had proved ſo ſerviceable to Brutus and Caſſius on their march through Thrace. Some writers indeed ſay, that Rhaſcupolis did not join the enemy, but returned home with the troops he commanded. Be that as it will, this deſertion gave Brutus great concern, which was encreaſed by the diſorders that happened daily in Caſſius's camp, whoſe ſoldiers, become headſtrong and and intractable since the death of their general, refused to obey the officer whom Brutus had put in his room. In these circumstances Brutus yielded at last to the importunity of his soldiers and resolved to put an end to his own cares and those of the Roman world, by a general and decisive action; which, all the antients tell us, he would never have done, had he been informed of the late advantage gained by his fleet; but of that important victory he received no intelligence till twenty days after, that is, till the very evening before the fight. This some writers ascribe to the negligence, others to the treachery, of his officers, but Plutarch to providence which, as the state of Rome, says he, now necessarily required a monarchy, prevented Brutus from receiving notice of his good success, that it might remove the only man who was able to resist the person whom destiny had appoined to be the sole governor of the Roman state (O). However that be, the evening before the battle, when it was too late for Brutus to alter his measures, one Caius Clodius, a deserter from the enemy, came to acquaint the republican general, that the triumvirs had received advice, of the loss of their fleet, and for that reason were in such haste to come to a battle. But the intelligence he brought met with no credit; nay Brutus would not so much as admit him to his presence, taking it for granted, that he had invented the news to please him, and bring himself into favour [i].

Brutus yields to the importunity of the soldiery.

And

(O) For the empire, says Mad. Dacier, was no longer able to support itself. It was necessary for it to come under the dominion of a single person. So long as there were so many competitors on foot, so many pretenders either to the empire or the royalty, that competition would have been an inexhaustible source of civil war and dissension; and nothing was more incompatible with monarchy than Brutus. Brutus therefore was to be removed. All this, adds this learned writer, strongly proves the truth of Plato's sentiments, who maintains, that of all governments monarchy is the most perfect; but then the monarch must govern according to law. So far we agree with Mad. Dacier. But is it to be left to the monarch to govern, or not to govern, by law, as he thinks fit? Is he to have nothing but his own will and inclination to restrain him? Is mankind to depend for security and happiness upon uncertain inclinations? This surely is wide of the opinion of so wise a philosopher as Plato, who, in preferring monarchy to all other governments, could not mean by monarchy a power without controul.

AND now Brutus, determined to put the whole to the iſſue of a general action, found himſelf obliged to uſe violence to his good-nature, and take a precaution, which, tho' neceſſary, may ſeem not altogether free from the reproach of cruelty. He had taken in the late battle a great number of priſoners, partly ſlaves and partly freemen, who required a numerous guard, which he could not well ſpare. As Antony therefore and Octavianus had ordered all their priſoners, without diſtinction, to be inhumanly maſſacred, Brutus, having reaſon to ſuſpect that the ſlaves he had taken were tampering with his ſoldiers, commanded them all to be ſlain. Though they deſerved to die, and their death was but a kind of retaliation upon the enemy, yet the flatterers of the Cæſars have, with great partiality and injuſtice, made long deſcants on this pretended act of cruelty, without taking notice of his clemency towards the freemen and Roman citizens. Of theſe he openly diſmiſſed great numbers, telling them, "That with the enemy they were captives and ſlaves; but "with him freemen and citizens of Rome." Others he concealed himſelf, and helped to eſcape privately, perceiving that ſome of his commanders and friends were implacably bent upon their deſtruction. Among the captives was one Volumnius a mimic, and Sacculio a buffoon, who, by their unſeaſonable jeſts, of which Brutus took no manner of notice, provoked ſome of the chief officers of his army. Theſe brought them before their general, and accuſed them of not being able, even in their preſent ſituation, to refrain from their abuſive jeſts and ſcurrilous language. Brutus having his mind taken up with other affairs, returned no anſwer to the accuſation; but Meſſala Corvinus was of opinion, that they ſhould be whipt publicly upon a ſcaffold, and, after that ignominius puniſhment, be ſent back naked to Antony and Octavianus, which, he thought, would reflect no ſmall diſhonour on thoſe two generals, who were not aſhamed to chuſe ſuch ſcoundrels for their bottle-companions. At this ſome who were preſent laughed; but Publius Caſca, who gave the firſt wound to Cæſar, "It does not become "us," ſaid he with a ſerious air, "to be thus merry after "the loſs of Caſſius. And as for you, O Brutus, you will "ſhew what reſpect you bear to the memory of your fellow-"commander, by puniſhing or pardoning thoſe who can-"not forbear ſcoffing and ſpeaking abuſively of him." "Why then, Caſca," replied Brutus, "do you tell me of this, "and not do yourſelf what you think proper?" This anſwer was was taken for his consent to the death of those unhappy wretches, who were accordingly carried away and slain [k]. And put to death.

BRUTUS, having got rid of most of his prisoners, assembled his soldiers the day before the battle, and in order to rouze their courage, promised them the pillage of Thessalonica and Lacedæmon, two cities which had sided with the triumvirs. This, in the opinion of Plutarch, is the only inexcuseable fault which Brutus was ever guilty of; for, if in the end Antony and Octavianus, says that writer, were much more cruel in the rewards they gave their soldiers after victory; if they drove out almost all the ancient inhabitants of Italy, to put their soldiers in possession of their lands and cities; it is well known, that their only design and end in undertaking the war was, to obtain dominion and empire: but the great opinion the world had conceived of Brutus on account of his virtue, would not allow him either to conquer the enemy, or save himself, but by means truly just and honourable, especially after the death of Cassius, who was generally accused of putting Brutus upon several actions, not entirely agreeable to his mild and generous temper. But after all, Plutarch entertained so great an opinion of Brutus's virtue, good-nature, and integrity, that he could not prevail upon himself to believe, that he made this promise of his own motion; but thinks he was in a manner forced to it by his officers, according to whose advice he both did and said many things, contrary to the bent of his own inclination, especially in whatever he thought might conduce to the bringing of Cassius's soldiers into better order, who were become bold and insolent in the camp after the death of their general, but in the field cowardly and fearful, remembering, that they had suffered themselves to be shamefully overcome [l]. Brutus promises his soldiers the spoil of two Greek cities.

BRUTUS, having encouraged his men with promises of ample rewards after the victory, and made the necessary preparations for the next day's engagement, retired late in the night to his tent, when the spectre, which had promised to meet him at Philippi, is said to have appeared to him again, in the same shape as it had done before, but to have vanished in an instant, without one single word being uttered on either side; but Publius Volumnius, a man given to the study of philosophy, who was then in Brutus's camp, and wrote an account of several other prodigies, which he The spectre appears again to Brutus.

ſuppoſed to have happened before this great battle (P), makes no mention of this apparition [m]. Be that as it will, Brutus, without taking the leaſt notice of this or any other prodigies, drew out his men the next morning, with a firm reſolution of reſtoring liberty to his country, or dying in the attempt. He choſe his ground like an able general, forming his lines at a ſmall diſtance from his camp, that he might have a ſafe retreat, in caſe of any misfortune. Then riding through the ranks, "Fellow-ſoldiers," ſaid he, "you have deſired to engage the enemy in the open field, when you might have obtained a complete victory, by continuing inactive within your entrenchments; but this kind of victory you deſpiſe, as not honourable enough for men of your bravery; you are for purchaſing glory at the expence of your blood. It is therefore now incumbent upon you to ſummon all that boldneſs, with which you demanded battle, to maintain the honour of your firſt victory, and to anſwer the truſt which I have repoſed in your valour. Whether Rome is to enjoy an uninterrupted happineſs and liberty, or to be condemned to eternal ſlavery and endleſs calamities, this day will decide." As for Antony and Octavianus, they could ſcarce believe their own eyes, when they firſt obſerved a coat of arms, the uſual ſignal of battle, expoſed on Brutus's tent. Overjoyed at this unexpected reſolution, they ordered their men to prepare for battle; but did not quit their entrenchments before three in the afternoon, when they marched out like famiſhed lions, as Appian expreſſes it, againſt their prey. Their generals, the more to encourage them, promiſed to each ſoldier five hundred drachmas after the victory, painting to

A kind of ſweat in the nature of oil, and having the ſmell of roſes, iſſued from the arm of a centurion, which, tho' often wiped and dried, yet continued ſweating. The firſt man, whom Brutus's troops met at the opening the gate of the camp to march into the plain, was an Æthiopian, or negro, whom they cut in pieces, interpreting that circumſtance as an unlucky omen. When the two armies were advanced within reach of each other, two eagles, appearing in the air, fought in the ſpace between the armies, the ſoldiers on both ſides being ſilent and intent on the fight, till that, which was on the ſide of Brutus, yielded and fled, &c. to them at the ſame time in moſt lively colours the inexpreſſible miſeries and calamities, which they muſt unavoidably endure, if overcome. "You have but two things to chuſe" ſaid they, "to conquer, or periſh by the moſt miſerable of "all deaths, famine." Having thus ſpoke, they ordered their men to advance with a ſlow pace againſt the enemy, who kept their ground ready to receive them. When the two armies were in preſence of each other, Brutus had the mortification to ſee a brave knight, by name Cumulatus, whom he highly eſteemed for his valour, abandon his poſt and riding cloſe by him, go over to the enemy. Hereupon Brutus, fearing others might follow the example of the treacherous knight, cauſed the ſignal of battle to be given immediately, and charged the enemy's left wing, commanded by Octavianus, with ſuch intrepidity, vigor, and reſolution, that all gave way before him. As Octavianus's cavalry was put into the utmoſt diſorder at the very firſt onſet, Brutus's horſe broke in among the enemy's foot, and made a moſt dreadful havock of the legionaries. But while the brave Brutus was thus ſignaliſing himſelf in the right wing, his left, commanded by the lieutenants of Caſſius, men no-ways equal to that charge, was hard preſſed by Antony. Caſſius's cavalry immediately gave way, leaving the flank of the wing, in which they were poſted, naked and unguarded. Hereupon the foot, fearing to be encompaſſed, widened their ranks to the right and left, that they might make head every way; but as this weakened them, they were at the firſt onſet broken and diſordered by the cloſe battalions of Antony. The plain was in an inſtant covered with the runaways ſcattered up and down, ſome of them making towards the camp, others flying to the ſea-ſide, but moſt of them repairing to the right wing to take ſhelter among the victorious troops of Brutus. Antony did not purſue the fugitives; but, like an experienced general, marched directly againſt Brutus, and fell upon his rear with incredible fury. That brave commander performed on this occaſion all that could be expected from an expert general and valiant ſoldier, giving proofs in the greateſt danger of a courage and conduct, which well deſerved to be crowned with victory; but Caſſius's troops, which were overthrown in the left wing, crouding in among his ranks, and carrying with them, where-ever they came, deſpair and confuſion, turned the ſcale in favour of the enemy, after Brutus had, for a long time, maintained his ground, with unparallelled bravery, againſt all the forces of their united armies. His lines were at length broke and put into diſorder, notwithſtanding all he could do to rally them. He attempted ſeveral times to bring them back to the charge; but all his endeavours proved unſucceſsful, Caſſius's men, who were terrified with their own defeat, communicating their fear to the reſt of the army. Brutus ſtood his ground with the few men he could rally; but, being ſurrounded on all ſides and overpowered by the numerous forces of Antony and Octavianus, was in imminent danger of being either cut in pieces, or falling alive into the hands of his moſt inveterate enemies. And on this occaſion it was, that moſt of Brutus's beſt officers were killed in endeavouring to ſave their general, who, with their aſſiſtance, breaking through the enemy's battalions that ſurrounded them, withdrew, when abandoned hy his men, from the field of battle. Among the few who attended him was one Lucilius Lucinus, an intimate friend of his, who obſerving a body of Thracian horſe, under the command of Rhaſcus, the brother of Rhaſcupolis, taking no notice of any other in the purſuit, but making directly towards Brutus, reſolved to ſtop them, and ſave the life of his general, at the hazard of his own. Accordingly, without acquainting Brutus with his deſign, he halted, till the Thracians came up and ſurrounded him. Then he cried out that he was Brutus, and, begging quarters, deſired they would carry him to Antony, pretending that he feared Octavianus, but durſt truſt him. The Thracians, overjoyed with their prey, and thinking themſelves wonderfully happy, immediately detached ſome of their own body to acquaint Antony with their good fortune; and in the mean time giving over the purſuit, returned to the field of battle with their priſoner. The report being ſpread in an inſtant all over the army, that Brutus was taken, and that the Thracians were bringing him alive to Antony, both ſoldiers and officers flocked together from all parts to ſee him. Some pitied his misfortune, others accuſed him of a meanneſs unbecoming his former glory, for ſuffering himſelf, out of too much love of life, to be a prey to barbarians. As for Antony, he was not a little concerned at this adventure, being quite at a loſs in what manner he ſhould receive, and how he ſhould treat, his illuſtrious captive: but he was ſoon delivered from his uneaſineſs; for as the Thracians drew near, he knew the priſoner, who had paſſed himſelf upon the Thracians for Brutus, and now addreſſing the triumvir with a generous confidence; "Be aſſured, Antony," ſaid he, "that no "enemy either has, or ever ſhall take Marcus Brutus alive.

" Forbid it, ye gods, that fortune ſhould ever prevail ſo much " above virtue! But let him be found dead or alive, he " will certainly be found in ſuch a ſtate as is worthy of him. " As for me, I have delivered myſelf up to ſave him, and am " now ready to ſuffer whatever torments you think proper to " inflict upon me, without demanding or expecting any " quarter." Antony, wonderfully taken with the fidelity, virtue, and generoſity of Lucilius, turned to the Thracians, now ſenſible of, and enraged at, their diſappointment, and addreſſed them thus: " I perceive my fellow-ſoldiers, " that you are concerned, and full of reſentment, for having " been thus impoſed upon by Lucilius; but be aſſured, that " you have met with a booty better than that which you " ſought for; you were in ſearch of an enemy, and have " brought me a friend. I was truly at a loſs how I ſhould " have uſed Brutus, if you had brought him to me alive; " but of this I am ſure, that it is better to have ſuch a man " as Lucilius, our friend than our enemy." Having thus ſpoke, he embraced Lucilius, and commended him to the care of one of his friends. Such a generous behaviour won the heart of Lucilius, who ever after continued inviolably attached to the intereſt of his friend and benefactor [m]. After this both Antony and Octavianus marched with their victorious legions in purſuit of the enemy's broken and diſperſed forces, making a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives, and ſtrewing the whole plain with dead bodies. Some of Brutus's officers, not caring to outlive the liberty of their country, would neither fly nor give ground; but died, ſword in hand, in the poſts aſſigned them. Among theſe were Marcus, the ſon of the great Cato; L. Caſſius, nephew to the deceaſed general; C. Flavius, one of Brutus's beſt friends; Marcus, the ſon of Lucullus who conquered Mithridates the Great; Demetrius, Apollonides, and ſeveral other commanders of great diſtinction. Young Cato diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion in a very eminent manner; for after the body he commanded was put to the rout, he returned ſeveral times to the charge with the few forces he could rally, overthrew all who oppoſed him, and declaring who he was, and often repeating his father's name, fell at laſt upon a heap of dead bodies of the enemy, whom he ſacrificed to the manes of his father and the expiring republic. Such a behaviour was very ſurpriſing in a man of young Cato's character; for, degenerating from the virtue of his father, he had, to that time, led an idle, indolent, and debauched life; but the glory he had acquired by his death, has recommended him to poſterity, as a worthy ſon of ſo great a father [n].

What happened to Brutus after the loſs of the battle.

As for Brutus, the contrivance of Lucilius gave him an opportunity of paſſing a little brook, encompaſſed with rocks, and ſhaded with trees. Being there overtaken by the night, he ſtopped in a hollow place at the foot of a great rock, being attended with a ſmall number of his friends and officers. There lifting up his eyes to heaven, he repeated two Greek verſes, one of which Volumnius, who attended him, forgot, but remembered the other, which was the following out of the Medea of Euripides;

" Puniſh, great Jove, the author of theſe ills;

By which it was thought he meant Antony, who remembered and repeated it, when, after the battle of Actium, he was reduced to the neceſſity of laying violent hand on himſelf. Afterwards Brutus named ſeverally all his friends, who had been ſlain in the battle before his face, and fetched a deep ſigh, eſpecially at the mentioning of Flavius and Labeo, whereof one was his lieutenant, and the other maſter of his workmen. In the mean time, one of his followers, who was very thirſty, and ſaw Brutus in the ſame condition, ran to the brook, and brought him ſome water in his helmet. While he was drinking, a noiſe being heard from the other ſide of the rivulet, Volumnius, taking Dardanus, Brutus's armour-bearer, with him, went out to diſcover what had occaſioned it. They both returned ſoon after; but finding no water, aſked what was become of it; " It is all drank," replied Brutus ſmiling; " but you ſhall have ſome more fetched immediately." But he, who had brought the firſt water, being ſent again, narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands, by whom he was dangerouſly wounded. Brutus, underſtanding by this that he was inveſted, exhorted thoſe who were with him to make ſome attempt to get to their camp before day-light; for he conjectured, that he had not loſt many of his men, and that thoſe who had eſcaped had taken refuge there. Statilius undertook to paſs through the enemy, and go by himſelf to the camp, promiſing, if it was not taken, to hold up a lighted torch, for a ſignal, and return immediately. Statilius got ſafe to the camp, and held up the torch, which gave Brutus ſome hopes of retrieving his affairs. He waited a long time for the return of Statilius, ſaying, " If " Statilius

" Statilius be alive, he will come back; " but he was ſlain on his return by the enemy. At length Brutus, tired with waiting, and day now beginning to dawn, whiſpered ſomething in the ear to one of his domeſtics, by name Clytus, who returned him no anſwer, but burſt into tears. Hereupon Brutus taking aſide Dardanus his armour-bearer, had ſome diſcourſe with him in private, and afterwards addreſſed himſelf to Volumnius in Greek, conjuring him, by their common ſtudies and antient friendſhip, to draw his ſword and put an end to his life. Volumnius, and after him ſeveral others, anſwered him only with their tears. One of them, to divert Brutus from the thoughts of laying violent hands on himſelf, ſtarting up, " There is no ſtaying here " any longer," ſaid he; " we muſt all fly. Yes, an- " ſwered Brutus, we muſt fly indeed, not with our feet, " but with our hands." Then taking each of them by the hand, told them with a cheerful countenance, " That it was " an infinite ſatisfaction to him to find, that none of his " friends had proved falſe to him; that he did not complain " of fortune for his own, but for his country's ſake? that " as for himſelf, he thought he was much more happy than " thoſe who had conquered, not only in regard of what " was paſſed, but even in his preſent condition, ſince he " ſhould enjoy that reputation, which always follows virtue, " and which tyranny and injuſtice could never deſerve" (Q). Having thus ſpoke, he beſeeched his friends to provide for their own ſafety, telling them, That he hoped Antony and Octavianus, ſatisfied with his death, would purſue their revenge no further. He then withdrew, with two or three only of his peculiar friends. Among theſe was an Epirote, by name Strato, with whom he had contracted an acquaintance when they ſtudied rhetorick together. To him Brutus had recourſe, conjuring him, by their antient friendſhip, to give him the laſt proof of his affection, by performing that

His laſt words to his friends.

(Q) Some writers tell us, that when Brutus in the morning ſaw no way of eſcaping, he cried out, " O unhappy virtue! I followed thee as a ſolid good, but thou art only a mere notion, a vain empty name, or at beſt a ſlave of fortune (49). But Volumnius, who was preſent, and from whoſe memoirs Plutarch copied the particulars of his death which we have related, makes no mention of ſuch a ſpeech, no-ways ſuitable to the character of Brutus.

that friendly office which the others had declined. As Strato could not by any means be prevailed upon to imbrue his hands in the blood of his friend, Brutus called one of his ſlaves; and then the faithful Epirote, crying out, "Forbid, ye gods, it ſhould ever be ſaid, that Brutus died "by the hand of a ſlave for want of a friend," covered his eyes with his left arm, and preſented the point of his ſword to Brutus, who threw himſelf upon it with ſuch violence, that it pierced him through, and he expired immediately [o]. Some hiſtorians relate the circumſtances of his death otherwiſe, and tell us, that taking his ſword by the hilt with both his hands, he fell upon the point of it, and ran himſelf through, without the aſſiſtance of his faithful friend Strato. But all authors agree in this, that Meſſala, having ſome time after made his peace with Cæſar Octavianus, preſented Strato to him, ſaying with tears in his eyes, "This, O Cæſar, is the man who paid the laſt friendly "office to my beloved Brutus."

The death of Brutus. Year of the flood 2962 Before Chriſt 37. Of Rome 711.

THUS fell Brutus in the forty-third year of his age (R), and with him fell the liberty of Rome and of the Roman people. He was a man, in whom the malice of his enemies could diſcern no fault (S); in whom the virtues of humanity

[o] Plut. ibid. Liv. l. cxxiv. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 74. Appian. l. iv. p. 665, 666.

(R) Brutus died, according to Velleius Paterculus, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his age; but to the authority of Velleius we prefer that of Cicero, who tells us, that Brutus was born ten years after Hortenſius appeared firſt at the bar; and that celebrated orator made his firſt public eſſay of eloquence in the conſulate of Lucius Craſſus and Quintus Scævola, in the year of Rome 658; ſo that Brutus was born in the year of the city 668, and conſequently was, at the time of his death, which happened in 711, in the forty-third year of his age (49).

(S) "Thoſe who were moſt his enemies," ſays Plutarch (50) "on account of his conſpiracy againſt Cæſar, if in that whole "affair there was any honourable and generous action done, refer "it wholly to Brutus, and lay whatever was barbarous and "cruel to the charge of Caſſius, Brutus's moſt intimate and familiar friend; but not at all like him in honeſty and virtue." Upon which words Madam Dacier comments thus: "It appears from this paſſage, that even in the days of Plutarch, "there ty were eminent; in whom the conſtant, firm, and inviolable attachment to the public good (T) which formed the principal and moſt diſtinguiſhable part of his character, and was the uninterrupted buſineſs of his life, ever in view, and ever purſued, proceeded from no other ſource, but the inherent

" there were ſome remaining, who hated the memory of Brutus, " for the ſhare he had in the murder of Cæſar; and I am of " opinion, that the ſame hatred continues, and will do ſo to the " end of the world." Among ſlaves, ſhe ought to have added, and perſons brought up in ſlaviſh principles, who are taught to look upon the diſarming of a tyrant, and the ſaving of their country from havock and oppreſſion, as an heinous crime; but the memory of that truly virtuous and generous patriot will be, to the end of the world, revered by all, who have any ſpark of zeal for the welfare of their country and the good of mankind.

(T) The public good was, as Plutarch obſerves, the only end and ſtandard, which he propoſed for his hatred and friendſhip. This of an enemy made him a friend to Pompey, and of a friend made him an enemy to Cæſar. When Cæſar and Pompey took up arms againſt each other it was generally believed that he would have taken Cæſar's ſide; for his father not long before had been put to death by Pompey: but he, thinking it his duty to prefer the intereſt of the public to his private reſentment, and judging Pompey's to be the better cauſe, took part with him, tho' formerly he uſed not ſo much as to ſalute him, or take any notice of him, deeming it a great crime to have the leaſt converſation with the murderer of his father. But afterwards looking upon him as the general of his country, he liſted himſelf under his command, and ſet ſail to Sicily, in quality of lieutenant to Seſtius, whom Pompey had appointed governor of that iſland; but finding no opportunity there of exerting his zeal for the good of his country, and hearing that Cæſar and Pompey were encamped near one another and would come to a battle, upon which the whole empire depended, he haſtened into Macedon to ſhare in the danger. Pompey was ſo ſurpriſed at his arrival, and at the ſame time ſo pleaſed, that riſing from his tribunal, in the ſight of all his guards, he ſaluted and embraced him, as one of the chiefeſt men of his party. Thus Brutus embraced the party even of his father's murderer, becauſe he thought it more juſt than that of Cæſar, and conſidered Pompey as the head of the ſtate, of which Cæſar was the declared enemy. The ſame conſideration of the public good, which reconciled him to Pompey, eſtranged him from Cæſar, notwithſtanding the innumerable favours he had received at his hands. And what can be more generous, more heroic, for a man, than to ſacrifice his higheſt obligations, as well as his greateſt injuries, to the welfare of his country?

inherent equity of his mind; for he was, as his hiſtorian well obſerves, by nature exactly framed for virtue (U), without one breach of that never to be omitted diſtinction of fas and nefas, right and wrong. And here it may not be altogether foreign to our purpoſe to illuſtrate this tranſcendent rectitude of his mind, by inſtancing his refuſal, contrary to the opinion of Cicero and his other friends, to employ the arts of oratory in gilding even the faireſt cauſe, when, after the death of Cæſar, he addreſſed himſelf to the Roman

man people. It cannot be ſuppoſed, that Brutus, who had long been famed for eloquence (W), could be ignorant of ſpeaking to the paſſions of men, an art too ſucceſsfully made

(W) Plutarch tells us in his life, that in Latin he was a good ſpeaker, and had, by conſtant exerciſe, attained a ſufficient excellence in making public orations and pleading cauſes; but in Greek he was remarkable for affecting the ſentiments and ſhort Laconic way of ſpeaking, eſpecially in his epiſtles, a collection of which has been publiſhed by Aldus in Greek, and by Ranutius Florentius in Latin. Plutarch inſtances three of them, the firſt whereof he wrote in the beginning of the war to the Pergamenſes, or inhabitants of Pergamus, thus: "I hear you have "given Dolabella money; if you gave it willingly, you muſt "own you have injured me; if unwillingly, ſhew it by giving wil-"lingly to me." The ſecond inſcribed in the Greek copy to the Bithynians, in the Latin to the Galatians, and in Plutarch to the Samians, is couched in the following terms: "Your "deliberations are tedious, your actions ſlow; what do you think "will be the end?" The third was to the Rhodians, thus: "The Xanthians, ſuſpecting my kindneſs, have made their coun-"try their grave of deſpair. The Patarenſes, who have ſubmit-"ted to me, have loſt nothing of their former liberty. It is "in your power to chuſe the opinions of the Patarenſes, or the "fortune of the Xanthians (53)." This epiſtle is likewiſe exhibited by Velleius Paterculus, but in a more diffuſed ſtyle (54). The ſpeech which Brutus made before Cæſar at Nice, the capital of Bithynia, in behalf of Deiotarus king of Galatia, is commended by Cicero (55), and the author of the dialogue on the Latin orators, which is commonly aſcribed to Tacitus. Tho' the king was charged with crimes of a high and dangerous nature, yet the eloquence of Brutus was ſo prevalent, that he preſerved to him great part of his kingdom. The liberty and vehemence with which he ſpoke on this occaſion, gave riſe to that memorable ſaying of Cæſar concerning him, as Cicero relates it in the firſt letter of his fourth book to Atticus: "De "quo quidem ille ad quem diverti, Cæſarem ſolitum dicere, "Magni refert hic quid velit, ſed quidquid volt, valde volt. "Idque eum animadvertiſſe cum pro Deiotaro Niceæ diceret, "valde eum vehementer & libere dicere." And truly the natural firmneſs of his mind, as his hiſtorian obſerves (56), when once ſet on foot by the motives of right reaſon, and the principles of honeſty, which way ſoever it turned itſelf, made uſe of by Antony on the ſame occaſion. Such then was the integrity of Brutus's mind, that he could not ſtoop to employ any indecent means even in the purſuit of virtue.

Brutus was, as we have obſerved above, a good orator; but, as he had made choice of the conciſe and grave ſtyle (57), he judged Cicero's eloquence to want ſtrength (58); and Cicero on the other hand thought his ſtyle negligent and unconnected (59). Brutus's ſtyle had another fault; it was often crouded with verſes. "Verſus hi fere excidunt," ſays Quintilian, "quos "Brutus ipſo componendi ductus ſtudio ſæpiſſime facit (60)." Cicero acknowledges, that Brutus very freely found fault with his taſte in point of ſtyle (61); but nevertheleſs that orator was highly pleaſed with the harangue which Brutus made on the death of Cæſar; "Eſt autem oratio," ſays he, ſpeaking of this piece, after he had peruſed it with great attention, "ſcripta elegantiſſime, ſententiis, verbis, ut nihil poſſit ul-"tra (62).

Brutus was not only a good orator, but an excellent philoſopher. Of all the ſects of the Greek philoſophers, there was not one of which he had not been a hearer, and in which he had not made ſome proficiency; but he chiefly eſteemed the Platoniſts, and applied himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the antient academy (63). He was likewiſe well acquainted with all the branches of polite literature, and wrote ſeveral books, viz. one de officiis, cited by Chariſius and Priſcian, without all doubt the ſame which Seneca calls περὶ καθήκοντος (64); another, de virtute mentioned by Cicero (65) and Seneca (66); and a third de patientia, quoted by Diomedes. He abridged the Roman hiſtory of Fannius (67), and that of Antipater (68); but whether he finiſhed the abridgment of Polybius's hiſtory, which he had undertaken, we know not; for Plutarch (69) only tells us, that the day before the great battle of Pharſalia, while the others were taken up with the thoughts of the next day's action, Brutus ſpent his whole time, till the evening, in writing that epitome. He likewiſe compoſed a panegyric on Cato, which Cæſar did not think extraordinary well penned (70).

virtue. The death of Cæsar was undoubtedly justifiable under the government which then prevailed in Rome (X), notwithstanding all the dirt that has been thrown at this transaction by the mean and grovelling abettors of arbitrary power. We may see what the Romans, and Tully, the least adventurous of men, thought of this action, by a passage in one of his letters to his friend Atticus, bemoaning the misfortunes of the times; where he says, "But notwithstanding the cloud that hangs over us, I con"sole

(X) By the laws of Rome, the dominion of one, and consequently the dominion of Cæsar, was tyranny; and any man was warranted to kill the tyrant: "eum jus fasque esset occidi, neve "ea cædes capitalis noxa haberetur." The only reason that can be alledged against killing Cæsar is, that the state was irretrieveable, and an usurper become a necessary evil. This argument Seneca urges against the enterprize of Brutus and his followers (71). But Brutus, Cicero, and the senate, that is, the greatest and wisest men in Rome, judged otherwise, and who was better quailified to judge? Nay, liberty was for some time actually restored; why it subsisted no longer, was owing to casualties, and to the treachery of Octavianus, who, after he was emperor, thought it possible to resettle the old free state, and proposed once or twice to resign. Drusus, his wife's son, was of the same opinion, and declared his resolution to effect it. Cæsar himself might, by his dictatorial power, have suppressed the insolence of particulars, revived the force of the laws, and reduced the commonwealth to her first principles. This would have been true glory, the only right use of his absolute power, and the only amends for having assumed it; but, instead of this, he continued more and more to debauch the people, and trample upon the most sacred laws of his country. Liberty and the republic were a jest to him; he treated the very name with contempt; "nihil esse rempublicam; appellationem modo sine cor-"pore ac specie (72). He ridiculed Sylla for resigning his usurped power; he had nothing in his head or heart but absolute rule, a diadem, the title of king, and controuling the world according to his lust; "nullos non honores ad libidinem cepit & "dedit, spreto patriæ more;" nay, he would have his very words to go for laws, "debere homines pro legibus habere quæ "dicat (73)." He was therefore lawfully slain, tho' not by the forms of law, which his usurped power had rendered impossible. "Abusus dominatione & jure cæsus existimaretur," says Suetonius (74).

Nor was the putting the deſtroyer of their conſtitution and liberties to death, by violent hands, without precedent in the Roman hiſtory (Y). And as to the method they made choice of, it appears adequate to the dignity of the action;

(Y) Nor in Brutus's family; for his mother Servilia was of the family of Servilius Ahala, who ſlew Spurius Manlius, as we have related elſewhere, for ſtirring the people up to a rebellion, and aſpiring at the ſovereign power. The famous dictator Quintus Cincinnatus, whoſe general of the horſe he was, commended the zeal of Servilius, and approved of the action (75). Whether Brutus was deſcended from the celebrated Junius Brutus, who expelled Tarquin the Proud, is uncertain. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus maintains, not out of any prejudice to Brutus, that he was not deſcended from him. This, ſays he, is the opinion of thoſe hiſtorians, who have examined the affairs of the Romans with the greateſt exactneſs (76). Dion poſitively affirms, that none of the race of Junius Brutus was left after the execution of his two ſons (77). On the other hand, Plutarch tells us, that Junius Brutus had a great many children by a ſiſter of the Vitellii (78); and adds, upon the authority of the philoſopher Poſidonius, that two indeed of Brutus's ſons, who had attained to man's eſtate, were, by their father's order, put to death; but that a third, yet an infant, was left alive, from whom the family was propagated down to Marcus Brutus. The ſame philoſopher writes, that in his time there were ſeveral famous perſons of the family of M. Brutus, and of his own acquaintance, who very much reſembled the ſtatue of Junius Brutus (79). Cicero likewiſe in his Philippics ſpeaks of our Brutus as deſcended from L. Brutus: " L. Brutus was the man," ſays he, " who both himſelf freed the commonwealth from the " ſovereignty of kings, and has now, almoſt five hundred years " after, propagated deſcendants, famed for the like virtue and " the like atchievement (80.)" And elſewhere (81); " If leaders " were wanting to free our country, I would ſtir up the Brutuſes, " who both daily behold the image of L. Brutus, and one of " them that of Ahala alſo. action; for who more proper to compass such an event, than a number of senators distinguished by their attachment to liberty? or what place could be more justly fixed on for the tyrant of Rome to expire in, than that dictatorial chair, which he possessed in violation of the laws of his country? We often see the love of one's country the bent and inclination of very different men, influenced either by passion, acrimony of temper, vanity, resentment, a lust of power, or any other inducement: nor were all those, who joined in that glorious cause, altogether free from such suspicions; for an uniform, steady, constant attachment to the public good was to be met with in Brutus alone. Men generally differ from themselves as much as from one another; Brutus was always the same. If we have dwelt too long in considering the virtues of this great man, the mighty excellence of his character and his inviolable attachment to the public cause may plead our excuse. We are not only indebted to history for the enlargement of our minds, but likewise for the improvement of our moral virtues; and to an Englishman, the foremost of the rank in the pursuit of liberty, who more properly can become the object of contemplation than Brutus, the genius of liberty.

The generosity of Antony, and cowardly spite of Octavianus.

LET us now return to the plains of Philippi. Antony, being informed the next day of the death of Brutus, flew to the place where the body still lay, beheld it with grief and tears, cast his purple mantle of a great value over it, and charged one of his freedmen to take care of the funeral of the illustrious deceased. Some time after, being told that the servant had not burnt the mantle with the corpse, and had detained part of the money which was to be expended in the funeral, he ordered him to be put to death. Octavianus, who had not greatness of soul enough for

" than of their own family, abroad rather than at home?" But after all, Cicero, who speaks here as an orator, and not as an historian, is not a proper evidence to invalidate the testimony of Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Dion. An orator little cares whether such facts be certain or not; it is enough for him, if the facts he relates be believed by the greater part of the people. Nothing can be with any certainty determined on this head; but, all things well considered, we are inclined to prefer the authority of Dion, and of Dionysius, a most accurate writer, to that of Cicero and Plutarch.

for ſuch generous humanity, could not forbear ſhewing a cowardly ſpite to the dead body of Brutus, before whom he had a little before fled for his life. He cauſed the head of that excellent perſon to be cut off, and charged one of his friends to carry it to Rome, and there lay it ignominiouſly at the feet of Cæſar's ſtatue [p]; but in the paſſage from Dyrrachium, a violent ſtorm ariſing, it was, probably out of ſuperſtition, thrown into the ſea [q]. The reſt of the body was burnt by Antony's orders, and the aſhes conveyed in an urn to Servilia, Brutus's mother. As for Porcia his wife, Valerius Maximus and Nicolaus, the Peripatetic philoſopher, tell us, that being reſolved not to outlive her huſband, but ſo narrowly watched by her friends, that ſhe could neither make uſe of poiſon or a dagger, ſhe ſnatched ſome burning coals out of the fire, and ſhutting them cloſe in her mouth, ſtifled herſelf, and expired in the arms of the women who watched her [r]. But we have a great deal of reaſon to look upon this account as fabulous, ſince Plutarch aſſures us [s], that, in his time, was ſtill extant a letter of Brutus to his friends, wherein he lamented the death of Porcia, and complained of them for ſuffering her to die of melancholy; ſo that the hiſtory of the live-coals, which has been the ſubject of a fine epigram [t], is no better than a fable.

The death of Porcia.

Many of Brutus's men ſubmit to the conquerors.

THE death of Brutus was no ſooner known in his camp, than thoſe who had retired thither, to the number of fourteen thouſand men, ſubmitted upon honourable terms to the two victorious generals. Others fled into the iſland of Thaſus, and from thence eſcaped into Aſia. Antony and Octavianus found in Brutus's camp great ſtore of arms and proviſions, and immenſe ſums of money, which enabled them to ſatisfy immediately ſome of their veterans, whom they diſbanded ſoon after the battle, being glad to get rid of men, who, proud of their victory, began to uſurp an authority even over their generals. By this famous overthrow the triumvirs eſtabliſhed, on the ruins of the republic, the authority they had uſurped, and became maſters of the whole Roman empire, Sicily alone excepted, which was ſtill held by Sextus, the ſon of Pompey the Great; but the oppoſition they met with from him was not very conſiderable, as we ſhall ſee in the following chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

The Hiſtory of Rome, from the death of Brutus and Caſſius to the perfect ſettling of the empire by Octavianus.

THE firſt days after the battle were ſpent by the triumvirs, in puniſhing ſuch of their enemies, as had the misfortune to fall into their hands. Antony, after having reproached Hortenſius with the death of his brother Caius, of whom we have ſpoken above, cauſed him to be ſlain on his tomb. He likewiſe put Varro, an illuſtrious ſenator, to death, who had on all occaſions betrayed an irreconcileable hatred to him, and could not forbear reproaching the triumvir, even when he was in his power, with his debauched and ſcandalous life, which, he ſaid, he would one day end with an unhappy and tragical death. Livius Druſus, the father of that Livia who was afterwards married to Auguſtus, not caring to outlive the liberty of his country, laid violent hands on himſelf in his tent. Quintilius Varus, after having adorned himſelf with all the enſigns of the honours and dignities he had borne, choſe rather to die by the hands of his freedmen, than to be expoſed to the inſults of a mercileſs enemy. Octavianus on this occaſion betrayed a cruelty unworthy of a Roman, which ſome of his flatterers endeavour to excuſe, by aſcribing it, not to the natural bent of his temper, but to the long and tedious indiſpoſition, which had ſoured his humour. However that be, it is certain, that he ſhewed as much cruelty and inſolence after the battle, as he wanted courage in it. We have ſeen above what cowardly ſpite he ſhewed to the body of his deceaſed enemy, which Antony treated with great reſpect and tenderneſs. The mean ſoul of Octavianus was not capable of ſuch generous humanity: he inſulted every illuſtrious captive with bitter words and outrageous invectives, putting them to death without mercy. To one, who earneſtly begged as a particular favour, that he would ſuffer his body to be buried after his death, he anſwered, "that the ravens would ſoon regulate that matter." When a father implored mercy for his ſon, and the ſon for the father, he commanded, with an exceſs of cruelty hardly to be met with in the hiſtory of the moſt barbarous nations, the father and ſon to fight for their lives; this barbarous fight he beheld, beheld unconcerned the ſon to ſtab his father, and then himſelf for having done it. Others tell us, that he obliged the father and ſon to draw lots for their lives, and that the father gave himſelf voluntarily up to execution to ſave his ſon, who, diſdaining to owe his life to the murderer of his father, ſtabbed himſelf in the preſence of the tyrant. Had not therefore the remaining priſoners reaſon, when they were brought before Antony and him, loaded with chains, to ſalute the former with the honourable title of imperator, and the latter with bitter invectives, curſes, and reproaches? Among theſe were the famous M. Favonius, who with the ſword at his throat reproached the mercileſs Octavianus, with all the freedom of a Cynic philoſopher [w] (Z).

The republican party ſtill powerful.

THE triumvirs, having thus glutted their revenge with the blood of many illuſtrious citizens, who on that fatal day fell into their hands, began now to deliberate about the proper meaſures for the eſtabliſhing of their authority, and the utter ſuppreſſion of thoſe who ſtill ſtood up in defence of their antient laws and liberties. For Pompey was ſtill in poſſeſſion of Sicily; Domitius Ahenobarbus and Statius Murcus, Brutus's admirals, commanded two powerful fleets, the former on the coaſts of Macedon, the latter in the Ionian ſea; Caſſius Parmenſis (A), one of the conſpirators, having been left in Aſia by Brutus and Caſſius, with

(Z) M. Favonius had been always very intimate with Brutus, but nevertheleſs by him left out of the conſpiracy for the following reaſon. As Brutus was diſcourſing one day with him and Statilius, who was by ſect an Epicurean, and propoſing ſome queſtions to be diſputed, with a deſign to diſcover their ſentiments, Favonius declared his judgment to be, that a civil war was worſe than the moſt unjuſt tyranny. Though he had no ſhare in the death of Cæſar, nor approved of the action, yet he joined Brutus, ſerved him with the utmoſt fidelity to the laſt, and died with a conſtancy worthy of a Roman ſenator and philoſopher (81).

with a conſiderable fleet and a competent number of forces, to keep the eaſtern provinces in awe, upon the news of Brutus's overthrow and death, reinforced his fleet with thirty Rhodian ſhips, which he manned with Romans, and being joined by Clodius, governor of Rhodes, at the head of three thouſand men, by Lepidus governor of Crete with the garriſon which Brutus had left there, by Clodius, Torulus, young Cicero, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who had fled into Aſia, he gave no ſmall umbrage to the triumvirs. In a private conference therefore between them, it was agreed, that Antony ſhould march into the eaſt and ſettle thoſe provinces, and that Octavianus ſhould lead the old troops into Italy, put them there in poſſeſſion of the lands which had been promiſed them, and to force young Pompey out of a retreat, which ſerved for an aſylum to all the zealous republicans. Before they parted they diſbanded all their veterans, except eight thouſand, after having ſatisfied them in part with the money they had left, and what they found in Brutus's camp. Of the remaining forces Octavianus took with him into Italy four legions and four thouſand under him at the battle of Actium. Upon his defeat he returned to Athens, where he was murdered by Octavianus's orders. He was a native of Parma, and thence called Parmenſis. As that city ſtood within the bounds of antient Hetruria, which extended, as Cluverius ſhews, to the banks of the Po, no wonder that Horace calls him an Hetruſcan (82). He was, in the opinion of that inimitable writer, a great verſifier, but no extraordinary poet. He left ſuch a vaſt heap of writings behind him, that it was pleaſantly ſaid he wanted no other materials for his funeral pile.

Quintilius Varus, by whom he was aſſaſſinated, is ſaid to have found a tragedy among his papers, intitled Thyeſtes, which he publiſhed as his own. It is at leaſt certain, that Quintilius, having put him to death, ſeized all his writings, among which were ſeveral tragedies, he having a particular talent at that ſort of compoſure. It was alſo agreed, that Octavianus ſhould yield two of his legions to his collegue, and receive two others in their ſtead belonging to Antony, which had been left in Italy under the command of Calenus, one of Antony's lieutenants [x]. Though the forty-three legions they had in the beginning of the war were by this time reduced to twenty-eight, yet they wanted vaſt ſums to pay five thouſand drachmas to each private man, and reward all the officers in proportion: this was the principal motive of Antony's expedition into Aſia, whither he carried with him for his guard four thouſand veterans, beſides the above-mentioned forces, who were prevailed upon, though the time of their ſervice was expired, to attend him in quality of volunteers, the like number remaining with Octavianus in the ſame quality and poſt [y].

Antony and Octavianus part.

AND now the two conquerors parted, Octavianus taking his rout towards Dyrrachium, in order to return to Italy, and Antony marching into Greece, with a deſign to paſs over from thence into Aſia. Octavianus arrived in a few days march at Dyrrachium, where we ſhall leave him for a while to follow Antony in his memorable, but to him fatal, expedition into the eaſt. After ſo remarkable a victory, which was entirely owing to him (for Octavianus was not preſent in the firſt engagement, and in the ſecond was driven out of the field by the brave Brutus), he muſt needs viſit Greece, as being the country where flattery was managed with moſt delicacy. There laying aſide all majeſty, he took pleaſure in aſſiſting, like a private citizen, at the diſputes of the philoſophers in the ſchools and academies of Athens, in ſeeing the public ſports, and frequenting the religious ceremonies of the Greeks. As he was fond of being ſtyled, "the Lover of "Greece," but above all, "the Lover of Athens," he adminiſtered juſtice there with a great deal of equity, and made very conſiderable preſents to the city, though he was himſelf in great want of money, his military cheſt being almoſt quite drained by the vaſt ſums he and his collegue had diſtributed among the veterans after the battle. Before he left Attica he cauſed an exact ſurvey to be made of the temple of Apollo Pythius, as if he deſigned to repair it; but he dropt that project on his arrival in Aſia, whither he marched with all his forces, leaving Lucius Cenſorinus, one of his lieutenants to govern govern Greece in his abſence. In Aſia all the kings and princes, who acknowledged the Roman power, came to make their court to him, many of them bringing with them their wives and daughters, to gain the triumvir's favour by their charms. The queens rivalled one another, who ſhould make him the moſt magnificent preſent, or appear moſt charming in his eyes. This croud of ſovereigns, who daily attended his levee and waited upon him where-ever he went, with their praiſes and ſubmiſſions, moſt agreeably ſoothed his ambitious and voluptuous temper; but nothing pleaſed him ſo much as the reception he met with at Epheſus. There the women went out to meet him in the habit they uſed to wear when they ſolemnized the feaſts of Bacchus, and the men and boys dreſt like ſatyrs and fauns. Nothing was to be ſeen throughout the town but ſpears wreathed with ivy, harps, flutes, and hautboys, while they ſtyled Antony in their ſongs, "Bacchus the Gracious and the Gentle;" and ſo indeed he was to ſome, but others he treated with great inhumanity. He pardoned all thoſe of Brutus's party, who ſurrendered themſelves to him, except Petronius, who was one of the conſpirators, and Quintus, who was charged with betraying Dolabella to Caſſius in Laodicea. But then he ſtript ſeveral rich citizens of their eſtates to gratify his flatterers and buffoons, who often begged and obtained the eſtates of men yet living and in perfect health, making Antony, to whom they alone had acceſs, believe they were dead. Thus one of his cooks having dreſſed him a ſupper to his taſte, begged and obtained as his reward the fine houſe of a wealthy citizen of Magneſia. But as the chief buſineſs, which had brought him into Aſia, was the raiſing of the neceſſary ſums for the ſatisfying of the victorious legions, he ſummoned the deputies of all the ſubjects and allies of Rome in thoſe parts to meet at Epheſus, and there, after having reproached them with aſſiſting Brutus and Caſſius, notwithſtanding the kindneſs Cæſar had ſhewn them, he acquainted them with the great promiſes he and his collegue had made to their twenty-eight conquering legions, amounting in all to an hundred and fifty thouſand men and upwards, and then concluded thus: "You "may judge of the ſums we want from the number of our "ſoldiers, and the promiſes we have made them. This has "obliged my collegue to go into Italy, where he has taken "upon him to reward them with lands and houſes, from "which he will be obliged to drive out the antient proprie-"tors. But as for you I will treat you with more humanity, "being unwilling to deprive you of your inheritances, or

His ſpeech to the deputies of the Aſiatic cities.

" drive you from the temples and ſepulchres of your forefa" thers. As you would needs run the fortune of our enemies " in war; now that the gods have been pleaſed to grant the " victory, not according to your wiſhes, but their own
" juſtice, we ought to treat you as the allies, or rather as " the accomplices of our foes, and inflict upon you ſome
" exemplary puniſhment. But, as the laws of humanity
" will not always allow the puniſhments to be proportionable
" to the crimes, inſtead of other penalties, we ſhall content
" ourſelves with a ſum of money, the ſame you gave our " enemies, ten years tribute: but as you paid it to them in " two years time, we require it in one. This is the only
" puniſhment we intend to inflict upon you, which we ſhould
" very readily forgive, were not our exigencies very preſſing."
At theſe words the deputies threw themſelves at Antony's feet, remonſtrating with tears in their eyes, that their aſſiſting Brutus and Caſſius could not be laid to their charge as a crime, ſince they had been forced to it by ſuch cruel uſage, as made them rather objects of pity than puniſhment; and that as to the ſums which were demanded of them, it was not in their power to raiſe them, ſince Brutus and Caſſius had ſtript them, not only of all their gold and ſilver in ſpecie, but likewiſe of their plate, the furniture of their houſes, and of all the ornaments of their cities and temples. As Antony continued inflexible, Hybreas, an orator and agent for ſome of the Aſiatic cities, riſing up, " ſince you are determined,
" ſaid he, to double our taxes, pray take care that our ſum-
" mers and autumns be doubled too; otherwiſe we ſhall
" never be able to ſatisfy your demands." This liberty of ſpeech did not diſpleaſe Antony (B), who, as Plutarch tells us,

(B) The ſame Hybreas ſome time after told Antony, when he required more money; " Aſia has already furniſhed two hundred
" thouſand talents for your ſervice; if the money did not come " to your hands, call thoſe to an account who levied it; but if " it did, and you have already ſpent that ſum, we are all undone."
Theſe words, ſays Plutarch, touched Antony to the quick; for many things were done in his name, of which he was quite ignorant; not that he was by nature eaſily impoſed upon, but becauſe he repoſed too great confidence in the integrity of thoſe he employed. He was naturally very ſincere, but ſomewhat ſlow of apprehenſion; but as ſoon as he was made ſenſible of his faults, he was much troubled, and ready to aſk pardon of thoſe he had offended. He loved raillery, but was as well contented to be handſomely rallied, as he was pleaſed to rally others. This free-us, was as well contented to be handſomely rallied, as he was delighted in rallying others. The deputies prevailed at length, but with much ado, upon the triumvir, to be contented with the tribute of nine years to be paid in two [z]: ſo that all the princes, kings, and free ſtates of Aſia, were obliged to lay heavy taxes on their ſubjects for the payment of this ſum, which reduced them, after the exorbitant taxes with which Caſſius had loaded them, almoſt to a ſtate of beggary [a]. After this, Antony took a progreſs through the provinces of Aſia, giving every-where extraordinary demonſtrations of generoſity and good-nature. He pardoned Lucius, brother to Caſſius, and ſeveral others of the adverſe party, who upon the fame of his clemency, flocked to him from all quarters: but he continued implacable to thoſe who had any hand in the death of Cæſar. The Xanthians he freed from all tribute, and perſuaded them to rebuild their city. To the Rhodians, whom Caſſius had treated with great ſeverity, he gave the iſlands of Andros, Tenos, Naxos, and Myndus. The inhabitants of Tarſus and Laodicea he likewiſe exempted from all taxes. Neither was he unmindful of the Athenians, to whom he granted the iſlands of Ægina, Teos, Cea, Sciathus, and Peparethus [b]: ſo that the whole weight of the exorbitant contributions, amounting to two hundred thouſand talents, fell upon the inhabitants of Aſia, properly ſo called, of Syria, Phrygia, Myſia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Paleſtine. As he wanted ready money to pay his ſoldiers, while the tax was raiſing, he ſent all his horſe to Palmyra or Tadmor to take the plunder of that rich city, inſtead of their pay; but the inhabitants, having timely notice of the deſign, removed before their arrival, their families and effects to the other ſide of the Euphrates; ſo that the triumvir's cavalry returned empty. On their retreat the Palmyrenians returned to their habitations, dom had, as Plutarch obſerves, it's inconvenience; for he imagined, that thoſe friends, who uſed ſo much liberty in their mirth, would never flatter or deceive him in any buſineſs of conſequence, not perceiving, that theſe ſubtle paraſites diſguiſed their flattery to make it go down the better. habitations, but, being exaſperated by this cruel uſage, put themſelves under the protection of the Parthians, which gave occaſion to the ſecond Parthian war[c].

He ſummons Cleopatra to give an account of her conduct.

ANTONY arriving in Cilicia, diſpatched from thence Dellius into Egypt, to ſummon Cleopatra to appear before him, and give him an account of her conduct during the war. For though ſhe had aſſiſted Dolabella, yet Serapion, her lieutenant in Cyprus, had joined Brutus and Caſſius, which the triumvirs had taken much amiſs, conſidering what ſhe owed to the memory of Cæſar. Dellius, who was ſent on this meſſage, was a famous hiſtorian and a man of great wit and learning, but of no principles, being one of thoſe who have always a baſe compliance for the inclinations of their maſters (C). As he was well acquainted with Antony's temper, after a ſhort converſation with the queen, he eaſily judged with what ſentiments a woman of her beauty, wit, addreſs, and ſprightly converſation would inſpire him; and therefore encouraged her to go in perſon into Cilicia, aſſuring her, that Antony, who was a brave and amorous ſoldier, would receive her with all the reſpect due to perſons of her high ſtation, extraordinary merit, and wonderful qualifications. She had great faith in the words of Dellius; but her chief dependence was in her own beauty; and indeed never had beauty been ſignalized by more illuſtrious conqueſts:

(C) Quintus Dellius wrote in Greek an account of Antony's unſucceſsful expedition againſt the Parthians, in which he attended him and had a chief command. He was one of Horace's moſt intimate friends, who addreſſed to him the third ode of his ſecond book, containing the ſoundeſt principles of the Epicurean philoſophy. He was a man of great wit and learning, but of a very bad character. Meſſala Corvinus uſed to call him deſultorem bellorum civilium, that is, the vaulter of the civil wars. For he left Dolabella to ſide with Caſſius, then quitted Caſſius to join Antony, and at laſt abandoned Antony to take party with Octavianus. During his ſtay at the court of Egypt, the fair queen captivated his heart, and is ſaid not to have been diſpleaſed with the addreſſes of a man of his fine genius. In the time of Seneca ſeveral letters of his to that queen were handed about, written with too much familiarity (85).

conqueſts: ſhe had captivated the heart of Julius Cæſar, of Pompey's eldeſt ſon, and formerly of Antony himſelf, when he ſerved under Gabinius, governor of Syria; and this when ſhe was young and ignorant in the arts of love; whereas ſhe was now to meet him in the flower of her age, with all the charms of beauty, and all the artifice of riper years. But what above all inſpired her with certain confidence of rekindling the flame in Antony's heart was, the quickneſs of her wit; for though there were ſome at Rome who rivalled her in beauty, none was to compare to her in the agreeableneſs of her converſation, and in a certain natural grace and ſweetneſs, which appeared in every thing ſhe ſaid or did, and made a deep impreſſion on all who heard her. In ſhort, the charms of her converſation were irreſiſtible, and the very tone of her voice ſo harmonious, that no inſtrument was capable of a greater variety of ſounds, and of equally ſoothing the ears of the hearers. Beſides, ſhe expreſſed herſelf with ſo much eaſe, and in ſo many different languages, that ſhe was looked upon by all as a prodigy. The moſt barbarous nations heard her with aſtoniſhment anſwer their embaſſadors without an interpreter. She underſtood, beſides many others, the Æthiopian, the Troglodite, the Hebrew, the Arabian, Syrian, Median, and Parthian tongues; which was the more wonderful in her, conſidering, that moſt of the kings, her predeceſſors, had not been able to learn the Egyptian tongue, and ſeveral of them had forgot the Macedonian, their original language [d]. The confidence ſhe placed in theſe extraordinary accompliſhments encouraged her more than the words of Dellius, or her own beauty, to appear before Antony. She made great preparations for her journey, taking with her vaſt ſums of money, and all the jewels, plate, and rich ornaments of the Egyptian kings. Many were the letters ſhe received from Antony, haſtening her coming; but ſhe ſeemed to make no account of his orders. At length ſhe ſet out, and arriving at the mouth of the river Cydnus, ſhe embarqued on a ſmall galley, and appeared before Antony at Tarſus in Cilicia, in the fantaſtical manner which we have deſcribed at length in our hiſtory of Egypt [e]. The triumvir was ſo taken with the charms of her perſon, the quickneſs of her wit, and the agreeableneſs of her converſation, that from the firſt day he conceived a paſſion for her, which occaſioned all the future misfortunes of his life. He was never after the ſame man, but wholly taken up with the thoughts of the beautiful Cleopatra, he neglected all other buſineſs, and followed her into Egypt, ſpending there the whole enſuing winter with her in a moſt ſcandalous converſation, well ſuited to his vicious temper, but highly unbecoming a man of his age and character [f].

And captivates Antony.

WHILE Antony was thus wallowing in pleaſures with his beloved Cleopatra in Egypt, his collegue was wholly taken up in ſettling the affairs of Italy, and dividing the promiſed lands among the veterans. Having imbarqued his troops at Dyrrachium, he croſſed the Adriatic gulf, without meeting with any of the enemy's fleets, and landed at Brunduſium; where he was taken ſo ill, that his phyſicians gave him over, and the news of his death was immediately ſpread all over Italy, and differently received according to the different inclinations of the people. Moſt of the ſenators looked upon this report as one of his uſual tricks to diſcover their intentions and real ſentiments; and therefore by a decree of the ſenate prayers and ſacrifices were offered up to the gods for his recovery, which ſoon followed by the favour of his native air and the vigor of his youth. As ſoon as he was in a condition to bear the fatigues of the journey he ſet out for Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations, eſpecially by the populace. Some time before his arrival the faſces had been transferred from Lepidus and L. Munatius Plancus to L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, and P. Servilius Vatia Iſauricus; but Fulvia, Antony's wife, a woman of a manly ſpirit and an unbounded ambition, had gained the aſcendant over the new conſuls, and governed Rome with an abſolute ſway. This Octavianus could not bear; and hence the mutual jealouſies and diſtruſts between her and the young triumvir, which at length kindled a war in the very bowels of Italy. Octavianus met with many, almoſt inſurmountable, difficulties in the diſtribution of the promiſed lands. As the public treaſury was quite exhauſted, he could not content the ſoldiery without giving up to them the ſeveral towns which he had promiſed them by way of reward after the victory; and this he was well appriſed would provoke the people. Moſt of the inhabitants of thoſe unhappy towns flocked daily in great multitudes to Rome: vaſt numbers of women with children children in their arms, whoſe tender years and innocence moved even the triumvir's friends to compaſſion, daily filled the temples and public places with their cries and lamentations. The people on this occaſion talked with a great deal of freedom and boldneſs; This war ſaid they, "has been undertaken not for the public good, but for the "private views of the triumvirs, who, ſince they have reap-"ed the advantage of it, ought to bear all the charges, "and not ſatisfy their ſoldiers at the expence of ſo many "diſtreſſed families." Octavianus heard and patiently bore theſe complaints, with a diſſimulation peculiar to himſelf. Unwilling to give occaſion to freſh diſturbances, he borrowed what money he could; but finding he could not raiſe the ſufficient ſums to ſatisfy his ſoldiers, he broke through all difficulties, and, purſuant to his firſt deſign, allotted them the lands for their inheritance which he had promiſed in the beginning of the war. Cremona a city greatly attached to the intereſt of Brutus, ſuffered moſt in this iniquitous diſtribution, and Mantua, which was but too near to a place abandoned to the mercy of the ungovernable ſoldiery, had more than her ſhare in theſe misfortunes, The prince of the Latin poets had like to have periſhed on this occaſion, by the hand of a centurion, named Arrius, who purſued him with his drawn ſword, for daring to diſpute with him the poſſeſſion of his ſmall eſtate on the banks of the Mincius; and would have deprived the world of the greateſt poet Italy ever produced, had he not happily eſcaped the fury of the enraged centurion by ſwimming croſs the river. This very adventure ſeems to have moſt of all contributed to the reputation and good fortune of that divine and inimitable writer; for it put him upon going to Rome, where his extraordinary talents being known to Mæcenas and Aſinius Pollio, he obtained by their intereſt the reſtitution of his farm, which is the ſubject of that excellent eclogue, the firſt of his Bucolics, he being then about twenty-eight years of age.

Octavianus meets with great difficulties in the diſtribution of the lands.

Octavianus himſelf was expoſed to great dangers in this extremely nice and difficult undertaking, the ſoldiery and people being equally exaſperated againſt him. Few of the veterans were ſatisfied with the portion of the lands allotted to them; Antony's ſoldiers taxed Octavianus with partiality, as if he aſſigned the beſt lands to his own men and the worſt to them. Fulvia did not fail to improve theſe diſcontents; and being ſeconded by the conſul Lucius, her brother-in-law, whom ſhe eaſily gained over to her intereſt,

ſhe left nothing unattempted to fire both the ſoldiers and people againſt one, who ſhe well ſaw, was engroſſing all the power to himſelf. And indeed ſhe was attended therein with good ſucceſs, as plainly appeared from the two following accidents. A private ſoldier having taken place among the knights at a public ſhew, Octavianus ordered an officer to drive him from thence; hereupon a report being ſpread, by the triumvir's enemies, that the ſoldier had been aſſaſſinated by his orders, as ſoon as the ſports were over, they all crouded round him, demanding with threatenings to ſee their comrade. Octavianus cauſed him immediately to be ſought for and brought before them; when the ſoldier declared, that he had not received the leaſt hurt or ill uſage: the mutinous troops were not eaſily prevailed upon to believe him, as if they had been incenſed againſt him for depriving them of ſo ſpecious a prence to murder their general. The other accident ſhews ſtill more plainly, to what a degree Fulvia and Lucius had eſtranged the minds of the ſoldiers from their general. He had appointed a day for his ſoldiers to meet in the field of Mars, in order to proceed to the diſtribution of the lands. The legionaries aſſembled accordingly, at the time agreed on, but Octavianus not coming as ſoon as they expected, they began to mutiny and ſpeak of their general with great diſreſpect; upon which Nonnius, one of the tribunes, ventured to remind them of their duty, and chide them for the indecency of their carriage. But the inſolent ſoldiery firſt rallied the zealous officer as a mercenary ſycophant, and then inſulted him in a moſt outrageous manner; inſomuch, that he was forced to ſave himſelf by flight from their fury, and throw himſelf, finding no other means to eſcape, into the Tiber, where he was drowned. The mutineers drew the body out of the river, and expoſed it on the way which led to the field of Mars, that Octavianus might ſee it, and learn what might be his own fate, if he provoked their reſentment. Octavianus, though acquainted with this diſorder, went, contrary to the advice of his friends, to the field of Mars, and only turning away his eyes from the dead body as he paſſed by it, appeared in the midſt of the aſſembly with an affected calmneſs and tranquillity. He artfully pretended to believe, that Nonnius had been killed in a quarrel by ſome private enemy, and, after having exhorted his ſoldiers not to carry their reſentment another time to ſuch extremities, without taking any further notice of ſuch a notorious breach of the military laws, he proceeded to the diſtribution of the lands, extending his liberality even to thoſe who

who had loſt their lives in the battle of Philippi, on whoſe wives and children he beſtowed that portion, which would have fallen to their lot. This falſe and iniquitous generoſity, for he gave nothing of his own, but only what he had with the utmoſt injuſtice taken from the lawful owners, had ſo good an effect on the minds of the undiſcerning multitude, that they demanded the authors of Nonnius's death might be brought to condign puniſhment. The crafty general anſwered, that they would be ſufficiently puniſhed by the reproaches of their own conſcience, and the remorſe which ever attends wicked actions [g].

He divorces Clodia the daughter of Fulvia.

OCTAVIANUS, having thus regained the affections of his ſoldiers, and being no longer able to bear the haughty and imperious behaviour of Fulvia, divorced her daughter Clodia, after having ſolemnly declared upon oath, that for him ſhe was ſtill a virgin. This was touching the proud Fulvia in the moſt ſenſible part: ſhe reſolved thenceforth to keep no meaſures with Octavianus, and accordingly began openly to encourage the veterans, who had ſerved under her huſband, to take arms againſt his ungrateful collegue, who, though he had no ways contributed to the victory, was now reaping all the advantage of it, with a view to engroſs the whole power to himſelf, and exclude Antony, to whoſe valour the victory was entirely owing, from any ſhare in the adminiſtration. She appeared in all the aſſemblies of the people with the children ſhe had by Antony, and there made bitter complaints of the cruel uſage ſhe pretended they had received from one, who ought, with all the tenderneſs of a father, to have protected them againſt the inſults of their enemies. Lucius, her brother-in-law, joined her, giving out every-where, that Octavianus had nothing elſe in view but to enſlave Italy, deprive his collegue of all power, and make both the ſenate and people of Rome ſubſervient to his will. He pretended to act by the direction of, and in concert with, his brother, whoſe chief and main concern, he ſaid, was to preſerve the republic from the tyranny of the proud, crafty, and ambitious Octavianus. This diſagreement between the young triumvir on one ſide, and Lucius and Fulvia on the other, gave riſe to two different factions, and rent the republic anew into parties. The veterans, who had ſerved under Antony, and ſuch of the Italians, as had been driven from their antient inheritances, ſided with Fulvia and Lucius. The friends of the late dictator, and thoſe legionaries, who were ſatisfied with the lands lands fallen to their ſhare, took party with Octavianus: ſo that all Italy was in a flame, and threatened with a new war ready to break out within the very walls of Rome, where horrible diſorders and cruel murders were daily committed, by the inſolent populace and ungovernable ſoldiery of the two oppoſite factions. To complete the misfortunes of Rome and Italy, a famine began to be felt all over the country, great part of the lands lying uncultivated ever ſince the beginning of the civil war, the ſeas being beſet with the enemy's fleets, and Sextus Pompeius holding Sicily, whence the continent, and eſpecially the capital, was ſupplied with corn. In this diſtreſs Octavianus would fain have made up matters with Fulvia in an amicable manner; but ſhe would hearken only to the dictates of her own reſentment and the inſinuations of Manius, her husband's agent, who aſſured her, that nothing but a war could force Antony from the arms of Cleopatra, and bring him into Italy. Fulvia followed the pernicious advice of Manius, and, abandoning Rome, retired to Prænefte, a city which had declared for her. There, forgetting her ſex, ſhe appeared with an helmet on her head and a ſword by her ſide, aſſembled ſome legions, harangued them, gave the parole, and performed all functions of a general. Octavianus, fearing young Pompey might take advantage of the miſunderſtanding between him and Fulvia, ſent a deputation to the camp of Prænefte, exhorting the female general and her brother-in-law, who, tho' conſul, ſerved in a manner as her ſubaltern, to lay aſide all animoſities, and act in concert againſt their common enemies. The deputies, who were all of the ſenatorial order and common friends to the triumvirs, would have prevailed on Lucius to hearken to an accommodation, had he not been diverted from it by the implacable Fulvia and by Manius, whom Antony had appointed to manage his affairs in Rome, during his abſence. He in a ſtudied ſpeech accuſed Octavianus of unfair dealing with reſpect to Antony, as if he deſigned to ingroſs the whole power of the triumvirate to himſelf, and reduce his collegue to the ſtate of a private man, tho' the victory they had gained in the plains of Philipi was entirely owing to his valour: "And what other view," ſaid he, "can the ambitious "youth have in rewarding, as he has done, with lands and "poſſeſſions thirty-four legions inſtead of twenty-eight? "His only aim is to form a ſtrong party for himſelf, at the "expence of innumerable unhappy wretches, who have "been driven from their inheritances to make room for his "private friends and partiſans, who had no ſhare in the late "war,

Both parties prepare for war.

OCTAVIANUS, upon the report of his deputies finding a war unavoidable, began to draw together his legions, as did likewise Lucius and Fulvia. In the mean time, several manifestos and declarations were published by the opposite parties, and some very sharp letters passed between Lucius and Octavianus. The latter, seeing many of the veterans take party with his enemies, dispatched an express to Salvidienus, whom he had appointed his lieutenant in Spain, ordering him to hasten into Italy with the six legions under his command. Salvidienus, who had not yet reached his province, immediately turned back, repassed the Alps, and advanced with incredible expedition into Cisalpine Gaul to join Octavianus, who had left the capital and was assembling his forces in that province. Caius Asinius Pollio and Publius Ventidius, two of Lucius's lieutenants, who were encamped at the foot of the Alps, followed Salvidienus, haraffing him on his march, and cutting off his convoys, by which means they reduced him to great streights. At the same time, Lucius, having assembled a considerable body of troops, advanced to meet Salvidienus and attack him in front, while his two lieutenants fell upon his rear. By this means, Octavianus's lieutenant must inevitably have been cut off with all his men, had not Vipsanius Agrippa with a choice body of veterans come seasonably to his relief, and, posting himself between him and Lucius, attacked the city of Sutrium. As the inhabitants of that place had signalized nalized their attachment to the intereſt of Lucius, he flew to their aſſiſtance, which gave Salvidienus an opportunity of joining Agrippa, and ſeizing with him, after he had taken Sutrium by aſſault, all the paſſes and defiles leading to the two camps of Pollio and Ventidius. Lucius, after having attempted in vain to open himſelf a way ſword in hand, reſolved to retire into the city of Peruſia, and wait there, as in a place of ſafety, for the arrival of his two lieutenants. But Agrippa and Salvidienus, following him cloſe, inveſted the place, before he had time to reflect on the danger, to which he expoſed himſelf and his troops. Octavianus was no ſooner informed of the bad ſituation of Lucius, than he flew to Peruſia, and in concert with his two lieutenants carried on the ſiege with great vigor; but as he found it impoſſible to take by aſſault ſo ſtrong a place, garriſoned by a whole army, he reſolved to reduce it by famine; and with this view ſurrounded it with a line of circumvallation fifty-ſix furlongs in compaſs. From his camp he drew lines quite to the Tiber, which he ſtrengthened with ramparts, and flanked with towers at equal diſtances, that is, about ſixty foot from one another. Theſe towers he filled with archers, ſlingers, and all ſorts of engines to prevent the enemy from receiving any convoys by water. Lucius on his ſide was continually haraſſing the workmen and the legions that covered them with briſk ſallies, in which his men, who were for the moſt part gladiators, had all the advantage. In one of theſe ſallies Octavianus himſelf narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands. In the mean time, Fulvia detached from her camp at Præneſte L. Munatius Plancus with a numerous body of choſen troops, ordering him to join Ventidius and Pollio, and with their united forces oblige the enemy either to venture a battle, or raiſe the ſiege. Plancus, in ſpite of Agrippa and Salvidienus, whom Octavianus detached againſt him, joined Ventidius and Pollio, and together with them advanced as far as Fulginium, within an hundred and ſixty furlongs of Peruſia. Lucius was overjoyed at their approach, which they took care to ſignify to him by fires in the night and other ſignals. He did not in the leaſt doubt, but they would exert their utmoſt endeavours, and make ſome great puſh for his relief. And ſuch indeed was their deſign; but Plancus, after having viewed the advantageous ſituation of the enemy, declared, that they could not attempt the relief of the place without expoſing their troops, for which they were reſponſible to Antony, to the greateſt dangers. His opinion prevailed vailed, and as none of them approved of Lucius's conduct, who had thus raſhly engaged in a war without his brother's knowledge, they retired, leaving their general and his troops in the utmoſt deſpair. As the beſieged were already reduced to the greateſt extremity for want of proviſions, they made a deſperate ſally, but were driven back into the city, after having fought with unparallelled bravery from nine at night till the next morning. Lucius, being determined to hold out to the laſt, took an inventory of all the proviſions in the place, which he daily meaſured out ſparingly to the ſoldiers and inhabitants of free condition, but allowed none to the ſlaves and ſervants of the army, though he kept them at the ſame time within the city, and had them narrowly watched, leſt they ſhould acquaint the enemy with the miſerable condition to which the garriſon was reduced. This was ſentencing an infinite number of innocent men to a moſt cruel death; a piece of inhumanity hardly to be matched in hiſtory! The unhappy wretches, reduced to this deſperate condition, wandered about the works in queſt of herbs, graſs, and roots, ſome of them even feeding upon their own ordure and the fleſh of their dead companions. At length the ſoldiers themſelves, no longer able to bear the famine, with which they were daily more and more pinched, begged leave of Lucius to make a general ſally, chuſing rather to die, like brave men, ſword in hand, than to live under the miſeries they endured. The general approved of their choice; telling them, that they had nothing to depend upon but their own valour, and that in their preſent circumſtances they muſt either conquer or die. They reſolved therefore to make a deſperate puſh, and ſally out by break of day, to avoid the diſorders that might happen in the dark. Accordingly, having firſt provided a great number of ſpades, hooks, ſcaling ladders, and all ſorts of neceſſary tools to break down the wall, with which Octavianus had incloſed the city, as ſoon as day began to appear, they ruſhed out like famiſhed tygers, cut in pieces the enemy's advanced guards, filled the ditch in an inſtant, plucked up the paliſades, and began to undermine the wall, while the rolling towers, which they had prepared for that purpoſe, and filled with archers and dart-men, diſcharged ſhowers of darts and arrows upon the enemy. The ground was immediately covered with dead bodies, and nothing was heard but groans and cries of dying men. Octavianus's ſoldiers made a dreadful havock of the aggreſſors, their machines playing inceſſantly upon them from the ramparts, and overwhelming them with ſhowers of arrows, darts, ſtones, &c. But though many of them fell, the reſt, not ſo much afraid of death as of famine, continued fighting with an amazing reſolution, and climbing up the wall, in ſpite of all oppoſition, drove the enemy from their poſts. The diſpute continued many hours with an obſtinacy and fury hardly to be expreſſed, and Lucius's men, though they fought with all the diſadvantage imaginable, would have gained a complete victory, had the forces been equal; but Octavianus's troops being far more numerous, and conſtantly relieved with freſh ſupplies, the beſieged, weakened with hunger, overpowered with numbers, and quite ſpent with the length of the combat, were in the end driven from off the wall. Theſe gallant men, though ſtunned with their fall, ſtill ſtrove to climb up again, encouraging with their words and geſtures their companions, who had not yet given ground. At length Lucius, ſurpriſed at ſuch extraordinary valour and fidelity, and knowing that their courage only ſerved to deſtroy them, commanded a retreat to be ſounded. Hereupon Octavianus's men gave loud ſhouts of joy, ſtriking, according to the cuſtom of the Romans, when they had gained a victory, their ſwords againſt their bucklers. This thoſe brave men looked upon as an inſult, and therefore getting together the few ladders that remained, they returned to the charge with new fury; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty, and not without tears, that Lucius prevailed upon them to retreat. Octavianus that night doubled his guards, and diſpoſed ſeveral bodies of troops on the ramparts in ſuch a manner, that they could eaſily relieve each other in caſe of a ſudden attack, which he apprehended [i].

Their gallant behaviour.

Lucius reſolves to capitulate.

LUCIUS, finding himſelf reduced to the utmoſt extremity without any hopes of relief, reſolved at length to capitulate, and by that means ſave the lives of ſo many brave men. Accordingly he diſpatched three of the chief officers of his army to treat with Octavianus in his name. The crafty general received the deputies in a very polite and obliging manner, and returned this anſwer to their propoſals, that he willingly pardoned all thoſe who had ſerved under Antony againſt the murderers of his father; but as for the others, he inſiſted upon their ſurrendering at diſcretion. Thus he ſpoke to the deputies in common, but afterwards afterwards taking Furnius, one of them, aſide, he told him, that he intended to extend his mercy to the whole army, a few only excepted, who out of hatred to him had been the occaſion of all theſe diſorders. Upon the report of the deputies many illuſtrious Romans, who had been always declared enemies to the triumvirate, fearing to fall into the hands of Octavianus, with whoſe cruel and inhuman temper they were well acquainted, exhorted Lucius to inſiſt on the ſafety of all, and not to ſurrender upon any other terms. Lucius touched with compaſſion for ſo many brave men, whom he well knew Octavianus, if it were left to him, would ſacrifice to his revenge, reſolved to go out in perſon, and putting himſelf into the young conqueror's hands, intercede for his unhappy followers. Octavianus received him with great marks of eſteem and affection, and promiſed, out of the regard he owed to him and his brother, impunity to all who had taken part with him, on condition they ſurrendered without further reſiſtance, and put him in poſſeſſion of the city. Lucius, depending on Octavianus's promiſe, ordered his men to march out the next day, and acknowledge the young conqueror for their general; which they did accordingly, and were incorporated into his troops. As for the inhabitants of Peruſia, who had ſhewn an inviolable attachment to Lucius, he ordered thoſe who compoſed the ſenate or council of the city, to be brought before him in chains, and ſentenced them all to die, contrary to the articles of agreement and the promiſe he had made. Some of thoſe unhappy men pleaded innocence, others begged mercy; but they had all one and the ſame anſwer, "Moriendum eſt, You muſt all die." Accordingly, they were, to the number of three hundred, by his orders carried in chains to an altar raiſed to Julius Cæſar, and there inhumanly butchered, as victims to his manes, on the ides of March, the anniverſary of his death. With them were ſacrificed by the barbarous tyrant, Caius Flavius, Clodius Bithynicus, and Canutius, three illuſtrious ſenators of Rome, and zealous defenders of their antient liberties. The city itſelf he delivered up to the luſt and plunder of his ſoldiers; but one Ceſtius, ſurnamed Macedonicus from his having ſerved a long time in Macedon, not caring to out-live the ruin of his country and the miſeries of his fellow-citizens, by ſetting fire to his own houſe, occaſioned the total deſtruction of that antient and once powerful city. For, an high wind ariſing, the flames ſpread from houſe to houſe, and burnt with ſuch violence, that in a very ſhort time the whole city was laid in aſhes. Such was the end of this unhappy war, commonly called "the war of Pe-"rusia." As for Pollio, Ventidius, Plancus, and the other commanders of Antony, tho' they had ſtill thirteen legions and fifteen hundred horſe, they all withdrew, and took refuge in the maritime cities, waiting there for ſuccours from Antony; but Octavianus purſuing them, Aſinius Pollio went on board the fleet commanded by Domitius Ahenobarbus, Brutus's admiral, carrying with him ſeven legions. Plancus, being purſued cloſe by Agrippa, abandoned the two legions he commanded, and went to join Fulvia at Prænesſte. The legions went over to Agrippa, but Plancus together with Fulvia fled from Prænesſte to Puteoli, and from thence to Brunduſium, where they both embarqued and paſſed over into Macedon. The other commanders made their eſcape into Sicily, where they were kindly received by Sextus Pompeius, who, had he not been of a ſlothful and indolent temper, might have improved theſe diviſions to his advantage, and with great eaſe made himſelf maſter of all Italy. For Statius Murcus, falling out with Domitius Ahenobarbus, the other republican admiral, had joined him with two complete legions and twenty-four ſhips, carrying with him immenſe ſums, which he had extorted from the maritime cities of Aſia. Beſides, he had received a ſtrong reinforcement from Cephalenia, conſiſting of veterans who had eſcaped from the battle of Philippi. But the indolent Pompey, though in condition to invade Italy and cruſh the party of the triumvirs there, contented himſelf with ravaging the coaſts, acting therein more like a pirate than a general[k].

Tiberius Claudius Nero maintains the party of Lucius in Campania.

AND now the other officers, who had ſerved under Lucius, being driven with their forces out of Italy, Tiberius Claudius Nero, at the head of a few veterans and a great number of ſlaves, whom he had drawn together by promiſing them their liberty, undertook to maintain the intereſt, and ſupport the ruined party, of Lucius in the neighbourhood of Naples. Tiberius was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome, and had been honoured with great employments by Julius Cæſar, who had a particular eſteem for him. He had been his queſtor, and commanded his fleet in the war of Alexandria, when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions in a very eminent manner. He was afterwards created prætor,

prætor, and raiſed to the high ſtation of pontifex maximus. But notwithſtanding all the favours he had received at Cæſar's hands, after his death he was not only for granting a general pardon to the conſpirators, but exhorted the conſuls to reward them, as the deliverers of their country and the avengers of their oppreſſed liberty. He had by a timely flight avoided the fury of the proſcription, and, ſiding with Lucius at the beginning of this war, had ſhut himſelf up with him in the city of Peruſia, whence he found means to make his eſcape into Campania, where he raiſed the army we mentioned above. But his raw and undiſciplined troops being frightened at the approach of Octavianus's victorious army, they immediately diſperſed, abandoning their general to the mercy of his cruel and implacable enemy. Tiberius, thus deſerted by his forces, fled in diſguiſe with his wife Livia and his ſon Tiberius, not yet two years old, to the ſea-ſide, hoping he ſhould find there ſome veſſel to convey him over to Sicily. Livia was the daughter of Livius Druſus Claudianus, who was killed in the battle of Philippi, fighting for Brutus and Caſſius. Livius was deſcended from the Claudian family, whence he had the name of Claudianus; but his branch had been long ſince adopted into the Livian family. The only perſon of diſtinction, who followed Tiberius and Livia in their flight, was Caius Velleius, the grand-father of the famous hiſtorian Velleius Paterculus, who had ſerved with great reputation in the armies of Pompey and Brutus. But his great age and infirmities not ſuffering him to attend them over into Sicily, partly out of grief in parting with them, and partly through fear of falling into the hands of the mercileſs Octavianus, he put an end to his life with his own ſword, and by that means prevented the vengeance of the bloody tyrant. As for Tiberius and Livia, Octavianus purſued them cloſe; but they, after having eſcaped a thouſand dangers, attended only by one domeſtic, found a ſmall boat, which conveyed them over into Sicily. And here we cannot help reflecting with Velleius Paterculus on the ſtrange turns of fortune, which ought to teach us, that as to future events our fears are often as groundleſs as our hopes. Livia was flying from an enemy, whoſe affections ſhe was one day to gain and maintain to the hour of his death; and the infant ſhe carried in her arms was to ſucceed Octavianus, and after him rule the Roman empire with an abſolute ſway. Tiberius's troops being diſperſed, and he fled, Octavianus returned to Rome, which he entered in triumphant robes, and crowned with laurel. Public feaſts were celebrated for ſeveral days together, and it was enacted by a decree of the ſenate and people, that "whenever any "general ſhould for the future merit a triumph, Octavianus "ſhould have a ſhare in his honour[1]."

WHILE Cæſar Octavianus was making war in Italy with Lucius, and ſettling his affairs there with all the ſkill and addreſs of an able politician, Antony was paſſing his time inglorioufly at Alexandria, thinking of nothing but the enjoyment of thoſe pleaſures and diverſions with which the queen entertained him, every day heightening the reliſh of them by the charms of novelty (D). But, in the mean time, all Syria and Paleſtine

(D) The poets have not given to Omphale, queen of Lydia, a greater aſcendant over Hercules, than hiſtory gives to the fair Egyptian queen over Antony. Like a ſecond Hercules, from the rough ſoldier and formidable conqueror, he became the ſlave of a bewitching woman, and the laughing-ſtock, not of Egypt only, but of all the nations who had any knowledge of the Roman name. Out of complaiſance to his admired idol, he exchanged the Roman for the Greek dreſs, piquing himſelf upon appearing among the effeminate Aſiatics, who compoſed the queen's court, as one of them. Laying aſide all other buſineſs, he was ſolely intent on pleaſing and diverting Cleopatra, who never left him night nor day: ſhe played at dice with him, drank with him, hunted with him, and when he thought fit to exerciſe the few troops he had with him, which he did more for her diverſion than their improvement, ſhe was always by him. Nothing was talked of at court but feaſts, ſhews, revels, &c. Mirth, jollity and pleaſures had baniſhed all buſineſs, all ſerious thoughts. They gave their way of living a particular name, calling it the inimitable life. They treated one another by turns, on which occaſion their expences were beyond all meaſure. Plutarch gives us two inſtances of Antony's extravagance, which he learnt of his grandfather Lamprias, who had them from one Philotas, a phyſician of Amphyſſa. Philotas, being acquainted with one of Antony's cooks, was invited by him to ſee what ſumptuous preparations he was making for ſupper. Coming into the kitchen, he was ſurpriſed at the prodigious variety of the moſt ſcarce and expenſive things; but nothing ſtruck him ſo much as the ſight of eight wild boars roaſting entire; "Surely" ſaid he, "You have a "great number of gueſts:" but the cook, laughing at his ſimplicity, "There are not above twelve gueſts," replied he; "but "every diſh muſt be ſerved up juſt roaſted to a turn, and if any "thing is but one minute ill-timed, it is ſpoilt: for," added he, "may be Antony will ſup juſt now, may be not this hour, may "be

Paleſtine being grievouſly oppreſſed with the taxes that were impoſed upon them, the Aradians killed thoſe who were ſent to gather them; and, thereupon, joining the Palmyrenians and ſeveral petty princes of Syria, called in the Parthians, which put the whole country into the utmoſt confuſion. For the Parthians on this invitation paſſing the Euprates under the command of Pacorus, their king's ſon, and Labienus a Roman general

" be not theſe two hours, becauſe he may perhaps have a mind to " ſpend ſome time in drinking or talking; ſo that not one but " many ſuppers muſt be had in readineſs, it not being eaſy to gueſs " at his hour." The ſame Philotas related, that being afterwards in the ſervice of Antony's eldeſt ſon by Fulvia, and admitted with other domeſtics of a better rank to his table, when the young man did not dine with his father, it happened, that another phyſician, full of argument and noiſe, diſturbed and tired the company with the impertinence of his talk. Philotas, no longer able to bear the empiric, put this ſophiſtical ſyllogiſm to him: " There is ſome kind of fever, wherein cold water is " good; every one who has a fever has ſome kind of fever; " therefore cold water is good for all thoſe who have fevers. This ſophiſm quite ſilenced the quack; at which young Antony was ſo pleaſed, that addreſſing himſelf to Philotas, and pointing to a ſide-board covered with rich plate, " Philotas," ſaid he, " all that is yours." Philotas thanked him for his good-will, but could not conceive that the young man had a power of diſpoſing of things to that value. He therefore went home without ſo much as thinking of the preſent. But he was very much ſurpriſed, when ſoon after his departure he ſaw all the plate brought home to his houſe by ſlaves followed by an officer of young Antony, who deſired him to put his mark upon them. Philotas excuſed himſelf, fearing to accept from a young man a preſent of ſo great a value. But the officer, who brought it, " What " ails the man?" ſaid he, " dont you know that he, who " makes you this preſent, is Antony's ſon, who could very well " ſpare it, were it all gold? But if you will be adviſed by me, " I would counſel you to accept of the value in money; for a- " mong the plate there may be ſome pieces of antiquity, or the " work of ſome famous maſter, for which Antony may have a " particular eſteem.

But to return to Cleopatra; ſhe was daily contriving new diverſions for Antony's entertainment; and the moſt inconſiderable trifles, when managed by her, received ſuch an air as made them agreeable diverſions. They often rambled about the ſtreets in the night, hand in hand, Cleopatra dreſſed like an ordinary woman, and Antony like a ſlave, and in that diſguiſe entering the public houſes mixed with the mob. Cleopatra took great delight in theſe general (E), overcame in a pitched battle Saxa, Antony's lieutenant in Syria, and forced him to take refuge in Cilicia. After this victory the two generals divided their army: Labienus with one part of it purſued Saxa into Cicilia, where he ſlew him, defeated his army, over-ran all Aſia-Minor, and, forcing Antony's lieutenants to make their eſcape into the iſlands, brought all places under him as far as the Helleſpont and the Ægean ſea. At the ſame time, Pacorus, with the other part of the army, reduced all Syria and Phænice as far as Tyre, which city alone held out againſt him, the remains of the Roman forces in that country having got thither before him [1]. An account of theſe ſucceſſes was brought to Antony at Alexandria, and at the ſame time news of the ill ſtate of his affairs in Italy, and of the unſucceſsful war which his brother Lucius had waged there with Octavianus. Hereupon recovering, theſe expeditions, as they gave her room to diſplay her wit and humour in retorting the coarſe raillery of the vulgar, and relating her adventures, which ſhe did with an unparallelled grace. They frequently met with rough treatment, and ſometimes with blows. This kind of behaviour, highly unbecoming a queen and a Roman magiſtrate, a general and a conqueror who was at this time forty and upwards, ſeemed very ſtrange to the graver and better ſort of people; but the populace were highly pleaſed with their frolics, ſaying of Antony, that they had great obligations to him, for ſhewing them his comical countenance, and reſerving his tragical one for the Romans. Of Antony's other follies, eſpecially of the pleaſant adventure that happened to him, while he was angling with Cleopatra, we have ſpoke in our hiſtory of Egypt (86).

(E) This Labienus was the ſon of Titus Labienus, who had been Cæſar's lieutenant in Gaul, and one of his moſt intimate friends; but afterwards going over to Pompey, he became one of his moſt inveterate enemies, and was ſlain fighting againſt him in the battle of Munda (87). His ſon, purſuing the ſame intereſt, was ſent by Brutus and Caſſius, a little before the battle of Philippi, in quality of embaſſador to the Parthian king to ſolicit his aſſiſtance for that war; and was at the Parthian court, when the battle happened; by the ill ſucceſs of which being diſcouraged from returning, he continued in that country, and having prevailed with king Orodes to undertake this war, he was ſent with Pacorus, the king's ſon, to command under him (88).

ing, as it were, from a drunken fit, he reſolved at length to leave Cleopatra, and march forthwith againſt the Parthians. With this view, having got together two hundred ſhips, he ſailed to Tyre; but finding, on his putting in there, all the country round in the hands of the enemy, and receiving at the ſame time moſt lamentable letters from Fulvia, he changed his mind, and reſolved to poſtpone the war with the Parthians, and ſail directly to Italy. Accordingly, he left Tyre, after having reinforced the garriſon of that place; and, ſailing by the iſlands of Cyprus and Rhodes, arrived at Athens, where he met Fulvia, whom he highly blamed as the chief cauſe of the late diſorders. In this city he received certain advice, that Octavianus had made himſelf maſter of Tranſalpine Gaul, and forced the ſon of Calenus after the death of his father to deliver up to him eleven legions, which he commanded in that province. As Tranſalpine Gaul had been, by a private agreement between the two triumvirs after the battle of Philippi, yielded to Antony, he looked upon ſuch a proceeding as an open declaration of war; and therefore putting to ſea without loſs of time, ſet ſail for Italy, without ſhewing the leaſt concern for Fulvia, whom he left ſick at Sicyon. This neglect and ſcorn completed what his infidelity had begun; for ſhe died in that city ſoon after her huſband's departure. Antony in croſſing the Ionian ſea was met by Domitius Ahenobarbus, the republican admiral, who, inſtead of oppoſing him, came on board his galley, and delivered up to him the command of his fleet, being induced thereunto by Aſinius Pollio, who had fled from Italy, as we have related above, after the ſurrender of Peruſia, and taken refuge on board Domitius's fleet (F). The two fleets thus joined came to

The death of Fulvia.

(F) Appian tells us, that Antony, meeting Domitius in the Ionian ſea, drew up his fleet in line of battle, and advanced in perſon againſt him with five galleys only. Plancus, who was then with Antony, did not approve of his conduct, telling him, that Domitius, who had a fleet much more powerful than his, would neither ſubmit, nor ever be reconciled, to him. Antony, without hearkening to his reaſons, advanced boldly, and, as he drew near, one of his guards, who ſtood on the prow of his galley, cried out to Domitius to ſtrike his flag to the triumvir, who was of an higher rank than he. At theſe words the republican admiral, as if he had been thunder-ſtruck, ſubmitted to the ſummons, ſaluted Antony as his general, and, coming on board his galley, delivered up to him the command of his fleet. This event is thus related by Appian, but we have choſe to follow Velleius, who tells us with more appearance of truth, that Pollio had before-hand engaged to an anchor on the coaſt of Epirus, and from thence ſet ſail for Brunduſium. In this city Octavianus had five legions, which ſhut the gates againſt Antony, refuſing admittance, not to him, they ſaid, but to Domitius, who was Octavianus's declared enemy. Upon this refuſal Antony immediately blocked up the place, and at the ſame time diſpatched one of his officers to Pompey in Sicily, inviting that general to join intereſt with him againſt Octavianus and invade Italy. Pompey came readily into the propoſal, made a deſcent, and took ſeveral cities on the coaſt, while Antony purſued the ſiege of Brunduſium with great vigor. Hereupon Octavianus, having drawn together his legions, and detached Agrippa with a conſiderable body againſt Pompey, marched with the reſt to the relief of the beſieged city. But his veterans refuſing to draw their ſwords againſt Antony, he was obliged to hearken to an accommodation, which at length was brought about by the interpoſition and management of Cocceius, Pollio, and the famous Mecænas (G). This dangerous breach be-

Domitius to take party with Antony, by which ſignal piece of ſervice he acquitted himſelf of the many obligations he owed him. To perpetuate the memory of this remarkable event, Antony cauſed a medal to be ſtruck, or rather a piece of money to be coined, which is ſtill to be ſeen, with the triumvir's head, and on the reverſe the prow of a ſhip with the names of the two generals.

(G) Caius Cilnius Mecænas, well known from the verſes of Virgil and Horace, was deſcended from the antient kings of Hetruria, but contented himſelf with the degree of a Roman knight. The Cilnian family was, according to Livy (89), one of the moſt illuſtrious of Hetruria. As for the ſurname of Mecænas, it was probably borrowed from ſome place belonging to the family; at leaſt Varro tells us, that all the latin names ending in as, denote ſome place. Pliny ſpeaks of the wines of Mecænatium, and ranks them among the beſt of Italy: "Cæſenatia vina," ſays he, "& Mecænatia "(90)." This illuſtrious Roman was a man of great politeneſs and generoſity, which towards men of letters knew no bounds, whence thoſe, who ever ſince his time have ſet up for encouragers of learning, have in all ages been honoured with his name. "Sint "Mecænates, non deerunt, Flacce, Marones," ſays Martial. But Mecænas was not only a generous patron to the learned; he was himſelf thoroughly acquainted with all the branches of polite literature, and would have proved an excellent orator, had he not been given too much to his pleaſures. "Ingenioſus vir ille fuit, ſays Seneca of him (91), "magnum exemplum Romanæ eloquentiæ "daturus, ing made up, and all paſt offences and affronts mutually forgiven, the ſoldiers of the two armies, to make the friendſhip of their generals more laſting, deſired it might be cemented with the ties of blood, and propoſed a match between Antony and Octavianus's ſiſter Octavia, who was lately become a widow by the death of Marcellus. Octavianus had a great veneration and tenderneſs for his ſiſter; and to do her juſtice, none of her ſex ever had a better claim to the eſteem and veneration of mankind. For though ſhe excelled all the women of her age, Cleopatra herſelf not excepted, in beauty, yet the charms of her perſon were far inferior to thoſe of her mind. Though the queen of Egypt had ſo large a ſhare in Antony's heart, yet the match was no ſooner propoſed to him, than he agreed to it with inexpreſſible ſatisfaction, at leaſt in appearance. After this the two triumvirs had an interview, in which, after mutual embraces and promiſes of laſting friendſhip, they came to a new partition of the Roman empire; by virtue whereof Codropolis (H), a town of Illyricum, was to

" daturus, niſi illum enervaſſet felicitas, imo caſtraſſet :" and elſewhere (92), " Habuit Mecænas grande & virile ingenium, niſi ipſe " illud diſcinxiſſet." After the battle of Philippi he interceded with Octavianus in favour of Horace, and obtained his pardon, though he had ſerved under Brutus in quality of legionary tribune. He protected Virgil, and by his intereſt got his farm reſtored to him, which Octavianus's ſoldiers had ſeized. He was one of Auguſtus's chief favourites, and ſerved him to the laſt with the utmoſt fidelity. He was a man of great penetration and addreſs in managing the moſt difficult affairs; but liked his pleaſures too much to engage in buſineſs, when he could decline it without diſguſting his maſter, the gaining of whoſe favour was the height of his ambition. Several writers, eſpecially Juvenal and Seneca, reproach him, and not undeſervedly, with luxury, indolence, and effeminacy. But of this truly generous and bountiful patron of learning, Meibomius has wrote an entire volume under the title of Mecænas, to which we refer our readers.

(H) This city is called by Appian Scodra, the ſcituation whereof agrees with that of Codropolis. Scodra, now known to the Turks by the name of Eſcodar, and to the Italians by that of Scrutari, was antiently the capital of the country of the Labeates, a people of Illyricum, and is at preſent the chief city of Albania. It ſtands on the river Drilo, now the Drino, about ſixty miles eaſt of Raguſa. This city, which was the bulwark of Illyricum on the ſide of Macedon, and looked upon as one of the beſt fortified and to be the boundary of their dominions; all from that place weſtward was allotted to Octavianus, and all eaſtward to Antony: ſo that the former had Dalmatia, the two Gauls, Spain, and Sardinia, and the latter all the eaſtern provinces quite to the Euphrates. Africa was left to Lepidus, who had been ſent by Octavianus with ſix legions into that province ſome time before the arrival of Antony. It was agreed, that Antony ſhould make war upon the Parthians, and Octavianus upon Pompey, if he refuſed to ſubmit to reaſonable conditions. Italy was left common to both the triumvirs for the raiſing of forces wherewithal to carry on theſe wars. To theſe conditions Antony added, that Octavianus ſhould pardon Domitius Ahenobarbus, and likewiſe all thoſe who had borne arms againſt him in the war of Peruſia. The two generals thus reconciled marched together to Rome, where the marriage between Antony and the incomparable Octavia was ſolemnized with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. When the ceremony was over, Antony, to give Octavianus an undeniable proof of the ſincerity of his intentions, diſcovered to him, that Salvidienus (I), one of his lieutenants, had offered him his troops and his ſervice, when Octavianus ſent him into Spain, and that he had repeated the ſame offer at Brunduſium. Hereupon Octavianus accuſed him of treachery before the ſenate, who declared him an enemy to the people of Rome, ſentenced him to death, and ordered thanks to be publicly returned to the gods for the diſcovery of the treaſon. At the ſame time, Manius, of whom we have ſpoke above, was by Antony's orders put to death, as having been the chief author of the late diſturbances [m].

and moſt inacceſſible cities in the world, is often mentioned by Livy, and the other Roman writers, who give an account of the war between the republic and Gentius king of Illyricum. Florus was certainly miſtaken, when he placed Scodra in Macedon, and ſtyled it the metropolis of that kingdom.

(I) Salvidienus was the ſon of a poor peaſant, and ſpent his youth in looking after cattle. While he was thus meanly employed, his head one day appeared to his companions, as if in a flame. This he looked upon as a prognoſtic of ſome extraordinary good fortune, and therefore ſoon after liſted himſelf in the army, where by his valour he roſe to the higheſt poſts. In the mean time, Pompey, who was maſter at ſea, keeping all the ports of Italy blocked up with his numerous fleets, Rome was reduced to the utmoſt extremety for want of proviſions, eſpecially of corn, which was become ſo dear, that the people were ready to ſtarve. Hereupon Antony preſſed his collegue either to come to an accommodation with Pompey, or oblige him by a vigorous war to recall his fleet, and leave the ſea open for trade and navigation. Octavianus was more inclined to war, Pompey having lately taken from him the iſlands of Sardinia and Corſica; but as he wanted money to carry it on, with Antony's approbation he laid two taxes on all the inhabitants of Rome and Italy, the one of four drachmas and an half for every ſlave, the other on all legacies. This ſo provoked the populace, already pinched with hunger, that they roſe in oppoſition to theſe edicts, aſſaulted Octavianus in the forum, and would have torn him to pieces, had not Antony haſtened to his aſſiſtance with a body of troops, which was encamped at the gates of the city. The rabble was ſoon diſperſed, and ſeveral of them killed, and their bodies thrown into the Tiber; but as the famine ſtill continued, the populace, notwithſtanding the puniſhment of a few, grew daily more outrageous. Antony therefore, fearing a general inſurrection, wrote to Lucius Scribonius Libo, who was then in Sicily with Pompey his ſon-in-law, inviting him to Rome to treat there of an accommodation between Octavianus, Pompey, and himſelf. Pompey was overjoyed at this propoſal, as was alſo Statius Murcus; but Menas, whom ſome writers call Menodorus, one of Pompey's enfranchiſed ſlaves and a ſea officer of great experience and bravery, not only oppoſed it, but with groundleſs inſinuations entirely eſtranged Pompey from Murcus, who preſſed him with great earneſtneſs to make up all differences with the triumvirs, and reſtore Italy to it's former tranquillity. Hereupon Murcus retired to Syracuſe, where he was murdered by ſome ſlaves, whom Pompey afterwards cauſed to be executed to clear himſelf from the murder. It was, however, commonly believed, that himſelf in a very eminent manner, the dictator had named him one of his conſuls, who were to govern the republic in his abſence, though Salvidienus had not yet been admitted into the ſenate. Upon the dictator's death, he out of gratitude ſided with his ſon Octavianus, and had a great ſhare in all his victories. But afterwards, thinking Octavianus did not reward him according to his deſerts, he offered his ſervice to Antony, who, by baſely betraying him, was the occaſion of his death.

that Menas had put him to death by Pompey's orders. But notwithſtanding Menas's oppoſition, Pompey allowed Libo to go to Rome, in compliance with Antony's invitation, where he perſuaded Octavianus and Antony to come to an interview with Pompey, that they might, in perſon and face to face, diſcuſs their pretenſions, and put an end to their differences. To this Pompey conſented at the earneſt requeſt of his officers, and advanced with his fleet to the promontory formed by mount Miſenus, where he and Libo in a galley, and the two triumvirs on a kind of mole made for that purpoſe, expoſe their mutual claims and pretenſions. Pompey demanded to be admitted into the triumvirate inſtead of Lepidus, whoſe authority declined daily. This demand ſeemed very reaſonable to Pompey, but quite otherwiſe to Antony and Octavianus; ſo that, after a warm and long diſpute, they parted without coming to any reſolution. Pompey, who knew he had it in his power to reduce Rome and all Italy to the utmoſt extremity, and force the inhabitants to take up arms againſt the triumvirs, was for breaking off the conference and returning to Sicily. But Libo adviſed him to ſtay and continue the negotiations, at leaſt by deputies, which he did accordingly. The ſecond day he dropped his pretenſion to a place in the triumvirate, but propoſed the following preliminaries: 1. That thoſe who had been concerned in the death of Cæſar ſhould only be baniſhed, and be at liberty to chuſe for their exile what place they pleaſed. 2. That ſuch, as had been proſcribed on any other account whatſoever, ſhould be allowed to return to Rome. 3. That the latter ſhould be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their lands and fortunes. Antony and Octavianus abſolutely rejected the two firſt articles, and only conſented that thoſe, who were not in the number of the conſpirators, ſhould be allowed to purchaſe their eſtates. Moſt part of thoſe who were about Pompey, tired with ſo long and deſtructive a war, and dreading the fate of Murcus, declared that they were willing to return to Rome, even upon the conditions propoſed by the triumvirs; which ſo diſpleaſed Pompey, that in the tranſport of his paſſion he tore his robe, calling thoſe, who ſubmitted to ſuch ſhameful conditions, vile traitors and cowardly deſerters. "Menas," ſaid he, "is the only true friend I have in the "world; Menas alone has given me wholeſome and diſ- "intereſted advice." However, at the earneſt entreaties of his mother Mutia, of Julia, Antony's mother, and of Libo, his father-in-law, he conſented to a ſecond interview, in which, after three days debate, the following articles articles were agreed to by the contending parties. "1. That "Pompey ſhould be left in poſſeſſion of Sicily, Sardinia, "Corſica, and the adjacent iſlands, and ſhould over and "above have Peloponneſus yielded up to him. 2. That "he ſhould have the privilege of demanding the conſulate, "though abſent, and of diſcharging that office by any of his "friends. 3. That the dignity of pontifex maximus ſhould "be conferred upon him, and ſeventy thouſand great ſeſter-"ces reſtored to him out of his father's confiſcated eſtate. "4. That ſuch as had taken refuge with him merely out of "fear ſhould be allowed to return, and enjoy their whole "eſtate; and that the proſcribed perſons, who were not "guilty of Cæſar's death, ſhould have only the fourth part "of their eſtates reſtored to them. 5. That trade and na-"vigation ſhould be free; that Pompey ſhould withdraw "his troops from Italy; that he ſhould ſuffer no inroads or "deſcents to be made upon the coaſts, nor build more "ſhips. 6. That he ſhould not for the future receive the "ſlaves who fled to him; that thoſe who had bore arms "under him ſhould be declared free, and that his legio-"naries, when the time of their ſervice was expired, ſhould "have their ſhare in the diviſion of lands with thoſe of An-"tony and Octavianus. 7. That he ſhould immediately "ſend to Rome the corn he had retained, oblige the Sicili-"ans to pay anually what corn was due to the republic out "of their iſland, and clear the ſeas of all pirates." This treaty was ſigned by the three chiefs, and ſent to Rome to be depoſited there in the hands of the veſtals [n]. They then agreed to treat each other in token of their ſincere reconciliation; and it fell to Pompey's lot to make the firſt entertainment. Antony asked him where he deſigned to receive them? 'In Carinis," anſwered Pompey pleaſantly: for the word carinæ in Latin ſignifies ſhips, and was likewiſe the name of a ward or part of the city, where Pompey the Great had a ſtately palace, which Antony had ſeized. Antony underſtood the raillery, but was not very quick at repartees. On the day appointed for the entertainment, Pompey, having brought his galley near the ſhore, and made a bridge to it from the promontory, received his two gueſts with great civility and politeneſs. And here Octavianus ſeemed to have forgot his uſual warineſs and circumſpection; and this entertainment tainment would have coſt both him and his collegue dear, had not Pompey been endowed with a truly great and generous ſoul. For while they were at table, and Pompey and Cæſar, growing warm with wine, began to rally Antony upon his amours and fondneſs for the fair Egyptian queen, Menas approaching Pompey, "You have now a fair oppor"tunity," he whiſpered him in the ear, "of revenging

"the death of your father and brother, and making your-

"the cable, leave the reſt to me." The blow was ſure, and the temptation violent, Pompey's fleet being drawn up in order of battle, and all the triumvirs forces aſhore. However, the generous Roman ſcorning to purchaſe the empire of the world at the expence of his honour, after a ſhort pauſe, "Menas," ſaid he, "may forfeit his word and re-

Pompey's generoſity.

'Tis a great pity we have the characters of illuſtrious men only from hiſtorians, who, either out of fear or flattery, cry down the enemies of the princes, whoſe favour they courted. Velleius Paterculus, who wrote in the time of Auguſtus, and has in his hiſtory miſerably perverted truth, or utterly ſuppreſſed it, paints Pompey in the worſt colours. But the greatneſs of his mind which he diſplayed on this occaſion againſt his own intereſt, is ſufficient to bely that mercenary ſycophant, and the other flatterers of the Cæſars, who ought to have had ſome regard to his memory in conſideration of this generous action, which in ſpight of all their diſguiſes, and falſe repreſentations, will recommend his name to the lateſt poſterity. Plutarch relates this matter ſomewhat differently; for according to him Pompey returned this anſwer to the propoſal of Menas; "This you might have done with"out imparting it to me; but now let us make the beſt of "our preſent condition, for I cannot prevail upon myſelf to "violate my faith once given." From this anſwer it appears, that ſo great an advantage, joined to the pleaſure of revenge, was a kind of ſurpriſe upon his generoſity; but it ſerved only to make it break out with greater luſtre in rejecting a perfidious action, what profit ſoever might accrue from it [o]. Antony and Octavianus treated Pompey in their turns with great demonſtrations of ſeeming friendſhip; for the confirming of which, and cementing it with new ties, Pompey, who was ſincere, propoſed a match between his daughter and

and M. Marcellus, the ſon of Octavia by her former huſband; which Octavianus conſenting to, they both entered into the uſual engagements, Pompey for his daughter, and Octaviamus for his nephew, who was at that time but an infant. This is the famous M. Marcellus, whom Octavianus had appointed his heir in caſe he had no iſſue male of his own, and whoſe virtues are ſo highly commended by the prince of the Latin poets [p]. Before the three chiefs parted they named conſuls for the four following years, viz. Antony and Libo for the firſt, Octavianus and Pompey for the ſecond, Domitius and Soſius for the third, and Antony and Cæſar for the fourth. The conſuls of this year, in which the treaty was concluded, were Cn. Domitius Calvinus and C. Aſinius Pollio, who had ſucceeded L. Antonius and P. Servilius Vatia Iſauricus; but before their year expired, others, namely L. Cornelius Balbus and P. Canidius Craſſus, on what account we know not, were ſubſtituted in their room [q].

Pompey's daughter betrothed to M. Marcellus Octavianus's nephew.

And now all differences being compoſed, and for a while an end put to the civil wars, Pompey, taking his leave of Antony and Octavianus, returned to Sicily, and the other two to Rome, where they were welcomed with loud acclamations of the people, overjoyed to ſee themſelves at length delivered from a cruel famine, which had begun to rage with great fury in the capital, and all the provinces of Italy. The joy of the people was doubled upon the return of many illuſtrious citizens, who had been proſcribed by the triumvirs, or forced to fly their country through fear of falling into Octavianus's hands after the ſurrender of Peruſia. Among theſe were L. Aruntius, M. Junius Silanus, C. Sentius Saturninus, M. Titius, M. Claudius Tiberius Nero, M. Cicero, the ſon of the orator, and many other citizens of great diſtinction; who after having aſſured Pompey of their eternal acknowledgments, returned to their native country, where they were received with thoſe marks of eſteem and affection which were due to their merit. The praiſes of Pompey, who had the glory of ſaving ſo many worthy men, and reſtoring them to their former rank, were in the mouth of every true Roman. And now Antony and Octavianus, after a ſhort ſtay at Rome (K), took leave of each other, and quitting the capital, set out, the former for Greece, and the latter for Gaul. Some nations beyond the Alps having attempted to shake off the yoke, Octavianus, to whose share Gaul was fallen, marched against them in person, and having easily reduced them, repassed the Alps, and stopped in Hetruria. As for Antony, he dispatched Ventidius into Asia to put a stop to the inroads of the Parthians, but went himself no farther than Athens, where he spent the winter with his new wife Octavia in the same excesses of luxury, folly, and childish diversions, as he had done the former with Cleopatra at Alexandria. Laying aside the ensigns of his authority, he appeared at all the public games and exercises in the Grecian habit, like a private citizen of Athens. He often visited the academy, and the Lyceum, spending sometimes whole days in hearing the disputes and conferences of the philosophers. While he thus led an idle life at Athens, Ventidius his lieutenant was signalizing himself in the war, which he had been appointed to carry on against the Parthians. We have given elsewhere [r] a distinct account of the remarkable victories gained over that war-like nation by the brave Ventidius, and therefore shall not trouble the reader here with a tedious repetition of the same transactions. When news was brought to Antony of the signal advantages gained by his lieutenant, he gave a public entertainment to all the Greeks of any rank, exhibited sports and shews, and presided at them in person as moderator. As he loved wine, he was wonderfully pleased with the title of Bacchus, which divinity he took upon him to personate constantly the loser. As this gave him a great deal of uneasiness, one day, while he was quite out of patience, an Egyptian, who was with him, and was deemed very skilful in the calculation of nativities, told him, that though the fortune that attended him was bright and glorious, yet it was overshadowed by that of Octavianus; he therefore advised him to keep himself at a distance from that young man: "For your genius," said he, "dreads his. Yours is proud and brave, when absent from him, "but in the presence of his unmanly and dejected." This, no doubt, the impostor said to make his court to Cleopatra by forcing Antony to leave Rome, and return to Egypt; wherein he succeeded; for Antony, who put great confidence in the skill of the Egyptian astrologer, left Rome soon after (93).

ſonate in a proceſſion he made upon the joyful tidings of the ſucceſs of his arms in the eaſt. During theſe public rejoycings the Greeks ſet no bounds to their flattery; they fell proſtrate before the pretended Bacchus, beſeeching him to marry Minerva the tutelar deity of their city. Antony diſpleaſed with this groſs flattery, conſented to the match, but aſked a thouſand talents, for the portion of the goddeſs. "Your father Jupiter," anſwered one of the Athenians, "required no fortune with your mother Semele." 'Tis true," replied Antony; "but Jupiter was rich, and I want "money." Antony would abate nothing of the ſum, which was levied upon all the inhabitants, who revenged themſelves, according to their cuſtom, with ſatires and lampoons, of which his amours with Cleopatra were the chief ſubject. But he laughed at their jeſts, and took their money, though Delius, to mortify them the more, gravely repreſented to him, that he acted therein againſt the Roman laws, which allowed three years for the payment of a portion [s].

Puniſhes the Athenians for their flattery.

In the mean time news was brought to Antony of a ſecond victory gained by Ventidius over the Parthians, for which he made great rejoycings; but being informed at the ſame time, that Pacorus was making vaſt preparations with a deſign to invade Syria anew, and thinking it no ways conſiſtent with his reputation to continue idle at Athens, and ſuffer his lieutenant to rob him of the whole glory of this war, he aſſembled his troops early in the ſpring, and reaſſumed with the marks of his dignity all the majeſty of a Roman general. When his army was ready to march, he made himſelf a garland of the olive-tree conſecrated to Minerva, and filled a veſſel with the water of the Clepſydra to carry along with him (L). At length he left Athens after having made a grand entertainment for all the inhabitants of that populous city, and marched with all his forces into the eaſt. But before he got thither, Ventidius gained a third victory far more glorious than the other two; whereby he fully revenged the death of Craſſus, and redeemed the honour of the Roman name, which had ſuffered much ever ſince the battle of Carrhæ: for Pacorus himſelf, with above twenty thouſand of his beſt men, was ſlain in this battle, of which we have given a particular account in our hiſtory of the Parthians [t]. Had Ventidius purſued all the advantages of this victory, he might have extended the bounds of the Roman empire to the banks of the Tigris; but not thinking it prudent to puſh his good fortune any further, for fear of giving Antony umbrage, he turned his arms againſt thoſe who had revolted in Syria and Phœnice during the late war. Purſuant to this deſign, when Antony arrived, he was beſieging Samoſata, the capital of Commagene, whither Antiochus, king of that country, had retired. Antony on his coming thither diſmiſſed this brave commander, and ſent him to Rome to demand of the ſenate and people the honours of a triumph, being glad to get rid of a ſubaltern, whoſe glory eclipſed that of his general. Antiochus from the beginning of the ſiege had offered to Ventidius a thouſand talents for his pardon, and promiſed an entire obedience and ſubmiſſion to all Antony's commands. But as Antony was then on his march, Ventidius ordered him to ſend his propoſals to him; which he did accordingly; but Antony rejecting them, the beſieged dreading his reſentment, defended the place with ſuch vigour and intrepidity, that the Roman general began to repent his not accepting the firſt offer, and was in the end glad to come to an accommodation with Antiochus for three hundred talents, that he might raiſe the ſiege with honour, which otherwiſe he feared he ſhould be forced to do in a ſhameful manner, his ſoldiers being highly diſpleaſed with his diſmiſſing Ventidius, under whoſe conduct they had gained ſo many ſignal victories [u]. After this, Antony, having appointed Soſius his lieutenant in Cilicia, Syria, and Paleſtine, left the army under his command, and returned to Octavia at Athens.

New diſputes between Pompey and Octavianus.

In the mean time new diſputes ariſing between Pompey and Octavianus, the latter was wholly intent on making the neceſſary preparations for war, being determined to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to invade Sicily. The late treaty of peace had regulated their pretenſions, but not their ambition; and that animoſity between Julius Cæſar and Pompey the Great, which had laid waſte the Roman world, was ſtill ſubſiſting in the minds of their children. The apparent parent ſubject of their quarrel was Peloponneſus, which had been yielded to Pompey, as we have obſerved above, in virtue of the treaty. Octavianus pretended that the tributes, owing from that province to the republic before the treaty, were due to the triumvirs, and that Pompey ought to be reſponſible for them. On the other hand Pompey maintained, that they had yielded him that country free from all charges. As a breach was likely to enſue, Pompey cauſed his old galleys to be refitted, and ſeveral new ones to be built. This was contrary to the late treaty, and therefore a plauſible pretence for Octavianus to invade Sicily. With this view he reinforced his army with new levies, and aſſembled what ſhips he could on the coaſts of the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian ſeas. Pompey, informed of theſe preparations, blocked up the ports of Italy anew, and in a ſhort time reduced the populous capital to its former condition. The people, threatened again with a famine, began to complain, and ſeemed diſpoſed to riſe, if their grievances were not ſoon redreſſed. "A fine "peace indeed!" ſaid they, "what have we gained by it but "to have four tyrants inſtead of three?" But Octavianus, who had a numerous army on foot, continued his preparations for war both by ſea and land, without hearkening to the complaints of the diſcontented populace. He wrote to Antony, deſiring him to leave Athens for a while, and paſs over into Italy, that they might confer together, about the moſt proper meaſures for the cruſhing of Pompey, their common rival. He likewiſe acquainted Lepidus with his deſign, who was then in Africa, which had fallen to his ſhare in the laſt diviſion of the Roman dominions, exhorting him to get ready his fleet with all poſſible expedition, that they might act in concert, and both invade Sicily at the ſame time. Antony in compliance with his requeſt came to Brunduſium, but not finding him there at the time appointed, he returned to Athens; whether out of ſome diſtruſt he had of Octavianus, or becauſe he was frightened by certain prodigies, is uncertain (M). Whatever his reaſons were, he reembarqued and returned to Athens, leaving a letter for Octavianus, wherein he exhorted him to ſtand to the conditions of the laſt treaty. As for Lepidus, who was a man of a lazy and indolent diſpoſition, he ſpent the whole ſummer in making preparations, and did not leave Africa till the following year; ſo that the whole burden of the war fell upon Octavianus, whoſe boundleſs ambition would allow him no reſt till he had got rid of ſo powerful a rival, and made himſelf maſter of the wealthy iſland he poſſeſſed. However, in the height of his cares, and warlike preparations, he found no ſmall relief in the agreeable converſation of Livia, with whoſe charms and refined wit he was ſo taken, that in the end he divorced his own wife Scribonia (N), and married her, though then big with child, her huſband Claudius Tiberius Nero not daring to withſtand the inclinations of ſo powerful a lover. Livia had one ſon by Tiberius, who bore his fathers's name, and was, three months after her marriage with Octavianus, brought to bed of another, named Druſus, But of theſe two children, and their mother Livia, we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of this hiſtory. The charms of Livia, however powerful, were not able to divert Octavianus from the purſuit of his ambitious views. He continued with the ſame ardor his warlike preparations, recalled the legions he had left in Tranſalpine Gaul, and aſſembled a great number of veſſels in the ports of Hetruria, and at Ravenna on the Adriatic ſea. But as his fleet was not yet in a condition to cope with that of Pompey, he muſt have put off his Sicilian expedition till the return of Antony, and the arrival of Lepidus, had he not been favoured by fortune beyond his expectation. For Menas, the famous freedman of Pompey, an officer of great valour and experience in maritime affairs, being offended with his maſter for not revenging the death of ſome of his freedmen killed by the ſenators who were about him, revolted to Octavianus, and joining him with three legions, and the numerous fleet, which Octavianus falls in love with Livia, and marries her.

Rome reduced again to great ſtreights.

Menas Pompey's freedman goes over to Octavianus.

(N) Scribonia was the ſiſter of Scribonius Libo father-in-law to Pompey. Octavianus married her with a political view, which was to divert Pompey by that alliance from ſiding with Antony, who ſeemed inclined to eſpouſe the quarrel of his brother Lucius, and his wife Fulvia. Libo with Saturninus and ſome other ſenators had already attempted to conclude a league between Antony and Pompey. Octavianus therefore, to gain Libo, who had a great aſcendant over his ſon-in-law, married his ſiſter, and had by her the famous Julia, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of this hiſtory. But as in that marriage he had conſulted his intereſt, and not his inclination, he divorced her to marry Livia, who was accounted the moſt agreeable woman of her age.

which he commanded, delivered up to him the iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia, over which he had been placed by his indulgent maſter. Octavianus received the traytor with the greateſt demonſtrations of friendſhip and eſteem, entertained him at his own table, allowed him the priviledge of wearing a gold ring, and ſitting among the Roman knights, and appointed him commander in chief of the fleet, which he brought with him. This Pompey looked upon as a declaration of war, and therefore immediately ſent out Menecrates, another freedman, and a mortal enemy to Menas, with a numerous ſquadron, to ravage the coaſts of Italy, which he did accordinly; but being met on his return by a ſquadron of Octavianus's fleet, commanded by C. Calviſius, and his antient rival Menas, a bloody engagement enſued in which Menecrates and Menas diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the other commanders, the hatred, which they bore each other, animating them more than glory did others. They were both men of great courage and intrepidity, and therefore, regardleſs of all dangers, fought with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. At length, after a long and moſt obſtinate diſpute between the two rivals, Menecrates being dangerouſly wounded, Menas boarded his gally, and made himſelf maſter of it. Hereupon Menecrates, chuſing rather to die, than fall into the hands of his mortal enemy, threw himſelf into the ſea, and periſhed in the waves. Upon his death Democharés, another freedman, taking upon him the command of the fleet, attacked Calviſius's ſquadron ſo warmly, that he forced him to give way, took ſeveral of his galleys, ſunk others, and drove the reſt againſt the rocks near the ſhore, where moſt of them were daſhed to pieces; ſo that Calviſius eſcaped by the favour of the night only with a few galleys, and took refuge with Menas in the bay of Cumæ [w].

A new breach between Octavianus and Pompey.

Octavianus's fleet defeated by Pompey's.

Octavianus, who was then at Tarentum, where he had aſſembled a numerous fleet, upon the firſt news of this engagement, reſolved to paſs the ſtreights of Meſſana, and join Calviſius and Menas, for whom he was in great pain. But being attacked in that narrow paſſage by Pompey and Democharés, who was returned to Meſſana, moſt of his ſhips were either ſunk or daſhed to pieces againſt the rocks. Octavianus himſelf gained the ſhore with the utmoſt difficulty, where he narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands, who having landed and ſurrounded him, thought themſelves themſelves ſure of their prey. But the knowledge he had of the country ſaved him; for being well acquainted with the defiles of a neighbouring mountain, by by-ways he reached the top of it, and there with a few attendants lay concealed. Having avoided one danger, he fell into another. A ſlave of Æmilius Paulus, whoſe father had been proſcribed by Octavianus, ſeeing the triumvir without his uſual guards, thought this a favourable opportunity of being revenged on him for his cruelty towards his old maſter; and therefore accoſting him with a dagger, attempted to ſtab him; but miſſing his blow, as it was then very dark, he was immediately cut in pieces by the triumvir's attendants [x]. While Octavianus lay concealed on the top of the mountain, far from all danger, Cornificius, who commanded under him, ſtill maintained the combat with great bravery; and having ſunk Demochares's ſhip, continued fighting, notwithſtanding the great loſs he had ſuſtained, till ſun-ſet, when Calviſius and Menas appearing unexpectedly with their ſquadrons, Pompey thought it adviſeable to ſound a retreat. The next morning Octavianus from the top of his mountain had the mortification to ſee moſt of his veſſels ſtranded upon the coaſt, ſome of them half burnt, others ſtill in a flame, and the ſea to a great diſtance covered with the wreck. But what gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs was to ſee the enemy's fleet advancing full ſail againſt Menas and Calviſius, who were no ways in a condition to withſtand them. However, they drew up, but as they were ready to engage a violent ſtorm aroſe, and the ſea began to run very high. Hereupon Pompey retired into the port of Meſſana; but Octavianus's ſhips were for the moſt part either ſunk with all the men on board, or daſhed to pieces againſt the rocks and the ſhore. As the ſtorm laſted all night, Octavianus, to avoid ſo diſmal a ſight, went early next morning to Vibonium, or Vibo, a city of Brutium, whence he ſent orders to his lieutenants to guard with great care the coaſt of Italy, leſt Pompey ſhould attempt an invaſion. But he was ſo far from improving the advantages he had gained, by attacking his rival on the continent, that by an unpardonable negligence he ſuffered the poor remains of his ſhattered fleet to retire unmoleſted to Vibonium [y].

ready to riſe for want of corn, he diſpatched Mecænas to Antony, ſoliciting his aſſiſtance againſt their common enemy. Antony, who was then in Syria, as we read in Dio, or at Athens, as Appian has it, promiſed to aſſiſt his collegue to the utmoſt of his power; and accordingly, having with all poſſible diligence aſſembled his fleet, he ſailed for Italy with three hundred ſhips. But in the mean time Octavianus, receiving news of a complete victory gained by Agrippa over the revolted Gauls, he began to think that he ſtood no more in need of Antony's aſſiſtance, and would willingly have diſpenſed with his civility. He thought him already too powerful, and therefore under various pretences would fain have declined going to meet him. Theſe proceedings highly diſpleaſed Antony, who had for a long time been jealous of his collegue. However, as he deſigned to exchange with Octavianus part of his fleet, which would be of no uſe to him in his intended expedition againſt the Parthians, for land-forces, he waited a long time for him at Tarentum, though he had been refuſed admittance at Brunduſium. At length he began to grow very uneaſy, and to complain of Octavianus in moſt bitter and reproachful terms. Whereupon Octavia, who had attended him from Greece, though then big with child, prevailed upon him to ſend her to her brother, not doubting, but ſhe ſhould eaſily clear up all their jealouſies and ſuſpicions. As ſhe was on her journey to Rome, ſhe met her brother, and had a conference with him in the preſence of his two friends Mecænas and Agrippa, whom ſhe was willing to have for witneſſes of what paſſed between them. After ſhe had with great prudence and addreſs anſwered the complaints of her brother againſt her huſband, ſhe conjured both him and his two favourites with tears in her eyes, to conſider her circumſtances, and not ſuffer her, inſtead of the moſt fortunate of women, to become the moſt miſerable; "for at preſent," ſaid ſhe, "the eyes "of the whole Roman people are fixed upon me, on ac- "count of the ties which bind me to two of the greateſt "men in the world, being wife to the one, and ſiſter to "the other. If raſh counſels prevail, and war enſues, I "ſhall be miſerable without redreſs; for on what ſide "ſoever victory falls I ſhall be ſure to be the loſer." Octavianus, ſoftened by the entreaties of a ſiſter, whom he loved with the greateſt tenderneſs, conſented to an interview with Antony, for which a place was choſen between Metapontum and Tarentum upon a river bearing the name of the latter. Antony came thither the firſt, and as ſoon as he ſaw Octavianus advancing, he leaped into a boat, in order to go and receive him on the other ſide of the river. Octavianus, not to be overcome by him in civility, did the ſame, ſo that the two boats met in the midſt of the river. After they had embraced each other, they had a friendly conteſt on which ſide they ſhould land. Antony was for landing on Octavianus's ſide, and Octavianus on Antony's; but Octavianus at length prevailed, under pretence of waiting on his ſiſter, who was returned to Tarentum. They walked together to the town, where Octavianus ſpent the night without any other guards about his perſon, but thoſe of Antony, who likewiſe went the next day without guards, and paſſed the night in Octavianus's camp. All little differences between them being made up in an amicable manner, it was agreed, that Octavianus ſhould give Antony two of his legions to be employed againſt the Parthians, and that Antony in return ſhould leave with him an hundred armed galleys. Appian ſays, that Antony yielded to Octavianus an hundred and fifty ſhips, and Octavianus to Antony twenty thouſand men. Beſides this, Octavia obtained of her huſband twenty ſmall ſhips, or, as Appian has it, ten triremes, for her brother, and of her brother a thouſand foot for her huſband. That their friendſhip and union might be more laſting, Octavianus betrothed his daughter Julia, whom he had by Scribonia, to Antyllus, Antony's ſon; and they both agreed, the five years of the triumvirate being now expired, to prolong their authority for five years more, without conſulting either the ſenate or people. After this Antony departed once more for Syria. Octavia accompanied him as far as Corcyra, whence, that ſhe might not be expoſed to the dangers of that expedition, he ſent her back into Italy, to remain there till he had ended that war, committing her and his children, both by her and his former wife Fulvia, to the care of Octavianus [y]. It is not unlikely, that Antony had already propoſed returning to Egypt, and therefore was glad to get rid of Octavia, that ſhe might not diſturb him in the enjoyment of his beloved Cleopatra.

Their differences made up.

Octavianus makes great preparations for war againſt Pompey.

OCTAVIANUS, upon the departure of his collegue, began to make vaſt preparations both by ſea and land for his intended expedition againſt Pompey. He appointed Agrippa commander in chief of his navy, and that brave officer in a few months aſſembled with indefatigable induſtry a fleet able ble to cope with Pompey's. And now both the ſea and land-forces being ready to enter upon action, Octavianus reſolved to invade the iſland in three different places at the ſame time: Lepidus, whom he had ſent for from Africa, was to land at Lilybæum on the ſouth of the iſland; Statilius Taurus, who was at Tarentum, on the eaſt ſide at cape Pachynum; and Octavianus himſelf on the weſtern coaſt at cape Pelorum. As for Agrippa, he was with a numerous ſquadron to cruiſe off Mylæ, a city on the northern coaſt of the iſland, where Pompey was ſaid to have aſſembled all his naval forces. Menas had already, out of his natural levity, abandoned the party of Octavianus, and returned to Pompey with his ſquadron, not thinking himſelf conſidered, as he deſerved, by his new maſter. Calviſius, though an officer of great experience in maritime affairs, was not employed in this expedition, he having incurred the diſpleaſure of Octavianus, for ſuffering himſelf to be over-reached by Menas, when he deſerted to Pompey. And now all things being ready, Octavianus's fleets, though in different ports, ſet ſail on the day agreed on, which was that of the new moon in the month of July, both that day and month being ſacred to the memory of Julius Cæſar. But they had ſcarce put to ſea, when a violent ſtorm ariſing defeated all Octavianus's meaſures. Statilius Taurus foreſeeing it, returned to Tarentum with the hundred and two ſhips he commanded; but the ſquadrons of Octavianus, Lepidus, and Agrippa, ſuffered much, that eſpecially of Octavianus, who on this occaſion loſt ſix of the ſhips, which Octavia had given him, twenty-ſix others, and a great number of light veſſels, called by the Latins Liburnicæ. His own ſhip with much ado made the bay of Velia, where, as in all dangers he had a particular care of his own perſon, he went aſhore, leaving his friends and mariners to ſtruggle all night with the winds and waves. When he reached the ſhore, and found himſelf out of danger, rage ſucceeded fear, and tranſported him to ſuch a degree, that he could not forbear venting it upon Neptune himſelf, crying out, "I ſhall conquer at length; yes, I ſhall con-" quer, Neptune, in ſpite of thee." Lepidus, who was come from Africa with twelve legions, and five thouſand Numidian horſe, on board eighty ſhips of war and a thouſand tranſports, after having loſt ſome of his veſſels, landed at Lilybæum in ſpite of the oppoſition he met with from Plennius, whom Pompey had poſted there with ſome legions and a great number of ſlingers and archers. All the other other ſquadrons were driven back, and forced to make what ports they could. Pompey, looking upon theſe repeated ſhipwrecks in ſummer, when the ſea is commonly calm, as viſible tokens of the favour and protection of Neptune, returned him ſolemn thanks for his aſſiſtance, and was ſo elated with this unexpected ſucceſs, as to ſtyle himſelf the ſon of Neptune. On the other hand, Octavianus thinking himſelf ill uſed by that deity, never forgave him; but cauſed his ſtatue ſeveral years after to be removed from the circus, where the public games were celebrated. But his chief care at preſent was, to refit his fleet, recruit his forces, and prevent the diſturbances which the news of this diſaſter might raiſe in Rome. Thither he diſpatched Mecænas, who with his uſual addreſs ſoon calmed the minds of the people. At the ſame time, he went in perſon to the ſeveral ports, where his ſhips had taken ſhelter, and, by encouraging and amply rewarding the workmen, got his fleet refitted, and ready to put to ſea again before the end of the ſummer. In this ſecond attempt he was attended with better ſucceſs than in the former; for Meſſala Corvinus landed ſafe with three legions, and encamped near Taurominium at a ſmall diſtance from Lepidus; ſeveral other legions were ſet a ſhore, without meeting with any conſiderable oppoſition in other places of the iſland, and Statilius Taurus made himſelf maſter of cape Scylaceum on the continent, which Pompey had ſeized. But on the other hand Papias, one of Pompey's admirals, falling in with a ſquadron, which was conveying four legions to Lepidus, attacked the tranſports, took ſome of them, ſunk others, and obliged the reſt to return to Africa. In this encounter two of Lepidus's legions were either taken, drowned or cut in pieces. In the mean time, Octavianus, who was then with his fleet in the port of Strongyle, one of the Æolian iſlands, obſerving all the coaſt of Sicily on that ſide lined with Pompey's forces, left the command of the fleet to Agrippa, and returned to Vibonium to haſten the departure of the reſt of his ſhips. Upon his departure, Agrippa, who longed for an opportunity of ſignalizing his valour, made himſelf maſter of Hiera, one of the Æolian iſlands, a place of the utmoſt importance. From thence he ſteered his courſe towards Mylæ, with a deſign to ſurpriſe Democharès, who had in that port a fleet of forty ſail under his command. But being informed that Papias was advancing to the relief of Democharès, he thought it adviſeable firſt to engage the former; which he did accordingly, ngly, and gained a complete victory, Papias, who behaved on this occaſion with unparallelled bravery, having loſt thirty galleys, and Agrippa only five. Upon the news of this victory Octavianus, who was then at Scylaceum, thinking Pompey was blocked up by Agrippa, embarqued the flower of his army, and landed in the neighbourhood of Tauromínium, with a deſign to beſiege that place. But in the mean time, Pompey appearing unexpectedly on the coaſt with his fleet, both Octavianus and his troops were ſtruck with ſuch terror, that Pompey might have eaſily cut them in pieces. But he, as the day was already far ſpent, inſtead of attacking them without loſs of time, retired with his land-forces to a neighbouring mountain, and there ſpent the night, which the enemy employed in fortifying their camp. Next morning by break of day Octavianus, not doubting but Pompey would attack his camp, left the defence of it to his lieutenants, L. Cornificius, Titinius, and Carcius, and went on board his fleet. But flying from one danger, he fell into another; for Pompey, not thinking it adviſeable to attack his camp, which was well fortified, fell upon his fleet, and ſoon convinced his rival, that if he wanted conduct, he did not want courage. Octavianus's fleet was put to flight at the firſt onſet, ſeveral of his ſhips were taken, and the reſt, a ſmall number only excepted, either ſunk or burnt. As the battle was fought near the ſhore, ſuch of Octavianus's men as could ſwim took refuge in the camp of Cornificius, but the reſt were for the moſt part either drowned or taken. As for Octavianus himſelf, he made his eſcape in a boat, and leaving his troops aſhore to ſhift for themſelves, made Abala, a city on the coaſt of Italy, being attended only by one domeſtic. As he was quite ſpent with the fatigue he had undergone, and overwhelmed with grief and chagrin on account of his defeat, he lay down on the open ſhore, and fell into ſo ſound a ſleep, that he was carried without waking by ſome officers, who knew him, to a camp, which Meſſala had formed in that neighbourhood for the defence of the coaſt (O). His firſt care after he awaked was, to provide for the ſafety of the troops he had left in

(O) An accident is ſaid to have happened to him here, which, however frivolous, gave him great hopes of conquering at laſt. in Sicily under the command of Cornificius. With this view he immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to Agrippa, enjoining him to ſend forthwith a ſtrong body of legionaries under the command of Laronius to their aſſiſtance. And indeed Cornificius was reduced to the utmoſt extremity. He could receive no proviſions by ſea, which was beſet by the enemy's victorious fleet, and all convoys by land were intercepted by Pompey's Numidian cavalry. In this extremity he was forced to abandon his camp, without knowing what rout to take. At length he reſolved to march towards Mylæ, which Agrippa had ſeized, but was ſo haraſſed all the way by the enemy's parties, that his men began to deſpair, and gave themſelves up for loſt. Cornificius with his words and example ſupported their drooping courage, till they found themſelves ſhut up by the enemy's troops in a narrow valley, called the fiery brook. As the ground was here covered all over with duſt and aſhes thrown out by mount Ætna, without any ſprings or rivulets, they muſt inevitably have periſhed with thirſt, or ſurrendered at diſcretion, had not the ſuccours ſent by Agrippa, coming very ſeaſonably, diſengaged them from the deſperate condition to which they were reduced. At the approach of the Roman legions, the Numidians retired, leaving Cornificius to purſue his march without the leaſt diſturbance. That general was ſo pleaſed with his retreat, that on his return to Rome, when he happened to ſup at his friends houſes, he always came home mounted, as it were in triumph, on an elephant, having probably made uſe of that warlike animal in his retreat [z].

But relieved by Agrippa.

In the mean time, Octavianus returning to Sicily, had joined Agrippa in the neighbourhood of Tyndaris, where he was encamped with twenty-one legions, two thouſand horſe, and five thouſand light-armed foot. From thence they both marched towards Meſſana, with a deſign to beſiege that place, hoping thereby to draw Pompey to a battle, who had lodged all his military ſtores, proviſions, and treaſures, in that city. As they approached the place, Lepidus, whom Octavianus had acquainted with his deſign, joined them with all his ſea and land forces. This triumvir, ever ſince his firſt landing in the iſland, had given Octavianus juſt reaſons to ſuſpect his intentions. He took indeed, upon his arrival, ſome ſmall places on the coaſt, and and beſieged Plennius in Lilybæum; but afterwards acting only defenſively, he ſuffered Octavianus to carry on the war by himſelf, without offering him the leaſt aſſiſtance, as if he had maintained a private correſpondence with Pompey. However, upon motives, which he diſcovered ſoon after, he approved of Octavianus's plan, and came to join him with all his forces before Meſſana, which city was cloſely inveſted both by ſea and land. Pompey, having aſſembled into one body all the troops he had diſperſed up and down the iſland, poſted himſelf at a ſmall diſtance from Octavianus's camp, and at the ſame time drew together his ſeveral ſquadrons, ordering them to watch the motions of the enemy's fleet which blocked up the mouth of the harbour. After ſeveral motions and ſlight engagements between the fleets as well as the land-forces, Pompey challenged Octavianus to put an end to their differences by a ſea fight with three hundred ſhips on a ſide. This propoſal was no-ways agreeable to Octavianus, who had not hitherto been attended with any great ſucceſs by ſea. However, depending upon the valour and experience of Agrippa on one ſide, and on the other ſuſpecting the fidelity of Lepidus, who had according to ſome twelve, according to others twenty, legions under his command, he accepted the challenge; and a day was appointed for the deciſive action. Great preparations were made on both ſides for an event, which was to decide the fate of the contending parties. When the day agreed on, and impatiently wiſhed for, by the two generals, came, both fleets appeared early in the morning drawn up in battalia between Mylæ and Naulocus; upon which the two armies ran to the ſhore, there being then a kind of truce between them, to behold from thence the action, on which their fate in great meaſure depended. The ſignal was given, and the engagement began with that fury, which is peculiar to men, who are more animated by private hatred and party-rage, as happens in civil wars, than by motives of glory and conqueſt. Agrippa behaved with his uſual bravery, and Pompey, knowing all lay at ſtake, diſtinguiſhed himſelf from the beginning of the action to the end in a very eminent manner. Never was victory diſputed with more obſtinacy, the ſoldiers as well as officers of both parties fighting, after the example of their generals, with incredible reſolution and intrepidity. The ſea was covered to a great diſtance with dead bodies, and nothing was heard but ſhouts of the ſoldiers and mariners encouraging each other, or cries of men

periſhing in the waves. The victory continued long doubtful, but at length all yielded to the valour and ſuperior conduct of Agrippa, Pompey's fleet was put to flight, and that unfortunate Roman obliged, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, to own himſelf conquered. Of his numerous fleet only ſeventeen veſſels eſcaped, the reſt being taken, burnt, or ſunk [a]. Democharés, one of his admirals, was taken priſoner, but laid violent hands on himſelf, to avoid the diſgrace of being led in triumph. Apollophanes, his other admiral, yielded up himſelf and his galley to Agrippa in the very beginning of the action. What became of Papias, another of his freedmen, in whom he placed great truſt, we know not, none of the antients making any mention of him in the account they give us of this great action. As for Menas, he had, long before the battle, with his uſual inconſtancy and perfidiouſneſs abondoned Pompey the ſecond time, and gone over with his ſquadron to Octavianus, who received him, rather to weaken the enemy's party than to ſtrengthen his own; for knowing he was not a man to be truſted, he gave him no command, and diſplaced all the officers of the ſquadron he brought with him. This treacherous wretch, whoſe courage and experience were worthy of a more noble mind, retired, if we believe Horace, with great wealth, and ſerved afterwards in the poſt of a military tribune. The glory of this victory was entirely owing to Agrippa; for Octavianus, if Antony is to be credited, had not the courage even to look at the two navies drawn up in battalia, but in a great fright lay down in his galley with his eyes lifted up to heaven, like one beſide himſelf, and continued in that poſture, till Agrippa had put the enemy to flight. Some writers, to clear their hero from the reproach of cowardice, pretend, that, at the time of the engagement, he was overcome with ſo profound a ſleep, that his friends with much ado waked him to give the word, and the ſignal for the charge. Be that as it will, it would ſeem very ſtrange now-a-days, if the commander in chief of a fleet or army ſhould ſay, by way of excuſe for not diſcharging his duty during any memorable action, that he was aſleep, and did not awake till the battle was over. Octavianus, however, did, in ſome degree, juſtice to the valour of Agrippa, honouring him with a blue ſtandard, and a roſtral crown, that is, a crown, whereof the flower-work repreſented the beaks of galleys. He deſerved indeed a more ſubſtantial reward, having utterly deſtroyed the enemy's numerous fleet with the loſs of three ſhips only of his own; but we ſhall ſoon ſee him raiſed to the greateſt honours of the ſtate, and diſtinguiſhed by Octavianus, when abſolute maſter of Rome, above all the ſubjects of the Roman empire. As for the unhappy Pompey, inſtead of repairing to his land-forces, and encouraging them with his preſence, he left them at the diſcretion of the conqueror, and taking on board his daughter and ſome of his friends who were in Meſſana, together with the treaſures he had lodged in that city, he paſſed the ſtreights in the night, and ſteered his courſe towards Aſia with ſeventeen galleys, the poor remains of a fleet of three hundred and fifty ſail. His deſign was to throw himſelf upon the mercy of Antony, whoſe mother Julia he had formerly received and entertained with great civility, when ſhe abandoned Rome, during the war of Peruſia. Upon his retreat, Tiſienus Gallus, one of his lieutenants, immediately ſubmitted to the conqueror with all the forces under his command. As for Plennius, who commanded eight legions in Lilybæum, upon the firſt news of Pompey's defeat, he marched with incredible expedition to Meſſana, and threw himſelf into the place, before Octavianus or Agrippa had any intelligence of his deſign. But ſeeing there were no hopes of relief, he took the advantage of Octavianus's abſence to capitulate with Lepidus, who granted him honourable conditions, and incorporated the troops he commanded among his own legions. Agrippa, whom Octavianus had left to carry on the ſiege with Lepidus, exclaiming againſt this unfair conduct, intreated him to wait till the arrival of his collegue, which at fartheſt would be, he ſaid, next morning. But Lepidus, without hearkening either to his remonſtrances on entreaties, received Plennius into his camp, and gave up the city to be plundered by his ſoldiers. Octavianus, arriving at break of day, ſent ſome of his friends to his collegue's camp to complain in his name of theſe proceedings. Lepidus, who had now twenty-two legions under his command, anſwered with great haughtineſs, that he would not ſuffer Octavianus to take upon him all the authority of the triumvirate, when he had an equal right to it. Upon this reply Octavianus, having firſt gained over by his emiſſaries the greateſt part of Lepidus's officers, repaired to his camp attended with a ſtrong body of horſe, under pretence of making up matters with him in an amicable manner. He no ſooner appeared, than Plennius's legions, whom he had already found means to debauch, flocked to him, offering him their ſervice. Lepidus, alarmed at this unexpected attempt, fell upon Octavianus at the head of his guards, killed his ſhield-bearer cloſe by him, wounded him, and obliged him to retire in ſome confuſion. However, the next day Lepidus had the mortification to ſee himſelf abandoned by all his troops, who with their enſigns diſplayed marched out of their camp, in good order, to join his rival (P). The unhappy triumvir being thus left alone, quitted all the marks of his authority, and putting on a mourning robe, after having remained ſome time unregarded in the throng of thoſe who made their ſubmiſſions to Octavianus, threw himſelf at the feet of his collegue, and with great meanneſs begged his life, which was granted him with his eſtate, Octavianus deſpiſing him too much to take it from him. Suetonius is the only writer, who ſays, that Octavianus baniſhed him to Circeii, a ſmall town on the coaſt of Latium. That he attained to be one of the ſupreme governors of the Roman empire was entirely owing to fortune, he being a man without any wiſdom, valour, or activity: and therefore, after he had thus fallen from the high ſtation, to which fortune had raiſed him, he was no more regarded, but ended his life in obſcurity and contempt. Thus the whole authority of the triumvirate devolved upon Antony and Octavianus, who held the Roman empire divided between them, the former having all the eaſt from the borders of Illyricum and the Adriatic gulph, and the latter all the reſt [b].

Lepidus abandoned by his ſoldiers, and depoſed.

No Roman general was ever at the head of ſo powerful an army as Octavianus was at this time in Sicily. He had had under his command forty-five legions, twenty-five thouſand horſe, one hundred and ſixty thouſand light-armed foot, and beſides ſix hundred ſhips of war, without counting the ſmaller veſſels, which were without number. His power was now almoſt equal to his ambition; but they were both checked by the inſolence of his ſoldiers, who ſcarce ever failed to allay the joy which his victories gave him, and to put a ſtop to his further conqueſts. The war in Sicily being now at an end, the legionaries, reflecting on their great numbers and ſtrength, began to mutiny, and demand in a tumultuous manner their diſcharge, and the ſame rewards which had been beſtowed on thoſe who had overcome Brutus and Caſſius in the plains of Philippi. Octavianus endeavoured to appeaſe the mutineers, by telling them that he deferred giving them the rewards which were due to their valour, till the return of Antony from the eaſt: adding, that the Illyrians, who had declared war, were to be conquered before any thing elſe could be done. But the mutinous legionaries refuſed to march, till he had ſatisfied their demands. Hereupon the general, being at a loſs what to do, cauſed ſeveral crowns, bracelets, ſpears, &c. to be brought out for ſuch of the ſoldiers as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the war, and ſcarlet robes for the officers; but a tribune, by name Ofilius, told him with a great deal of inſolence, "That he might keep thoſe "bawbles for children; but as for his ſoldiers, nothing "would ſatisfy them but money or land." At theſe words the whole army ſhouted, and Octavianus in a great paſſion came down from his tribunal, and withdrew. The audacious tribune diſappeared that night, and was never after ſeen or heard of, no-body doubting, but he had been privately diſpatched by Octavianus's orders. This made the others more cautious, but not more tractable; for whenever Octavianus appeared, they cried out all with one voice, "Money, or "our diſcharge;" inſomuch, that he was at length obliged to diſmiſs thoſe, whoſe time of ſervice was expired, to the number of twenty thouſand. The others he pacified with large promiſes, and a donative of five hundred drachmas a man, which he levied upon the Sicilians. After this, having ſettled the affairs of Sicily, he returned to Rome, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy: the ſenate in a body met him at the gates, and conducted him to the capitol, followed by all the people crowned with garlands; from the capitol, after he had returned thanks to the gods for the ſucceſs of his arms, they attended him to his palace. The next day he aſſembled the ſenate, according to cuſtom, in the temple of Bellona, where in a ſtudied ſpeech, which he cauſed afterward to be publiſhed, he gave the conſcript fathers an account of his expedition, and aſſured them, that he had undergone ſo many toils and dangers with no other view, but to reſtore peace and tranquility to Rome. When he had ended his ſpeech, he withdrew; and the ſenators, who were no more ſwayed with the love of liberty, but a ſpirit of ſlavery, and the meaneſt flattery, decreed him ſuch honours as he himſelf was aſhamed to aſſume. However, he gave them leave to erect a ſtatue of gold to his honour in the forum with this inſcription; "To Cæſar, for having reſtored peace by "ſea and land," and to appoint an annual feaſt to be celebrated on the day he had overcome Pompey. A triumph was decreed him, but he was ſatisfied with an ovation, which honour he enjoyed on the ides of November [c]. After his ovation, he aſſembled the people, and having returned them thanks for the honour they had beſtowed on him, he leſſened the taxes, and forgave thoſe who had hired houſes of the public all the rents they owed to the treaſury. Thus he began to court the favour of the people at the expence of the public, being determined to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered of cruſhing Antony, as he had done Pompey and Lepidus, and aſſuming the whole power to himſelf. As the city as well as the country had been greatly infeſted, during the late troubles, with thieves and robbers, he charged Sabinus, one of his lieutenants, to purſue them with fire and ſword, and eſtabliſhed at Rome ſeveral companies for the guard of the city under the command of an officer, whom he ſtyled præfectus vigilum. By this means peace and tranquillity were reſtored, not to Rome only, but to all Italy; which together with the plenty he procured, being now maſter of Sicily, gained the affections of the people to ſuch a degree, that ſome cities went even ſo far as to erect altars to their benefactor, eſpecially after one generous action, which inſpired them with an high opinion of his prudence and goodnature. He had found among Pompey's papers a great many letters to him from ſome of the chief men in the ſenate.

(P). Appian tells us, that Octavianus went alone to the camp of Lepidus, depending on his own merit, and the authority he had gained by his victories, Pompey's ſoldiers looking upon him with reſpect and drawing round him. Hereupon Lepidus ordered his guards to diſperſe them, and fall upon Octavianus, who, notwithſtanding the wound he received, went to the place, where the eagles of the legions were kept, and taking one of them, exhorted the legionaries to follow him, which they did accordingly, abandoning their own general.

ſenate. Theſe he brought into the forum, and before all the people threw them unopened into the fire, proteſting, that he ſacrificed his private reſentments to the good of the public. At the ſame time he ſolemny declared, that his intention was to reſign his authority as ſoon as Antony ſhould return from the Parthian war. This declaration, however inſincere, abſolutely gained him the hearts and affections of the undiſcerning multitude, who immediately choſe him tribune of the people for his life, hoping this new dignity might induce him to lay down the more odious title of triumvir. He readily accepted the perpetual tribuneſhip, which rendered his perſon ſacred and inviolable; but put off the ſuppreſſion of the triumvirate till the return of Antony, diſpatching in the mean time Bibulus to impart to him his reſolution. After this Octavianus left Rome, and marched at the head of his army againſt the Illyrians, who had ſhaken off the Roman yoke.

He is choſen perpetual tribune of the people.

During theſe tranſactions at Rome, Pompey occaſioned great diſturbances in the eaſt. From Sicily he ſailed to the iſland of Leſbos, where he was informed of the bad ſucceſs which had attended Antony in his expedition againſt the Parthians. Hereupon he began to entertain thoughts of taking Antony's poſt in the eaſt, or at leaſt of ſharing with him the empire. With this view he ſent embaſſadors to the kings of Pontus, Thrace, and Parthia, ſoliciting their friendſhip, and offering them very advantageous terms. At the ſame time, he drew together what troops he could, giving out that he had no other deſign but to aſſiſt Antony, and defend himſelf againſt Octavianus. Antony, informed of theſe proceedings, commanded Marcus Titius to take upon him the command of the army that was quartered in Sicily, and watch the motions of Pompey. Titius was ordered to receive him with all poſſible marks of honour, if he yielded up himſelf and his troops; but to cut both him and his army in pieces, if he refuſed to ſubmit. But Pompey, before the arrival of Titius, had pulled off the maſk, and taken ſeveral cities of Aſia Minor, among the reſt Nicæa and Nicomedia. Hereupon Titius, taking with him Furnius, Antony's lieutenant in Aſia, marched againſt him, and, having defeated his ſmall army, obliged him to ſurrender at diſcretion. As ſoon as Antony had notice of his being taken, he wrote to Titius to put him to death; but ſoon after changing his mind, he ſent a ſecond letter, ordering his lieutenant to ſave him. But the ſecond meſſenger arriving before the firſt, Titius perverſely interpreting the laſt order he received to be the laſt that was ſent him, put the unfortunate captive to death, being afraid, as he had formerly ſerved under him, but abandoned him to ſide with Antony, leſt he ſhould be once in a condition, if his life were ſpared, to be revenged on him for his treachery. This rendered Titius ſo odious to the Roman people, who ſtill retained a great regard for Pompey and his family, that they could never after bear the ſight of him, but drove him out of the circus with hiſſes and curſes, even while he was exhibiting to them games and ſhews at his own expence [d].

It was believed, that the death of Pompey would have put an end to all civil wars. But the unbounded ambition of Octavianus and Antony ſoon involved the Roman ſtate in new troubles. The paſſion Antony had for Cleopatra, and the extravagant preſents of whole provinces, which he beſtowed on her, ſerved Octavianus for a ſpecious pretence to make war upon him, though his real motive was to get rid of a competitor ſo formidable, both for his valour and the high reputation he had gained among the ſoldiery. Antony had left Octavia in Italy, as we have related above, and paſſed into Syria, whither he invited Cleopatra, and gave her all Phænice, Cæle-Syria, Cyprus, and a great part of Arabia and Judæa. Theſe profuſe gifts much diſpleaſed the Roman people, who daily publiſhed ſcurrilous lampoons, cenſuring his conduct, and turning him into ridicule on account of the ſcandalous life he led with Cleopatra. Soon after he marched againſt the Parthians with thirteen legions, ten thouſand Gauliſh or Spaniſh horſe, and above thirty thouſand light-armed foot. But this mighty army, which made all the eaſt tremble, ſerved only to render his retreat more ſhameful, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of the Parthians [e]. As all the misfortunes he met with in that fatal expedition were owing to his paſſion for Cleopatra, which made him neglect the more proper meaſures, to follow thoſe only, which might haſten his return to that bewitching woman, the Romans were highly incenſed againſt him. But what moſt of all provoked them was his taking Artabazes, king of Armenia, in a moſt treacherous manner, as we have related elſewhere [f], and leading him in triumph into Alexandria, the Romans looking upon the ceremony of triumphing as appropriated wholly to their city. Octavianus took advantage of Antony's impolitic conduct, to eſtrange more and more the minds minds of the people from him; and when he found their ſpirits ſufficiently exaſperated, he reſolved to ſend his ſiſter Octavia to her huſband, that he might have a plauſible pretence to declare war, if he ſhould offer her the affront of ſending her back without ſeeing her. Antony was then returned from his Parthian expedition, and waited at Leucopolis, or, as Plutarch calls it, Leucocome, for the arrival of Cleopatra, whom he had ſent for. The queen arrived at laſt, bringing with her cloaths for the ſoldiers, and vaſt ſums of money to be diſtributed among them. Almoſt at the ſame time Niger, one of Antony's particular friends, arrived from Octavia, who was already come as far as Athens, with letters from her to her huſband; wherein ſhe acquainted him, that ſhe had brought with her cloaths for his ſoldiers, a great many horſes, and rich preſents for his friends and officers, with two thouſand choſen men well armed to recruit the prætorian cohorts. This was very unwelcome news to the queen, who knowing Octavia came only to diſpute with her, and lay in her claim to, Antony's affections, and dreading the preſence of ſo virtuous a rival, feigned a deep melancholy, and pretended to be dying for love of him. When ſhe was near him, ſhe beheld him with languiſhing eyes and a deſpairing countenance, like one beſide herſelf with love. She let fall tears in his preſence, and at the ſame time pretended to dry them up in haſte, and unobſerved, as if ſhe were aſhamed to have him a witneſs of her weakneſs. By theſe artifices the crafty queen gained the aſcendant over Antony, and prevailed upon him to ſend word to Octavia, that ſhe ſhould not purſue her journey into Syria, but to return to Rome. After this he waited on Cleopatra back to Alexandria, where he paſſed the winter with that lewd woman in all manner of luxury, pomp, and voluptuouſneſs.

Octavianus ſtirs up the people againſt him.

Cleopatra prevails upon Antony to ſend back Octavia.

Octavia being returned to Rome, her brother ordered her to quit her huſband's houſe, ſince he had treated her ſo contemptuouſly: but the virtuous Octavia refuſed to obey him, ſaying, that though ſhe had a great reſpect for her brother, yet ſhe could not prevail upon herſelf to comply with his orders; and therefore conjured him not to force her to leave the houſe of a perſon, whom ſhe would always honour as her huſband in ſpite of his inconſtancy: ſhe entreated him to abandon her intereſt, and not make war upon Antony for an affront, which regarded her alone, ſince it would be a ſhameful thing to have it reported, that two of the greateſt commanders in the world had involved the Roman people in a war, the one to juſtify his miſtreſs, the other in reſentment for his ſiſter's ill uſage. Octavianus could not help indulging her virtuous inclinations; he allowed her to continue in her huſband's houſe, where ſhe brought up his children with extraordinary care, without making any diſtinction between her own and thoſe he had by Fulvia. She took under her protection all thoſe whom her huſband ſent to Rome to ſue for offices, aſſiſted their pretenſions with the authority her virtue gave her, and never left importuning her brother, till ſhe had obtained for them what they deſired. But nothing proved more prejudicial to Antony's intereſt than this deportment of Octavia; his injurious treatment of a woman of her rank, merit, and virtue, drew on him the reſentment of all the Romans, who were ſtill more provoked at what he did about this time at Alexandria. For having feaſted the whole people of that great metropolis, he aſſembled them in the gymnaſium, and cauſing a throne of ſilver to be erected there with two ſeats of gold, the one for himſelf, the other for Cleopatra, and lower ſeats at their feet for his children, he proclaimed Cleopatra queen of Egypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Cæle-Syria, and joined with her as her collegue Cæſarion, whom ſhe had by Julius Cæſar. As for his own children by Cleopatra, he gave to Alexander Armenia, Media, Parthia, and the reſt of the eaſtern provinces from the Euphrates to the Indus; to Cleopatra, the twin ſiſter of Alexander, Libya and Cyrene; and to Ptolemy, whom he ſurnamed Philadelphus, Phænice, Syria, Cilicia, and all the countries of the Leſſer Aſia from the Euphrates to the Helleſpont; and he conferred on each of them the title of "king of kings." What ſeemed moſt remarkable in this ſolemnity was, that Cleopatra appeared dreſt like the goddeſs Iſis, and Antony like the god Oſiris; and from that time both frequently gave audience to the people, in the attire which was thought peculiar to thoſe deities [p]. Octavianus, taking advantage of the general reſentment againſt Antony, which this diviſion of provinces occaſioned at Rome, accuſed him before the ſenate and people of this and ſeveral other attempts highly injurious to the majeſty of the Roman empire; which Antony being informed of, ſent ſome of his friends to Rome to plead his cauſe, and accuſe Octavianus in his turn. The chief articles he preferred againſt him were, 1. That he had not ſhared with him the iſland of Sicily, which was lately taken from Pompey. 2. That he had not made reſtitution of the ſhips he had lent him: 3. That having abrogated the power of Lepidus his collegue, collegue, he had appropriated to himſelf his army, his government, and revenues: Laſtly, that he had divided almoſt all Italy among his own ſoldiers, and reſerved nothing for his. To theſe accuſations Octavianus anſwered, that he had not diſmiſſed Lepidus from his government, till he had made it appear that he was unfit to govern; that as to what he had got by the war, he would divide it with Antony, when he gave him his ſhare of Armenia; and as for Antony's ſoldiers, they could not ſurely value or claim a few acres of land in Italy, after they had conquered all Media, and reduced the wealthy empire of the Parthians by the mighty exploits they had performed, under the conduct of their invincible general. Antony was ſo provoked at this biting jeſt, that though he had already marched as far as the river Araxes with a deſign to invade Parthia, he dropt that expedition, and ordered Canidius, one of his lieutenants, to march forthwith at the head of ſixteen legions down to the coaſts of the Ionian ſea, and there keep himſelf in a readineſs to paſs over into Europe at a day's warning. As for Antony himſelf, he haſtened with Cleopatra to Epheſus, where his lieutenants had got together eight hundred veſſels, of which the queen furniſhed two hundred with twenty thouſand talents and proviſions for the whole army. Antony was adviſed by his friends to ſend back Cleopatra into Egypt, there to expect the event of the war; but ſhe, dreading a peace might be made in her abſence, upon condition of Antony's receiving again Octavia and excluding her, prevailed upon Canidius with a large ſum of money to repreſent to Antony, that it was not juſt to d[illegible] away a princeſs with diſgrace, who bore ſo great a part in the charge of the war; that it would be highly impolitic to diſoblige the Egyptians, who made up ſo conſiderable a part of his naval forces; and finally, that Cleopatra was not inferior to any of the kings who attended him, in prudence and good ſenſe, as was manifeſt from her governing ſo mighty a kingdom by herſelf. It was owing to Octavianus's good fortune and Antony's evil deſtiny, that this counſel took place. Cleopatra was allowed to ſtay, and they both left Epheſus, and ſet ſail for Samos, the place of the general rendezvous. Thither all the kings, princes, and nations from Egypt to the Euxine ſea, and from Armenia to Illyricum, were ordered to ſend men, arms, and proviſions. It was at the ſame time proclaimed, that all ſtage-players, dancers, ſingers, buffoons, &c. ſhould repair to the ſame iſland; ſo that ſometimes a ſhip, which was thought to be laden with ſoldiers and warlike ſtores, proved fraught with ſcenes, machines for the ſtage, muſicians, ans, and players. Thus, while the reſt of the world was in tears, and in great dread of the approaching war, joy and all kind of pleaſures reigned at Samos, as if they had abandoned all other places to reſide there. Thither each city, within the limits of Antony's government, was ordered to ſend an ox to be offered in ſacrifice; and the kings, who attended him, were in a perpetual diſpute who ſhould make the moſt magnificent feaſts: inſomuch, that it became a common queſtion among the ſpectators, "What will they do by way "of triumph after the victory, ſince they make ſuch rejoyc-"ings at the opening of a dangerous war [q]?"

And Athens.

FROM Samos, Antony ſailed for Athens, where he lived after his uſual manner, ſpending his whole time in luxury and voluptuouſneſs. Cleopatra, who accompanied him, being jealous of the honours Octavia had received at Athens, inſinuated herſelf, with all the civilities imaginable, into the favour of the Athenians, who in requital decreed her honours beyond the condition of mortals, and deputed ſeveral of the citizens to wait upon her at her houſe with the decree. At the head of this deputation was Antony himſelf, he being free of Athens: and, as he was choſen their ſpeaker, he harangued the queen in the name of the people. While he was at Athens, C. Soſius and Domitius Ahenobarbus, the conſuls of this year, were obliged to leave Rome, not thinking themſelves ſafe there, after they had taken upon them to defend Antony. They both took refuge in Athens, and incenſed Antony to ſuch a degree againſt Octavianus, that he ſolemnly divorced Octavia, and ſent proper officers to Rome to drive her out of his houſe. The virtuous Octavia obeyed without complaining, and retired to her own houſe with all his children, except Antyllus, his eldeſt ſon by Fulvia, who was with his father. She only lamented her hard fate, in ſeeing herſelf looked upon as one of the cauſes of a civil war. But men of penetration well knew, that there was only one true cauſe of the preſent breach, viz. Octavianus's unbounded ambition, which, not ſatisfied with one-half of the Roman empire, aſpired at the whole. But he had certainly been diſappointed, had not Antony, according to his cuſtom, ſpent ſo much time in idleneſs and debauchery, at Samos and Athens, with that bewitching woman, who at length was the occaſion of his ruin. Had Antony come immediately to a final deciſion, he muſt unavoidably have carried the day, he having then with him a powerful fleet and a numerous army, whereas his rival had not yet made any preparations for a war; and beſides all Italy was in a ferment, on account of the extraordinary taxes which he was forced to lay on the people, for the raiſing of the neceſſary ſums; inſomuch, that it was looked upon as one of the greateſt of Antony's overſights, that he put off the war till the next ſummer, by which time Octavianus, having quieted the people, put himſelf in a condition of diſputing the empire, with forces equal to thoſe of his enemy [r].

Antony is forſaken by ſeveral of his friends.

DURING Antony's ſtay at Athens, many of his friends, being ill uſed by Cleopatra for oppoſing her deſign of attending Antony in the war, abandoned him, and came over to Octavianus, among the reſt Plancus, and Titius his nephew. Plancus on his arrival at Rome accuſed Antony before the ſenate of ſeveral crimes, with ſo much venom and bitterneſs, that Coponius could not forbear ſaying to him, "Surely "you never obſerved what you now lay to Antony's charge, "till the evening before your departure," reproaching him thereby either with baſeneſs, in enduring thoſe crimes ſo long, or with ſtupidity, in not finding them out ſooner (Q). Pollio's conduct was as generous, as Plancus's was infamous. Pollio had abandoned Antony, and led a private life in Italy, ever ſince his firſt intrigues with Cleopatra; but yet, when Octavianus

(Q). Plancus was one of Cleopatra's moſt ſervile flatterers, and had been privy to all Antony's intrigues, debaſing himſelf to the meaneſt employments about him, even to the writing of his love-letters to the queen and to other women. Though he had been conſul, commander in chief of an army, and governor of a province, he was not aſhamed to appear at the Egyptian court among common actors, buffoons, and ſtage-players, all wretches, whoſe birth was as mean as their profeſſion. At a public entertainment, to curry favour with the queen, he took upon him to perſonate Glaucus, and, having painted his body green, danced quite naked on the public theatre, with a crown of reeds on his head, trailing behind him the tail of a huge fiſh. This behaviour, highly unbecoming a man of his age and quality, made him appear contemptible in the eyes of the Egyptians themſelves. Beſides, Antony abuſed and reproached him for ſome extortions, whereof he had been accuſed; which, as he was already deſpiſed by the Egyptians, he took ſo much amiſs, that he laid hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to abandon Antony, and join Octavianus, who received him with great demonſtration of friendſhip and affection.

Octavianus preſſed him to ſerve under him in this war, he anſwered frankly, "I have ſerved Antony better perhaps "than he has rewarded me; however, as the favours I "have received at his hands are more known than the ſer-"vices I have done him, to avoid the imputation of ingra-"titude, I will not take up arms againſt him, but quietly "wait the event of the war, and be at the diſcretion of "the conqueror." Antony had made a will in favour of Cleopatra, and highly injurious and diſhonourable to the Roman people, and lodged it with the veſtals at Rome. Plancus and Titius, who had been privy to all his ſecret counſels and deſigns, gave notice of it to Octavianus, who immediately demanded it. The religious veſtals anſwered, that they could not deliver it up, without a ſacrilegious breach of the truſt repoſed in them; but that Octavianus might, if he thought fit, come and ſeize it himſelf; which he did accordingly; and having firſt read it over in private, and made marks upon thoſe places which he thought moſt for his purpoſe, he called the ſenate, and cauſed it to be read to them. In this will Antony declared, that Cæſarion, Cæſar's ſon by Cleopatra, was born in lawful wedlock, and therefore was the true heir of Julius Cæſar. This was diſpoſſeſſing Octavianus of the inheritance which he held, only as the adopted ſon of the dictator. By the ſame will he bequeathed moſt of the Roman territories, which were under his command, to Cleopatra and her children; and moreover ordered his body, where-ever he ſhould die, though at Rome itſelf, to be ſent into Egypt to Cleopatra, there to be buried, as he ſhould direct. Octavianus inſiſted more eſpecially on that part of the will which related to his funeral, and on his robbing the Roman people of their provinces, to enrich a foreign princeſs, who was an enemy to Rome. As theſe charges were undeniably made good from an authentic inſtrument, they eſtranged from him the minds of many, who had hitherto pleaded his cauſe with great zeal. Some of his friends, however, took his part, declaring, that they thought it an extraordinary and unprecedented way of proceeding to puniſh a man in his life-time, for what was not to be put in execution till after his death. Hereupon Caius Calviſius accuſed him of ſeveral other crimes, viz. that he had made a preſent to Cleopatra of the famous library of the kings of Pergamus, conſiſting of two hundred thouſand volumes; that he had ſuffered the Epheſians to give her the title of their queen; that he had frequently quently at the public audience of kings and princes received love-letters from Cleopatra, and read them on his tribunal; that one day, when Furnius, an orator of great eloquence and authority among the Romans, was pleading before him, he left him and the audience in the middle of their cauſe to follow Cleopatra, who happened to paſs by in her chair; that at a ſolemn feaſt he had riſen from table, and trod upon her foot, which all the gueſts looked upon as the ſignal of a private meeting, &c. The heads of this accuſation, however ridiculous they may ſeem at preſent, were ſeriouſly propoſed by Calviſius, and appeared of ſuch moment and weight to Antony's friends, that they ſent one Geminius to him to let him know, that his affairs required him to be more circumſpect, and that, unleſs he altered his conduct, he was in danger of being deprived of the office of conſul, to which he had been named for the year enſuing, of being ſtripped of all his governments, and declared an enemy to the Roman people. The arrival of Geminius alarmed Cleopatra, who, looking upon him as one of Octavia's ſpies, ridiculed him, and made him the conſtant jeſt of the table, where ſhe took care to have him always placed at the lower end. Geminius bore all her affronts and outrages with great patience, in hopes of finding at length an opportunity of talking with Antony in private. But he, inſtead of giving him a private audience, aſked him one night at a full table, what had brought him to Athens? "The buſineſs I come upon," ſaid he, "well deſerves a "ſerious conſideration, and is not to be talked of over a "bottle. One thing, however, I am charged by your "friends to tell you, which you may hear as well drunk "as ſober; your affairs will bear a much better face, if "you ſend back Cleopatra into Egypt. You have done "very wiſely, Geminius," anſwered the queen in a great paſſion, "to tell us this important ſecret, without waiting "till it was extorted from you on the rack." A few days after Geminius, dreading the effects of Cleopatra's diſpleaſure, made his eſcape and returned to Rome, whither he was followed by many of Antony's friends, no longer able to bear with the ill uſage they received from the imperious queen. Among theſe were Marcus Syllanus and Dellius the hiſtorian. The latter had ſaid at an entertainment, where the wine was not to his mind, that Antony's friends drank vinegar, while at Rome Sarmentus was ſerved with Falernian wine. This Sarmentus is mentioned by Horace

War declared againſt Cleopatra.

And now Octavianus, finding himſelf in a condition to encounter Antony with equal forces, no longer delayed declaring war; but cauſed it to be decreed only againſt Cleopatra, for fear of provoking Antony's friends, who were ſtill very numerous and powerful. However, Antony was deprived of the conſulate, and his government was taken from him, for ſuffering himſelf to be ruled by a woman. The decree implied beſides, that Cleopatra had ſo bewitched Antony with her charms and potions, as to bereave him of his ſenſes; and that Antony was not to manage the war againſt the Romans, but Mardion the eunuch, Photinus, and Iras, Cleopatra's waiting-women, and Charmion, another of her maids, who were become Antony's counſellors and prime miniſters of ſtate [u]. It is ſaid, that this war was preceded by many ſigns and prodigies (R), which were all interpreted very juſtly, but not before Antony's defeat.

(R) The city of Piſaurum, where Antony had ſettled a colony, was ſwallowed up by an earthquake: a marble ſtatue of Antony at Alba was obſerved to ſweat for many days together. While he himſelf was in the city of Patræ, the temple of Hercules was deſtroyed by lightning, and at Athens the ſtatue of Bacchus was by a violent wind blown out of the Gigantomachia, and carried into the theatre. The Gigantomachia was a public edifice at Athens, where the battle of the gods with the giants was repreſented in painting. Theſe two latter prodigies were looked upon as very bad omens for Antony, who pretended to derive his pedigree from Hercules, and made a profeſſion of imitating Bacchus, cauſing himſelf for that reaſon to be called "young Bac-" chus." The ſame ſtorm falling at Athens upon the ſtatues of Eumenes and Attalus, which had been dedicated to Antony, and were called Antonii, overturned them, without hurting others, that ſtood equally expoſed. empire they ſhared between them. Antony had under his command all the provinces from the Euphrates and Armenia to the Ionian ſea and Illyricum, and from Cyrene to Æthiopia. Octavianus's government extended from Illyricum to the ocean, and comprehended all the coaſt of Africa that was oppoſite to Italy, Gaul, and Spain. Many kings followed Antony's fortune, and attended him in this war; namely Bocchus king of Mauritania, Tarcondemus or Tarcondimotus of Upper Cilicia, Archelaus of Cappadocia, Philadelphus of Paphlagonia, Mithridates of Comagene, Adallas of Thrace. Theſe attended him in perſon: but Polemon king of Pontus, Malchus king of Arabia, Herod king of Judæa, Amyntas king of Lycaonia and Galatia, only ſent their quotas of forces. All theſe together made up an army of an hundred thouſand foot and twelve thouſand horſe. His navy conſiſted of five hundred ſhips of war, ſome whereof had eight, and ſome ten banks of oars. As for Octavianus, he had no foreign princes in his army, which amounted only to eighty thouſand foot, but was as ſtrong in cavalry as the enemy's. He had no more than two hundred and fifty ſhips, but thoſe light, and well manned with ſailors, rowers, and ſoldiers; whereas Antony's ſeemed built for oſtentation, and, beſides, were but very indifferently manned, his officers having been obliged, for want of mariners, to preſs in Greece, which had been exhauſted long before, carriers, labourers, and even boys; and for all this his veſſels had not their full compliment [w].

They write ſharp letters to each other.

BEFORE theſe two mighty fleets and armies came to engage, a paper war broke out, on what occaſion we know not, between the generals, who wrote very ſharp and reflecting letters to each other. Octavianus reproached Antony with the prodigality of his entertainments and his intrigues with Cleopatra. Antony, on the other hand, put Octavianus in mind of the famous entertainment of the twelve gods, at which he preſided dreſt like Apollo, while the other gueſts, women as well as men, appeared in the attire of gods and goddeſſes, and paſſed the night in the moſt infamous debaucheries (S). To this he added his haſty haſty marriage with Livia againſt all rules of decency; his divorcing Scribonia, becauſe ſhe would not bear with the capricious humour of that new miſtreſs; and on this occaſion all the Roman ladies, with whom Octavianus had ever carried on intrigues, were brought upon the ſtage. Antony in one of his letters reproached him with the cowardice he had betrayed, in all the engagements at which he had been preſent, mentioning thoſe ſhameful circumſtances of which we have taken notice above. Hereupon Octavianus wrote to him, that it was childiſh to fight any longer with the pen; but that, if he would approach at the head of his army, he ſhould be ſuffered to land in Italy without moleſtation, that his fleet ſhould have ſafe ports, and his land-forces ground enough to encamp on and put themſelves in order of battle. In return to theſe bravadoes, Antony challenged his rival to a ſingle combat, though he was much older; and ſent him word, that, if he declined the challenge, he was ready to meet him at the head of his army in battle-array in the plains of Pharſalia, where Cæſar and Pompey had formerly decided their quarrel. However, nothing was done this year; Octavianus aſſembled with his fleet and army at Brunduſium, and Antony came as far as Corcyra to meet him; but, the ſummer being far ſpent and the tempeſtuous ſeaſon of the year approaching, they both retired and put their armies into winter-quarters [x].

Octavianus's third conſulate.

In the mean time, the conſular year expiring, Octavianus cauſed himſelf to be declared conſul for the third time, and took M. Valerius Meſſala for his collegue in the room of Antony, who was to enjoy that dignity this year, according to the agreement made between the two triumvirs and Pompey, of which we have ſpoken above. Meſſala reſigned the faſces on the calends of May to M. Titius, who had abandoned Antony together with Plancus, and Titius on the calends of October yielded his office to one Cn. Pompeius, of whoſe deſcent or ſervices no mention is made in hiſtory.

great noiſe at Rome, and had been the ſubject of many ſatirical epigrams. Antony had never been guilty of more infamous and ſcandalous debaucheries, than Octavianus was on this occaſion.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, both armies took the field, and the fleets put to ſea. Antony's fleet ſailed into the Ambracian gulph, between the iſlands of Corcyra and Cephalenia, and his army encamped at Actium near his fleet. Actium was a ſmall city on the ſouth ſide of the mouth of the gulph in Acarnania. While Antony's fleet was at anchor there, Octavianus, croſſing the Ionian ſea, ſurpriſed Toryne, a ſmall city near Actium. This unexpected attempt occaſioned great confuſion in Antony's camp, by reaſon only a few legions were yet arrived, and they had not news of the reſt. But Cleopatra, to calm their fears turned it into a jeſt; „ Indeed," ſaid ſhe " we " ought to tremble, now that Cæſar has taken Toryne " (T), alluding to the word Toryne, which in the language of that country ſignifies a ladle. The next morning, as ſoon as it was light, Octavianus appeared off Actium with his ſhips in order of battle. As Antony's legions were not yet arrived, he had but a ſmall number of ſoldiers on board his fleet, and conſequently muſt unavoidably have been defeated, had Octavianus attacked him. To divert him therefore for the preſent from engaging, which he knew was no difficult matter in the abſence of Agrippa, he armed all his rowers and mariners, placed them on the decks, and ſailed up into the mouth of the gulph, as if he intended to fall upon the enemy; which Octavianus no ſooner obſerved, than he retreated, as Antony had expected. Octavianus's land-forces were encamped on the other ſide of the mouth of the gulph of Ambracia, at a place where Octavianus afterwards built, in memory of his victory, a city which he called " Nicopolis," or " the city of victory." While he lay there, Antony, who was well acquainted with the country, found means to cut off the water from his camp, which much diſtreſſed his army [y]. In the mean time, the brave Agrippa, with a ſquadron and a conſiderable body of land-forces, ravaged the coaſts of Greece, intercepted all the convoys that were coming to Antony from Egypt, Syria, and Aſia, and making deſcents, ſtormed ſeveral cities, among the reſt Me-

(T) It is impoſſible to preſerve the beauty of this alluſion in our language. thona in Peloponneſus, where Bogud, king of Mauritania, who had ſided with Antony and defended the place, was killed, and the numerous garriſon cut in pieces. From Methona Agrippa ſailed for Leucas, at a ſmall diſtance from Actium, and in the ſight of Antony made himſelf maſter of that iſland and the ſhips he found there. The cities of Patræ and Corinth were likewiſe forced to ſubmit to him, after he had defeated Q. Naſidius, whom Antony had ſent to ſtop the progreſs of his conqueſts. As he was returning from the coaſts of Greece to join Octavianus, he fell in with Soſius, one of Antony's admirals, who had juſt put to flight L. Taureſius, whom Octavianus had ſent out with a numerous ſquadron to watch the enemy's motions. Agrippa attacked him with his uſual bravery, took ſome of his ſhips, ſunk others, and diſperſed the reſt. In this engagement Soſius himſelf periſhed, and with him Tarcondimotus king of Cilicia. At the ſame time, a great body of Antony's cavalry, commanded by himſelf, was defeated by a detachment of Octavianus's cavalry under the command of Titius and Statilius Taurus. Theſe advantages, and the arrival of Agrippa with his victorious ſquadron, induced Antony to abandon in the night-time the camp which he had fortified over againſt the enemy's, and retire to Actium on the other ſide of the Ambracian gulf, where the greateſt part of his army lay. While he continued at Actium, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, ſeeing his fleet ſo unfortunate in every thing that was undertaken, and himſelf ſpending his whole time with Cleopatra, abandoned him and went over to Octavianus. Among theſe were the kings Amyntas and Dejotarus, and Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus, the laſt years conſul, who, notwithſtanding his affection to Antony, could no longer bear with the haughty and inſolent behaviour of Cleopatra. The unexpected deſertion of Domitius, whom Antony looked upon as one of his beſt friends, ſtung him to the heart: however, his carriage to him was very generous, and much againſt the will of Cleopatra; for he ſent after him his whole equipage, with his friends and ſervants; which ſo ſenſibly touched Domitius, who was ſick of a fever when he fled, that he ſoon after died, his diſtemper being encreaſed by the grief of abandoning a man, who by kindneſs requited his infidelity and deſertion. The flight of Domitius proved extremely prejudicial to Antony's intereſt, moſt men believing, that a perſon of his underſtanding and penetration would never have abandoned him, had he not thought the ruin of his party inevitable. Antony now began to diſtruſt even his beſt friends, and cauſed ſome of them upon bare ſuſpicions to be put to death; namely Jamblichus, a petty king of Arabia, who expired upon the rack, and Q. Poſthumius, a ſenator of diſtinction [z].

Canidius adviſes Antony to diſmiſs Cleopatra, and retire.

At length Canidius, commander in chief of Antony's forces, arrived with the reſt of the legions, and ſoon after his arrival, as he ſaw the danger nearer, changed his mind with relation to Cleopatra. He adviſed Antony by all means to ſend her back, and retire himſelf into Thrace and Macedon, there to decide the quarrel in the open fields with his land-forces; the rather, becauſe Dicomes, king of the Getæ, was ready to join him with a great army. "It "will not," ſaid he to Antony, "be any diſparagement "to you to quit the ſea, and leave Octavianus maſter of "it, who in his wars with Pompey has gained ſo great ex- "perience in maritime affairs. But it will be renounc- "ing both ſenſe and reaſon for you, who are one of the "moſt experienced land-officers in the world, to make "no other uſe of your well diſciplined and ſtout troops, "than to diſperſe them on board ſeveral ſhips, and render "them uſeleſs in the defence of a navy. What can be "more ridiculous, more abſurd, than to depend upon the "ſea and winds for a victory, which the valour and ex- "perience of your ſoldiers, whom you have tried in ſo "many dangers, leave you no room to doubt of by land?"

But Antony reſolves upon a fight at ſea.

Antony was very much inclined to follow the advice of his prudent and faithful general; but Cleopatra, whoſe words were oracles with him, biaſſed him the other way, and obliged him, againſt his own judgment, to hazard the empire and his life in a ſea-fight. The perfidious and cowardly queen already entertained thoughts of flying, as Plutarch informs us, and was deliberating, not how to be aſſiſting to Antony in obtaining the victory, but how ſhe might, when all was loſt, make her eſcape with greateſt ſafety [a]. Antony, being now determined to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement by ſea, went often from his camp to the place where his fleet rid at anchor, ſometimes alone, and ſometimes attended only by ſome of his particular friends, as ſuſpecting no danger. One of Octavianus's ſlaves, having by chance obſerved him, ran immediately to his maſter, and told him, that he had ſeen Antony walking, without any diſtruſt and ſlenderly attended, from his camp to the ſea-ſide. Hereupon Octavianus the ſame night ordered a party of choſen men to croſs the gulph, which at the entrance was but a mile over, and lie in wait for Antony on the narrow neck of land which led from his camp to the ſea. His orders were put in execution with ſuch ſecrecy, and the whole affair ſo well conducted, that had it not been for the impatience of ſome ſoldiers, who ſtarted up too ſoon, they had ſeized on Antony, and put an end to the war without ſhedding a drop of blood? for they took the officer who juſt walked before him, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that Antony himſelf got off [b]

Antony in danger of falling into the enemy's hands.

AND now Antony being determined, out of a ſhameful complaiſance for Cleopatra, and againſt his own opinion as well as that of all his officers, to try his fortune by ſea, began to make the neceſſary preparations for an action, on the ſucceſs whereof depended the empire of the Roman world. As he was well acquainted with the effeminacy of the Egyptians, he was afraid they would turn their backs as ſoon as the fight began; and therefore he ſet fire to all their ſhips, except ſixty, which he ſpared, that they might ſerve as a guard for the queen. Out of the other ſquadrons from Syria, Greece, Cilicia, the kingdom of Pergamus, and Phænice, he choſe the beſt galleys from three ranks of oars to ten. The reſt he condemned to the flames for want of mariners. While he was reviewing the troops that were to embarque, an old experienced officer, who had fought often under him, and had his body covered all over with ſcars, called to him aloud, and addreſſed him thus: "O my noble general, why do you miſtruſt theſe "wounds and this ſword, ſo as to put your confidence in "rotten wood? Leave the water to the Egyptians and "Phœnicians, men born and nurſed up in that element; "but give us Romans the land, where we are accuſtom-"ed to brave death, and make our enemies fly before us." Antony returned no anſwer; only, by his looks and the motion of his hand, he ſeemed to bid him be of good heart, though he himſelf was far from being ſatisfied with the poſture of his affairs, as manifeſtly appeared from his behaviour towards the pilots, who were for leaving their ſails behind; but Antony obliged them to take them with them, ſaying, "We muſt not let one enemy eſcape;" which was putting a good face upon a bad cauſe [c].

AND now both fleets were ready to engage; but a violent ſtorm, which continued for four days together, prevented them. On the fifth, the ſea being calm, they advanced towards each other in good order. Gellius Publicola commanded Antony's right wing, Cœlius the left, and Marcus Octavius and Marcus Juſteius the main body. On Octavianus's ſide, Agrippa was placed in the centre, having Larius on his right, and Aruntius on his left. As for Octavianus and Antony, they were both, according to ſome writers, in the right wing of their reſpective fleets; according to others, they choſe no particular place for themſelves; but went each in a light veſſel from one diviſion to another, encouraging their men, and putting them in mind of their former exploits and victories (U). "This day," ſaid Antony to his "men before the engagement, "I expect the empire of "the world from your valour, and promiſe you rewards an- "ſwerable to ſo noble a conqueſt." Octavianus gave no leſs hopes to his men, and with more confidence, having been animated by an happy omen, which he cauſed to be publiſhed

throughout the fleet (W). Antony ordered the commanders of his ſhips to receive the enemy without ſtirring, but lying ſtill as at anchor, and to keep within the mouth of the gulph. Agrippa was not for attacking him in that poſture; and therefore kept about eight furlongs diſtant from the enemy till noon, when a gentle gale ſpringing up, Antony's men, impatient of further delays, and truſting to the bulk and height of their ſhips, put their left wing in motion. Agrippa beheld this with great ſatisfaction, and ordered his right wing to bear back, on purpoſe to draw the enemy as far out of the ſtreights as poſſible, that his galleys, which were light and nimble ſailors, might have an opportunity of ſurrounding Antony's heavy ſhips, whoſe bulk and want of hands in proportion to their rates made them unwieldy and unfit for ſervice. On this ſide the action began; but in a different manner from what was then uſed in ſea-fights: there was no boarding, or running one ſhip againſt another, Antony's veſſels being, on account of their ſize, incapable of a violent motion, and, on the other hand, Octavianus's ſhips not daring to approach them for fear of ſplitting againſt their ſides, which were armed with ſtrong ſquare pieces of wood faſtened together with maſſy pins of iron; ſo that this engagement reſembled a land-fight, or rather the attack of ſome ſtrong place. Octavianus's ſoldiers attacked the enemy with pikes, javelins, darts, and ſeveral inventions of fire, which they threw among them, while Antony's men defended themſelves with ſhowers of darts and arrows, which they diſcharged from their wooden towers. In the mean time, Agrippa ordered Aruntius to extend his left wing, and endeavour

Battle of Actium. Year of the flood, 2973. Before Chriſt 26. Of Rome 722.

(W) We are told, that as Octavianus was going out of his tent at break of day to viſit the fleet, he met a countryman driving an aſs. Being moved with curioſity, or rather ſuperſtition, he aſked the man's name "My name," replied he, "is Eutyches, and my aſs is called Nicon." The firſt of theſe names in Greek ſignifies happy, and the other conqueror. This ſeemed ſo lucky an omen to Octavianus, that he no longer doubted of victory; and when afterwards he erected a trophy in that place, with the beaks of the ſhips he had taken, he cauſed two ſtatues of braſs to be erected, one repreſenting the man, and the other his aſs (100). Pliny adds (1), that as Octavianus was ſacrificing before the battle, the victim was found to have a double liver.

(100) Idem ibid. Suet. in Octav. c. 96. (1) Plin. l. xi. c. 37.

endeavour to hem in the enemy; which made Publicola advance to prevent it; but as by this motion he left the main body unguarded, Agrippa bore in upon it and put it in diſorder. However, the victory ſtill remained doubtful, Antony's ſoldiers, who were all choſen men, defending themſelves with incredible valour, and making a dreadful havock of all who attempted to approach them. The fight laſted ſeveral hours, with as fair a proſpect of ſucceſs for Antony as for Octavianus, the mariners and ſoldiers on board the two fleets being encouraged by the ſhouts of their reſpective armies, who waited the event of the engagement drawn up in battle array, the one on the north ſide, and the other on the ſouth ſide, of the Ambracian gulph. While the two parties were thus contending with great fury and obſtinacy, for victory, Cleopatra's ſixty galleys, crouding all their ſails, advanced unexpectedly between the two fleets. This ſudden motion equally ſurpriſed both navies. Antony, whoſe centre was already in diſorder, expected ſome gallant action from the queen, who had brought him into the preſent danger. He was therefore ſtruck with amazement, when he ſaw the whole Egyptian ſquadron, inſtead of falling upon the enemy, tack about, and with a fair wind ſteer their courſe towards Peloponneſus. Thus hiſtorians relate the flight and deſertion of the Egyptians, without giving any other reaſon for their abandoning, in ſo baſe and ſhameful a manner, the party they had embraced, than the timorouſneſs of their queen, who could no longer bear the noiſe and terror of the battle. What they add is ſtill more ſurpriſing. Antony had given too many proofs of his courage ever to be ſuſpected of cowardice; and on this occaſion not only the empire of the world, but his life, was at ſtake: neither had he any reaſon to deſpair of ſucceſs; but, on the contrary, the intrepidity and reſolution with which his men maintained the combat ſeemed to promiſe him certain victory; for tho' his centre had been put into ſome diſorder by Agrippa, yet that brave and experienced commander, notwithſtanding his utmoſt efforts, could not gain the leaſt advantage over them, each of Antony's great ſhips defending themſelves againſt many of his, and keeping them at a diſtance with inceſſant ſhowers of darts, arrows, ſtones, &c. which did great execution. But here Antony betrayed a weakneſs hardly to be imagined, and confirmed, as Plutarch obſerves, the antient ſaying, "that "a lover's ſoul lives in another body;" for, love getting the better of his ambition and of all other regards, he no ſooner

As ſoon as he came up with Cleopatra's galley, he was taken on board; but, without ſo much as ſeeing her, he placed himſelf at the ſtern, and there, leaning his elbows on his knees and his head on both his hands, as one confounded with anger and ſhame for his ill conduct, he continued a good while in that melancholy poſture [d].

Who is followed by Antony.

The gallant behaviour of Antony's troops.

The gallant behaviour of Antony's troops on this occaſion cannot be ſufficiently admired and commended; for tho' their general had abandoned them, and the report of his flight was ſpread all over the fleet, yet they fought with the ſame ardour and intrepidity as if he had been preſent, and would in all likelihood have gained the victory, which they diſputed till late at night, if a ſtiff gale, which blew hard a-ſtern, had not diſperſed their veſſels, and given the enemy an opportunity of falling upon them, while in diſorder and deſtitute of a leader to rally them. Three hundred ſhips yielded to the conqueror; but there were not above five thouſand of the enemy ſlain in the whole action, as Octavianus himſelf left recorded in his commentaries quoted by Plutarch [e] (X). Antony's land-forces ſhewed no leſs fidelity and affection for their general, than his marines had done. They could not be brought to believe, that a general, who had nineteen legions entire and twelve thouſand horſe, could baſely deſert them, and Antony above all, who had ſo often ſeen fortune in all her ſhapes as Plutarch expreſſes it, and been ſo accuſtomed to changes. They therefore expected he would ſoon appear from ſome part or other, and, putting himſelf at their head, give them an opportunity of ſhewing their fidelity and zeal for his intereſt and ſervice.

When they were at laſt thoroughly perſuaded that he was fled and had deſerted them, they nevertheleſs kept in a body, tho' quite ſurrounded both by ſea and land, for ſeven days together, without hearkening to the advantageous offers made them by Octavianus. At length, being abandoned by Canidius and all their chief officers, who privately made their eſcape, they liſtened to the conditions which Octavianus offered them, and were incorporated among his legions. Such was the famous ſea-fight of Actium, ſo much ſpoken of by the antients, eſpecially the poets of that time [f]. It was fought on the ſecond day of September of the year 722 of Rome, Cæſar Octavianus and Meſſala Corvinus being conſuls. As Octavianus, by this ever memorable victory, became ſole maſter of the whole Roman empire, Dion [g], Suetonius, and after them Aurelius Victor and Eutropius, reckon from this time the years of Octavianus's empire or reign.

And his land-forces ſubmit.

AFTER this defeat, the auxiliaries, who had ſerved under Antony, retired to their reſpective countries, and afterwards made their peace with the conqueror, on the beſt terms they could. Some of the princes he depoſed, others he continued in their former ſtate; but impoſed upon them, as well as upon all the free ſtates which had ſided with Antony, heavy fines, whereby thoſe unhappy countries were reduced to a moſt deplorable condition. As for the Romans, Octavianus pardoned ſome at the earneſt entreaties of his friends and his mother Mucia; others he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, following therein the natural biaſs of his temper. Among the latter was the ſon of the famous Curio, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the moſt zealous partizans of Cæſar the dictator, and had loſt his life in maintaining his intereſt in Africa, as we have related above. His ſon followed the fortune of Antony, and therefore, being taken priſoner at Actium, Octavianus, without any regard to the important ſervices of his father, cauſed him to be put to death [h]. As to Antony and Cleopatra, Octavianus, the next morning after the battle, finding his victory complete, detached a ſquadron of light galleys in purſuit of them; which Antony no ſooner ſaw rowing up to him, than he commanded his pilot to tack about and face them. Hereupon they all gave back, except one commanded by Eurycles the Laconian, who, making up to Antony's veſſel with great fierceneſs and intrepidity, from off the

the deck ſhook his lance at him in a threatening manner; "Who art thou," cried Antony from the ſtern, "who haſt "the boldneſs to purſue me thus? I am," anſwered he, "Eurycles the ſon of Lachares, brought hither by Cæſar's "fortune to revenge my father's death." This Lachares had been condemned to death by Antony for a robbery. However the Lacedæmonian, not caring to engage ſo renowned a commander, attacked another galley, and took her, with a ſhip, on board of which was a great deal of rich plate and furniture. Eurycles retired, well ſatisfied with his prize; and, upon his retreat Antony returned to his former melancholy poſture, and continued ſo three days, without ſeeing the queen till he reached Tænarus in Laconia. There Cleopatra's women brought them to ſee each other, and converſe as formerly, Antony ſhewing himſelf as fond of her as ever, even at this time, when he had all the reaſon in the world to deteſt and abhor her, as the only cauſe of his ruin. At Tænarus he had an account of the total defeat of his fleet; but, believing his legions ſtill held out, he wrote to Canidius to retreat with them through Macedon into Aſia, propoſing to renew the war there. As he was himſelf determined to retire into Africa, he gave one of his largeſt ſhips, laden with vaſt ſums of money and gold and ſilver veſſels of an ineſtimable value, to his friends, deſiring them to ſhare it among them, and provide for their own ſafety; but they refuſing it with tears in their eyes, and declaring that they would always follow his fortune, he comforted them with all the goodneſs imaginable, complaining of his cruel deſtiny, which put him out of a condition of giving them ſuch tokens of his acknowledgement and gratitude, as they had given him of their fidelity and affection. He added, that he could not, without doing them the greateſt injury, ſuffer them to be involved in his misfortunes; and therefore he abſolutely commanded them to abandon him to his evil deſtiny, and conſult their own ſafety. He wrote to Theophilus, governor of Corinth, deſiring him to provide for their ſecurity, and keep them concealed, till ſuch time as they could make their peace with Octavianus. After this, Antony retired to Africa, whence he ſent Cleopatra into Egypt, and ſoon after followed her thither. But of the reduction of Egypt by Octavianus, of the unhappy end of Antony and Cleopatra, and the affecting circumſtances of their death, we have given a very particular account in our hiſtory of Egypt [i], to which we refer our readers.

readers. All Antony's ſtatues were thrown down and entirely demoliſhed, both in Egypt and at Rome. His memory was declared infamous by the ſervile ſenate, and a decree was paſſed, enacting, that none of his family ſhould ever after bear the name of Marcus. He died in the fifty-third, or, as ſome write, fifty-ſixth, year of his age, leaving behind him ſeven children by his three wives, Fulvia, Octavia, and Cleopatra; for he married the queen after his divorce with Octavia. What became of Alexander and Ptolemy his ſons by Cleopatra, we find no-where recorded; but for his daughter Cleopatra, the virtuous Octavia brought her up with her own children, and married her to Juba king of Mauritania, one of the moſt learned and virtuous princes of his age. Antyllus, his eldeſt ſon by Fulvia, was betrayed by his governor Theodorus to Octavianus's ſoldiers, who by his orders put him to death. Julius Antonius, the younger brother of Antyllus by the ſame mother, became one of Octavianus's chief favourites, Octavia, whoſe generoſity for that unfortunate family was without bounds, having beſtowed on him Marcella, one of her daughters by her firſt huſband; but he afterwards indiſcreetly engaged in a ſcandalous intrigue with Julia, Octavianus's only daughter, which coſt him his life. Octavia had by Antony only two daughters, of whom the elder was called Antonia Major, and the younger Antonia Minor. The former married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom ſhe had Cneius Domitius, who, by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, was the father of the emperor Nero. Antonia Minor, who inherited both her mother's beauty and virtue, was married to Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius and Livia, and ſon-in-law to Octavianus. From this marriage came Germanicus, who was deſervedly eſteemed the greateſt general of his time, and the moſt accompliſhed perſon among the Romans, and Claudius, who reigned before Nero. Caius, ſurnamed Caligula, the ſon of Germanicus, did likewiſe govern the Roman empire; ſo that Antony's family, in ſpite of their misfortunes, gave three emperors to Rome; whereas none of Octavianus's poſterity ever enjoyed that ſovereign authority, for the attaining of which he had impiouſly trod under foot the moſt ſacred laws of his country, and, by a thouſand acts of cruelty and injuſtice, laid waſte the Roman world.

The poſterity of Antony.

But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory: Octavianus having reduced Egypt, and ſettled the affairs of that kingdom, left Alexandria in the beginning of September of the preſent year of Rome 723, with a deſign to return, through Syria, Octavianus ſettles the affairs of Egypt, Aſia Minor, &c.

Syria, Aſia Minor, and Greece, to Italy. On his arrival at Antioch, he found there Tiridates, who had been raiſed to the throne of Parthia in oppoſition to Phrahates, and likewiſe embaſſadors from Phrahates who were all come on the ſame errand, viz. to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt each other. Octavianus gave a friendly anſwer both to Tiridates and the embaſſadors of Phrahates, without intending to help either; but rather with a deſign to animate the one againſt the other, and by that means to weaken both, ſo far as to render the Parthian name no longer formidable to Rome. After this, having appointed Meſſala Corvinus governor of Syria, he marched into the province of Aſia, properly ſo called, and there took up his winter quarters [k]. In the beginning of the next year, Octavianus entered his fifth conſulate, and had the following collegues, Licinius Craſſus to the kalends of July, C. Antiſtius to the ides of September, and M. Tullius, the ſon of the famous orator, from that time to the end of the year. He ſpent the whole winter in ſettling the affairs of the ſeveral provinces of Aſia Minor and the adjacent iſlands, and early in the ſpring paſſed into Greece, whence he ſet out for Rome, which he entered in the month Sextilis, afterwards called Auguſt, in three triumphs, which were celebrated for three days together. The firſt triumph was for his victories over the Dalmatians, Pannonians, and ſome German and Gauliſh nations, whom he had conquered before his war with Antony. The ſecond was for his naval victory at Actium; and the third for the reduction of Egypt. In the laſt, which was the moſt magnificent of the three, were led before the victor's chariot Alexander and Cleopatra, whom Antony had by the queen, and the image of the queen was carried in a bed of ſtate, with an aſp hanging at her arm. Rome was ſo much enriched with the immenſe treaſures brought by Octavianus and his ſoldiers out of Egypt, that the value of money fell from ten to four per cent. and the prices of every thing elſe roſe in proportion [l]. After his triumph, the name of emperor was conferred upon him, not in the common ſenſe, as it imported only a title of honour, but as it carried with it a ſovereign power and an uncontrouled authority [m].

And now Octavianus was at the height of his wiſhes, ſole ſovereign, ſole maſter, of the whole Roman empire. But, on the other hand, the many dangers which attend an uſurped power, appearing to him in a ſtronger light than ever, filled his mind with a thouſand perplexing thoughts. The natural averſion of the Romans to a kingly government, their love of liberty, and the ides of March, when his father Julius was murdered in full ſenate, by thoſe very men, whom he thought the moſt devoted to his perſon, made him fear there might ariſe another Brutus, who, to reſtore liberty to his country, might aſſaſſinate him on his very throne. This he knew had happened to Julius Cæſar; whereas Sylla, after having laid down the authority he had uſurped, died peaceably in his bed in the midſt of his enemies. The paſſion of fear, which was ſo natural to him, outweighed in his ſoul the charms of a diadem, and inclined him to follow the example of Sylla. He was indeed very unwilling to part with his authority; but fear began to get the better of his ambition. However, before he came to any reſolution, he thought it adviſable to conſult his two moſt intimate and truſty friends, Agrippa and Mecænas, the former no leſs famous for his probity than his valour, and the latter a man of great penetration, and generally eſteemed the moſt refined politician of his age. Agrippa, ſenſible only of that ſort of glory, which is acquired by great and heroic actions, openly declared for a generous reſignation. He enlarged on the many, and almoſt inevitable, dangers which attend monarchy, inſupportable to a free people, and to men educated in a commonwealth. He did not forget the examples of Sylla and Cæſar, and cloſed his ſpeech with exhorting Octavianus to convince the world, by reſtoring liberty to his country, that the only motive for his taking up arms was to revenge his father's death. Mecænas, on the other hand, remonſtrated to him, that he had done too much to go back; that, after ſo much bloodſhed, there could be no ſafety for him but on the throne; that, if he deveſted himſelf of the ſovereign power, he would be immediately proſecuted by the children and friends of the many illuſtrious perſons, whom the misfortune of the times had forced him to ſacrifice to his ſafety; that it was abſolutely neceſſary for the welfare and tranquillity of the republic, that the ſovereign power ſhould be lodged in one perſon, and not divided among many, &c. Octavianus thanked them both for

for their friendly advice, but ſhewed himſelf inclined to follow the opinion of Mecænas; whereupon that able miniſter gave him many wiſe inſtructions and rules of government, which are related at length by Dion Caſſius [n], and will ever be looked upon as a maſter-piece in politics. Among other things he told him, That he could not fail of being ſucceſsful in all his undertakings, happy in his life-time, and famous in hiſtory after his death, if he never deviated from this rule, viz. to govern others as he would wiſh to be governed himſelf, had he been born to obey, and not to command. He added, That if, in taking upon him the ſovereign power, he dreaded the name of king, a name ſo odious in a commonwealth, he might content himſelf with the title of Cæſar or Imperator, and under that name, which was well known to the Romans, enjoy all the authority of a king. This advice Octavianus followed, and from that time laid aſide all thoughts of abdicating the ſovereign power; but, to deceive the people into a belief that they ſtill enjoyed their antient government, he continued the old magiſtrates, with the ſame name, pomp, and ornaments, but with juſt as much power as he thought fit to leave them. They were to have no military power, but only their old juriſdiction of deciding finally all cauſes, except ſuch as were capital; and tho' ſome of theſe laſt were left to the governor of Rome, yet the chief he reſerved for himſelf. He paid great court to the people: the very name that covered his uſurpation was a compliment to them; for he affected to call it the power of the tribuneſhip, tho' he acted as abſolutely by it, as if he had called it the dictatorial power. He likewiſe won the hearts of the populace by cheapneſs of proviſions and plentiful markets; he frequently entertained them with ſhews and ſports, and by theſe means kept them in good humour, and made them forget uſurpation, ſlavery, and every public evil; people in eaſe and plenty being under no temptation of enquiring into the title of their prince, or reſenting acts of power, which they do not immediately feel. As for the ſenate, he filled it with his own creatures, raiſing the number of the conſcript fathers to a thouſand. He ſupplied ſeveral poor ſenators with money out of the treaſury to diſcharge the public offices, and on all occaſions affected an high regard for that venerable body; but at the ſame time deveſted them them of all power, and reduced them to mere cyphers. To prevent them from raiſing new diſturbances in the diſtant provinces, he iſſued an edict, forbidding any ſenator to travel out of Italy without leave, except ſuch as had lands in Sicily or Narbonne Gaul, which at that time comprehended Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiny. To theſe provinces, which were near Italy and in a perfect ſtate of tranquillity, they had full liberty to retire, when they pleaſed, and live there upon their eſtates. Before he ended his ſixth conſulſhip, he took a cenſus of the people, which was forty-one years after the laſt; and in this the number of men fit to bear arms amounted to four hundred ſixty-three thouſand, the greateſt that had ever been found before [o] (Y). He likewiſe celebrated the games which had been decreed by the ſenate for his victory at Actium; and it was ordered, that they ſhould be celebrated every fifth year, four colleges of prieſts being appointed to take care of them, viz. the pontifices, the augurs, the ſeptemvirs, and quindecemvirs [p]. The more to gain the affections of the people, he diſannulled by one edict the many ſevere and unjuſt laws, which had been enacted during the triumvirate. He raiſed many public buildings, repaired the old ones, and added many ſtately ornaments to the city, which at this time was, if we may give credit to ſome antient writers, about fifty miles in compaſs, and contained near four millions of ſouls, reckoning men, women, children, and ſlaves. He attended buſineſs, reformed abuſes, ſhewed great regard for the Roman name, procured public abundance, pleaſure, and jollity, often appearing in perſon at the public diverſions, and in all things things ſtudying to render himſelf dear to the populace [q].

AND now Octavianus, entering upon his ſeventh conſulſhip with M. Agrippa, the third time conſul, and finding all things ripe for his deſign, the people being highly pleaſed with his mild government, and the ſenate filled with his creatures, whoſe fortunes depended upon his holding the power he had uſurped, went, by the advice of Agrippa and Mecænas, to the ſenate-houſe, and there in a ſtudied ſpeech offered to reſign his authority, and put all again into the hands of the people, upon the old foundation of the commonwealth, being well appriſed, that the greater part of the conſcript fathers, whoſe intereſts were interwoven with his, would unanimouſly preſs him to the contrary; which happened accordingly: for they not only often interrupted him while he was ſpeaking, but, after he had done, unanimouſly beſought him to take upon him alone the whole government of the Roman empire. He, with a ſeeming reluctancy, yielded at laſt to their requeſt, as if he had been compelled to accept of the ſovereignty. By this artifice he compaſſed his deſign, which was to get the power and authority, which he had uſurped, confirmed to him by the ſenate and people for the ſpace of ten years; for he would not accept of it for a longer term, pretending, he ſhould in that time be able to ſettle all things in ſuch peace and order, that there could be no further need of his authority; but that he might then eaſe himſelf of the burden, and put the government again into the hands of the ſenate and people. This method he took to render the yoke leſs heavy; but with a deſign to renew his leaſe, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, as ſoon as the ten years were expired; which he did accordingly, from ten years to ten years, as long as he lived, all the while governing the whole Roman empire with an abſolute and uncontrouled power. With this new authority the ſenate reſolved to diſtinguiſh him with a new name. Some of the conſcript fathers propoſed the name of Romulus, thereby to import, that he was another founder of Rome; others offered other titles; but the venerable name of Auguſtus, propoſed by Munatius Plancus, ſeemed preferable to all the reſt, as it expreſſed more dignity and reverence than authority, the moſt ſacred things, ſuch as temples and palaces conſecrated by

by augurs, being termed by the Romans Auguſta (Z). Octavianus himſelf was inclined to aſſume the name of Romulus; but fearing he ſhould be ſuſpected of affecting the kingdom, he declined it, and took that of Auguſtus [r], by which we ſhall henceforth diſtinguiſh him in the ſequel of our hiſtory. Though the whole power of the ſenate and people was now veſted in Auguſtus, yet, that he might ſeem to ſhare it with the conſcript fathers, he refuſed to govern all the provinces, aſſigning to the ſenate ſuch as were quiet and peaceable, and keeping to himſelf thoſe that, bordering upon the barbarous nations, were moſt expoſed to troubles and wars, ſaying, He deſired the fathers might enjoy their power with eaſe and ſafety, while he underwent all the dangers and labours; but by this politic conduct he ſecured all the military power to himſelf, the troops lying in the provinces he had choſen, and the others, which were governed by the ſenate, being quite deſtitute of forces. The latter were called ſenatorial, and the former imperial, provinces. The ſenatorial were, Africa, that is, the antient dominions of Carthage, Numidia, Aſia properly ſo called, or the antient kingdom of Pergamus, Greece, ſtyled by moſt hiſtorians Achaia, Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedon, Sicily, Sardinia, the iſland of Crete, Libya, Cyrenaica, Bithynia, Pontus, and that part of Spain called Bœtica. The imperial provinces were, the reſt of Spain, comprehending the provinces of Tarracon and Luſitania, all Gaul and Germany, Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, Cilicia, the iſland of Cyprus, and the kingdom of Egypt. Over the provinces of both ſorts were ſet men of diſtinction, viz. ſuch as had been conſuls or prætors, with the title of proconſul and proprætor; but the government of Egypt was committed to a private knight, Auguſtus fearing leſt a perſon of rank, depending upon the wealth and ſituation of that country, might might raiſe new diſturbances in the empire [s]. All theſe governors held their employment only for a year, and were, upon the arrival of their ſucceſſors, to depart their provinces immediately, and not fail to be at Rome within three months at the fartheſt [t]. This diviſion of the provinces was made, according to Ovid, on the ides of January (A); whereas he was veſted by the ſenate and people, with the ſovereign power on the ſeventh of the ides of the ſame month, as is manifeſt from the Narbonne marbles [u]; and from that time many writers date the years of his empire. Thus ended the greateſt commonwealth, and at the ſame time began the greateſt monarchy, that had ever been known; a monarchy, which infinitely excelled in power, riches, extent and continuance all the monarchies and empires which had preceded it; for it comprehended the greateſt, and by far the beſt, part of Europe, Aſia, and Africa, being near four thouſand miles in length, and about half as much in breadth. As to the yearly revenues of the empire, they have, by a modeſt computation, been reckoned to amount to forty millions of our money. But the Romans themſelves now ran headlong into all manner of luxury and effeminacy. The people were become a mere mob; thoſe who were wont to direct mighty wars, to raiſe and depoſe great kings, to beſtow or take away great empires, were ſo ſunk and debauched, that if they had but bread and ſhoes, their ambition went no higher. The nobility were indeed more polite than in the former times, but at the ſame time idle, venal, vicious, inſenſible of private virtue, utter ſtrangers to public glory or diſgrace, void of zeal for the welfare of their country, and ſolely intent on gaining the favour of the emperor, as knowing, that certain wealth and

CHAP. XVII.

The Hiſtory of Rome, from the perfect ſettlement of the Roman empire to the death of Nero, the laſt of the family of the Cæſars.

THE firſt and chief care of Auguſtus, now abſolute maſter of the whole Roman empire, was to ſatisfy his ſoldiers, and attach them more and more to his intereſt. With this view he diſperſed them all over Italy in thirty-two colonies, that he might the more eaſily reaſſemble them in caſe of any ſudden commotion. He kept twenty-five legions on foot, ſeventeen of which were in Europe, viz. eight on the Rhine, four at the Danube, three in Spain, and two in Dalmatia. The other eight were ſent into Aſia and Africa, four of them being quartered in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and in Syria, two in Egypt, and two in the province of Africa, that is, in the antient dominions of Carthage. Theſe were conſtantly maintained, even in the moſt peaceable times, by Auguſtus, and for ſome ages by his ſucceſſors, their whole number amounting to 170,650 men. In the neighbourhood of Rome were always quartered twelve cohorts, that is, about ten thouſand men, nine of which were called cohortes prætoriæ, or prætorian cohorts, and the other three cohortes urbanæ, or city cohorts. They were eſtabliſhed to guard the emperor's perſon, and maintain peace and tranquillity in the city. The prætorian guards had, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory, a great ſhare in all the changes and revolutions of the empire, till the reign of Conſtantine the Great, who diſmiſſed them all in the year 312 of the chriſtian æra. The forces of the empire.

BESIDES theſe numerous and well diſciplined land-forces, Auguſtus kept conſtantly at ſea two powerful fleets, the

the one riding at anchor near Ravenna in the Upper or Adriatic ſea, to command and defend Dalmatia, Greece, Cyprus, Aſia, and the reſt of the eaſtern provinces; the other at Miſenum in the Lower or Mediterranean ſea, to awe and protect Gaul, Spain, Africa, and the weſtern provinces. They were likewiſe to keep the ſeas clear of pirates, to convoy the veſſels which brought to Rome the annual tributes from the provinces beyond ſea, and to tranſport corn and other proviſions, neceſſary for the ſubſiſtance and relief of the city. As to the civil government, he reformed many of the antient laws and enacted new ones; but therein affected to do nothing, without the advice and approbation of the conſcript fathers. The comitia were held as formerly in the field of Mars; but ſuch only were choſen for the great offices, as Auguſtus had before-hand recommended to the centuries. In ſhort, the ſame officers of ſtate, the ſame names, pomp, and ornaments were continued, with all the appearance of authority, but without the leaſt power [w]. However, the ſenate pretended to be ſo well pleaſed with his government, that they honoured him with the title of Pater patriæ, or Father of his country. Towards the end of this year, Auguſtus, having ſettled affairs in the capital, left Italy and paſſed into Gaul, with a deſign to attempt the reduction of the Britiſh iſlands; but being informed, on his arrival at Narbonne, that the Salaſſi at the foot of the Alps, and the Cantabri and Aſtures in Spain, had ſhaken off the yoke, he ſent Terentius Varro againſt the former, and marched in perſon againſt the latter, after having entered his eighth conſulſhip, in which he choſe for his collegue Titus Statilius Taurus, one of his lieutenants. However, before he left Gaul, he took a cenſus of the inhabitants of the three provinces into which that country was then divided, and which is the firſt we read of made out of Italy [x]. On his arrival in Spain, he defeated the Cantabri in a pitched battle near Vellica, at a ſmall diſtance from the Iberus, and obliged them to retire with their wives and children to one of their higheſt mountains, called by the antients Vindius, and by the moderns the mountain of Aſturias. But, in the mean time, Auguſtus falling ſick, the whole management of the war was committed to C. Antiſtius; who who, having defeated the united forces of the Cantabrians and Asturians in a great battle, forced them to take refuge on another inaccessible mountain, which he surrounded with a wide and deep ditch fifteen miles in compass, and fortified at proper distances, with castles and turrets. By this means, all the avenues and passes being shut up, those unhappy people were reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions; yet so great was their love of liberty, that, instead of yielding, they endured for a long time miseries hardly to be expressed, the women devouring their own children, and the young men the old, to support the necessities of nature. After many unsuccessful attempts to force the Roman entrenchments, the Asturians were at length for throwing themselves upon the clemency of the conqueror; but were therein opposed by the Cantabrians, who maintained, that they ought all, like brave men, die sword in hand. This dangerous contention was carried so far, that, after a sharp conflict, in which many fell on both sides, the Asturians, to the number of ten thousand, were driven to the entrenchments of the Romans, whom they begged in a most moving manner to receive them upon what terms they pleased. But Tiberius, the emperor's son-in-law, refusing to admit them into the camp, some of those unhappy wretches fell upon their own swords; others lighting great fires, threw themselves into them, and perished in the flames, and some put an end to their lives by drinking the juice of a venomous herb, which grew in the forest they possessed [x].

In the mean time, the consular year being expired, Augustus, who still resided at Tarracon, whither he had retired in the beginning of the campaign, entered there on his ninth consulship, and chose for his collegue M. Junius Silanus [y]. This year was remarkable for the total reduction of Spain, after it had, for the space of two hundred years and upwards, given the Romans constant employment, and obliged them to keep there numerous armies. The Cantabrians, whom Antistius kept closely invested, were at length forced to surrender at discretion, to the number of twenty-three thousand. Of these ten thousand were incorporated among the Roman auxiliaries to be employed against the Asturians, the rest were disarmed, and sold to the best bidder; but most of them laid violent hands on themselves, despising their lives, after the loss of their liberty berty and arms [a]. Cantabria, now Biſcay, being thus entirely reduced, Auguſtus divided his army into two bodies; the one he detached, under the command of Titius Cariſius into Luſitania, whither ſome of the Aſturians had retired, and the other he led himſelf into their country. The Aſturians in Luſitania were in a battle, which laſted two days, and was one of the moſt bloody that had ever been fought, entirely defeated by Cariſius, who could not help owning, that the Aſturians equalled in valour the Romans themſelves. On the other hand, Auguſtus and Antiſtius entering the country of thoſe brave, but unfortunate, people, cut moſt of them in pieces, and made themſelves maſters of all their cities and ſtrong-holds. Thus were the two moſt warlike nations of Spain forced at length to receive the yoke, and bear it, without being ever after able to recover their antient liberty. Auguſtus, before he left the country, built ſeveral cities to keep the rebellious Spaniards in awe, among the reſt Cæſar Auguſta, now Saragoſa, and Auguſta Emerita, now Merida, ſo called becauſe it was founded by Auguſtus, and peopled by his veterans, called in Latin Emeriti [b]. He likewiſe built a ſtone-bridge over the Iberus, to facilitate the march of the Roman troops from one province to another.

And alſo the Aſturians.

THIS year ſeveral wars were carried on with equal ſucceſs in other parts. Marcus Craſſus, one of Auguſtus's lieutenants, overcame the Mæſians, a fierce and ſavage people beyond the Danube. M. Vinicius gained conſiderable advantages over ſome nations of Germany, for which the title of Imperator was conferred upon Auguſtus, under whoſe auſpices Vinicius had fought. Terrentius Varro, ſurnamed Murena, reduced the Salaſſi, and obliged them to ſubmit to ſuch terms as he thought proper to impoſe upon them. After they had delivered up their arms, Varro ſent forty thouſand of their youth to Eporedia, now Ivrea, where they were condemned to ſlavery for the term of twenty years. Auguſtus divided their lands among the ſoldiers of his guard, and founded in the new colony a city, which he called Auguſta Prætoria, now known by the name of Aoſta [c]. The whole glory of this expedition was aſcribed to Auguſtus, tho' he was then in Spain, and a ſtately monument erect-

Cornelius Gallus baniſhed.

WHILE Auguſtus was waging war with the rebellious Spaniards, Cornelius Gallus, to whom Virgil inſcribed his tenth and laſt eclogue, was condemned to perpetual baniſhment by the ſenate, for having ſpoken with too much liberty of Auguſtus. He had been appointed by the emperor, who loved and eſteem him on account of his fine genius, the firſt governor of Egypt, which he oppreſſed in a moſt tyrannical manner, ſtripping the moſt wealty cities of the country, particularly the famous city of Thebes, of all their ornaments, and laying heavy taxes on the inhabitants. Puffed up with pride, he ruled more like an abſolute monarch, than a ſubordinate magiſtrate, erecting ſtatues to himſelf in the chief cities of that kingdom, and inſcribing his own name and feats on the pyramids. Such extraordinary preceedings obliged Auguſtus to recall him, to brand him with infamy, and forbid him his houſe and the provinces under his command. Hereupon Gallus uttered many diſreſpectful ſpeeches againſt the emperor; for which, as well as for his rapines, extortions, and other miſdemeanours, he was, by the unanimous ſuffrages of the ſenate, condemned to baniſhment; but he prevented the execution of the ſentence, by falling on his own ſword [e]. Auguſtus, whoſe favour he had gained by his military exploits and the elegance of his poetical compoſitions, is ſaid to have wept, when he received in Spain the news of his death, complaining, that he alone was not allowed to ſet what bounds he pleaſed to his reſentment. However, he returned thanks to the ſenate for the zeal they had ſhewn on this occaſion for the ſafety of his perſon and the glory of his name [f]. This year died Amyntas king of Piſidia. He had been ſecretary to old king Dejotarus, and raiſed by Marc Antony, whom he ſerved with great fidelity, to the throne, which Auguſtus ſuffered him to enjoy, but would not allow him to tranſmit it to his poſterity; ſo that Piſidia, with Galatia and Lycaonia, upon his death, were reduced to a Roman province, province, and firſt governed by M. Lollius in quality of pro-prætor [g].

DURING Auguſtus's ſtay in Spain, Agrippa, who had remained in Rome, was no leſs employed in adorning with magnificent ſtructures that ſtately metropolis, than others were in extending its dominions. Among the many public edifices he built at his own charges, the moſt remarkable were the porch and temple of Neptune, the hot baths, called Thermæ Agrippæ, and the Pantheon, a celebrated temple, ſo named, according to Dion, from the many images of the gods with which it was embelliſhed, or rather from its arched roof, which reſembled the heavens. This wonderful ſtructure was finiſhed this year, in the ninth conſulſhip of Auguſtus, and is preſerved entire to this day. While Auguſtus continued at Tarracon, his health not allowing him yet to ſet out on his return to Rome, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee the moſt remote nations of the north and the eaſt, that is, the Scythians, the Sarmatians, the Indians, and the Seres (B), courting his friendſhip with embaſſies

(B) The Seres, the ſame people whom we now call the Chineſe, are thought to have been the firſt who made ſilk; whence ſilk was called ſerica, and a ſilken garment ſericum, by the Greeks as well as by the Latins. From the country of the Seres, that is, from China, ſilk was brought into Perſia, and from Perſia into Greece and Italy. It was firſt brought into Greece on Alexander's conquering Perſia, and from thence into Italy in the flouriſhing times of the Roman empire. It was for a long time very dear in theſe weſtern parts, being weight for weight of equal value with gold; for the Perſians, to keep this manufacture to themſelves, would not allow the ſilk-worms to be carried out of Perſia, or any one to paſs from thence into the weſt, who were ſkilled in the management of them. But the emperor Juſtinian, who died in the year of the chriſtian æra 565, looking upon it as a great hardſhip, that his ſubjects ſhould purchaſe this manufacture of the Perſians at ſo dear a rate, ſent two monks into India, to learn there how the ſilken manufacture was managed, ordering them to bring with them on their return ſome ſilk-worms, that he might ſet up the manufacture in his own dominions. Theſe monks on their return told him, that the ſilk-worms could not be brought ſo long a journey, but the emperor underſtanding from them that their eggs might, he ſent them back for them;

embaſſies and rich preſents [h]. Florus tells us, that the Seres were four years on their journey, and that they preſented Auguſtus with pearls, precious ſtones, and elephants. The fame of Cæſar's moderation in the midſt of his victories was what chiefly prompted thoſe diſtant nations, if we believe Suetonious [i], to ſolicit his friendſhip. This year ended with two marriages, viz. of Cleopatra Selene, the daughter of queen Cleopatra by Antony, with Juba king of Getulia, of whom we have ſpoken above, and of Julia, Auguſtus's daughter by Scribonia, with Marcellus, his ſiſter Octavia's ſon by her firſt huſband, a youth of extraordinary accompliſhments, and already adopted by Auguſtus, who had no hopes of iſſue by his wife Livia, whom he paſſionately loved. As the emperor was ſtill kept in Spain by the bad ſtate of his health, the ceremonies uſed by the Romans on ſuch occaſions were performed with all imaginable pomp and magnificence by Agrippa [k].

THE enſuing year, Auguſtus entered upon his tenth conſulſhip, having C. Norbanus Flaccus for his collegue; but whether he was then in Spain, on his journey, or at Rome, is uncertain. Upon his return to the capital, which happened in the end of the preceding year, or in the beginning of this, the ſenate conferred a greater authority upon him than ever, them; and by this means great quantities of theſe eggs were brought to Conſtantinople. From theſe eggs have been propagated all the ſilk-worms and ſilk trade, which have been ſince that time in Europe. The antients were ſo ignorant how ſilk was made, that they believed it was produced, like cotton, from trees. For a long time it was worn only by women, it being thought a great inſtance of luxury and effeminacy for a man to wear a ſilken garment, In the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, a law was made, " ne veſtis ſerica viros fædaret," that is," that " no man ſhould diſhonour himſelf by wearing a ſilken garment " (4); and Lampridius reckons it one of the moſt infamous parts of Heliogabalus's character, that he was the firſt man who wore holoſericum, that is, " a garment which was all of ſilk (5).

ever, freeing him from the obligation of all laws, and impowering him to govern the republic according to his arbitrary will and pleaſure. At the ſame time, by a ſolemn oath they approved of all his acts, and decreed, that Marcellus, tho' then not above ſixteen years of age, ſhould, on account of his extraordinary merit, have a place in the ſenate among thoſe of the prætorian rank, and that he might ſtand for the conſulate, ten years ſooner than he was allowed by the laws. It was likewiſe ordained in favour of Tiberius, ſon-in-law to Auguſtus, that he might ſtand for the curule office, five years ſooner than the uſual time. Theſe decrees were no ſooner paſſed, than Marcellus was made ædile, and Tiberius quæſtor [1]. This year was remarkable for an expedition againſt the ſouthern Arabs, undertaken by Ælius Gallus, a Roman knight, and the third governor of Egypt under Auguſtus. The emperor being informed, that South Arabia abounded in gold, ſilver, and other riches, reſolved either to make them his friends by treaties, and ſo open a way for commerce with them, or by conqueſt to make them his ſubjects. He had alſo this farther view, viz. in caſe he ſhould, either as a friend or conqueror, get footing in that country, to open himſelf an eaſy way for the ſubduing of the Troglodites, their country being ſeparated from South Arabia only by the narrow ſtreights, now called the ſtreights of Babelmandel, through which the Arabian gulph diſcharges itſelf into the Southern ocean. For the carrying on of this expedition, Auguſtus furniſhed Gallus with ten thouſand men; Herod king of Judæa ſent him five hundred drawn out of his own guards; and Obodas king of the Nabathæan Arabs a thouſand more, under the command of Syllæus his chief miniſter. Syllæus undertook to be Gallus's guide in this expedition; but with no other view than to betray him, and make the undertaking miſcarry. Gallus had propoſed to march through the country of the Nabathæans, and from thence into South Arabia, or Arabia Felix; but Syllæus falſly informing him, that there was no ſafe paſſage thither by land, he built an hundred and thirty tranſports at Cleopatris, a port at the bottom of the Arabian gulph or Red ſea, and, putting his army on board them, ſailed for Leucocome, a maritime city of the Nabathæans, on the other ſide of that ſea. As this was a very dangerous navigation, on account of the many rocks and ſhelves which are in that part of the Arabian gulph, and Syllæus conducted them the worſt way through it, he was fifteen teen days in his paſſage, and loſt a great many ſhips. Upon his landing, his whole army was ſeized with a diſtemper common in that country, which obliged him to continue inactive, at Leucocome and in that neighbourhood, the remaining part of the ſummer and the following winter. Early next ſpring, he ſet out from Leucocome, and, after a moſt painful march of ſix months ſouthward, being led by the treacherous Syllæus through ways almoſt impaſſable, he arrived at length on the borders of Arabia Felix. Upon his approach, Sabus, king of the country, fled, abandoning his metropolis, called by Strabo the city of the Agrans, which Gallus took by aſſault. From thence he continued his march ſouthward, and arrived the ſixth day at a river, where he was met by a numerous body of Arabs, who had aſſembled with a deſign to diſpute his paſſage; but Gallus, falling upon them, cut ten thouſand of them in pieces, with the loſs of two men only. He then, without further oppoſition, made himſelf maſter of Anneſtus, Aſca, Maguſum, Tommacum, Labeccia, Mariaba, a city ſix miles in compaſs, Athrula, where he left a garriſon, and Caripeta. From Caripeta he penetrated farther into the country, and, after ſome days march, came to Marſyabæ, a city of the Rhamanites, who were governed by a petty prince named Ilaſarus. He beſieged the place; but was obliged, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, to drop that enterpriſe for want of water. In the mean time, his men being ſeized with various diſtempers, occaſioned by the heat of the climate and the unwholeſomeneſs of the air, water, and herbs of the country, and great numbers of them dropping off daily, he thought it adviſeable to march back into the country of the Nabathæans, and from thence purſue his rout into Egypt. Accordingly, having by this time diſcovered the treachery of Syllæus, he ſet out on his march homeward, under the conduct of more faithful guides, and came in ſix days to Anagrana; whence, after having put to flight king Sabus, who attempted to harraſs him on his march, he purſued his journey to Negra, called alſo Hygra, a maritime city of the Nabathæan country, which he reached in ſixty days; whereas he had ſpent ſix months in marching from thence to the confines of Arabia. At Negra he embarqued his troops, and having croſſed the Arabian gulph in eleven days, he landed at Myos Hormus on the Egyptian ſide; and from thence, by the way of Coptus, led back the poor remains of his army to Alexandria, after having ſpent two years in this unhappy expedition. men; but the far greater part of his forces perished, either by famine or diseases [m]. Some of the medicinal compositions, which he invented against the distempers that reigned in his army, are mentioned by Galen, and among the rest treacle, which on his return he presented to Augustus, telling him, that it had saved the lives of many of his soldiers [n]. The bad success, that had attended Ælius in this expedition, deterred both him and others from any further attempts on that country; so that the inhabitants of Arabia Felix in the east, and the Scots in the north, as we shall observe hereafter, were the only people who continued to enjoy their liberties to the downfal of the Roman empire, while all the other nations of the then known world groaned under the yoke.

Ca[illegible] queen of Ethiopia, invades Egypt.

WHILE Ælius Gallus was employed with part of the Egyptian army in this expedition, Candace, queen of Ethiopia, invading the province of Thebais in Upper Egypt with a great army, surprised the cities of Syene, Elephantina, and Phyllis, carried the Romans who garrisoned them into captivity, overthrew Augustus's statues, and laid waste the whole country. Hereupon C. Petronius, at that time governor of Egypt, having with all imaginable expedition got together a body of ten thousand foot and eight hundred horse, marched against the warlike queen, and coming up with her in the neighbourhood of Pselcha, a city of Ethiopia on the banks of the Nile, obliged her to give battle, defeated her army, tho' thirty thousand strong, and made himself master of Pselcha, a city of Ethiopia on the side of Egypt. From Pselcha Petronius penetrated above eight hundred miles into the country; and after having passed those deserts, where the whole army of Cambyses is said to have been by a sudden storm buried in the sand, he took, without opposition, the cities of Premnis, Aboccis, Phturis, Cambyses, Atteva, and Stadisis; which last place stood near the cataracts of the Nile. Encouraged with this success, the Roman general advanced to Napata, which Dion calls Tenape, the metropolis of the kingdom, which he took and destroyed, and from thence marched forward, till at length being able to proceed no farther by reason of the great deserts, nor stay there any longer on account of the excessive heats of the climate, he was obliged to turn back. Having therefore put a garrison of four

The queen of Ethiopia, upon the firſt notice of the departure of the Romans, having aſſembled new forces, attacked with great vigour the garriſon they had left at Premnis; but Petronius returning with a quickneſs and expedition hardly to be imagined, ſhe was obliged not only to raiſe the ſiege, but to conclude a peace upon terms very advantageous to the Romans. However, Auguſtus afterwards remitted the tribute, which ſhe was, purſuant, to the treaty, to pay yearly to the Roman people, and reſtored to her all the cities which Petronius, had ſeized [o].

DURING theſe tranſactions in the eaſt, the Aſturians and Cantabrians attempted anew the recovery of their liberty; and having by a ſtratagem ſurprized a conſiderable body of Romans, put them all to the ſword. But Ælius Lama, whom Auguſtus had left governor of that part of Spain, ſoon revenged their death, laying waſte the whole country with fire and ſword, and cruelly maſſacring moſt of their young men who were able to bear arms: by which means he reduced them in leſs than a month to an entire ſubjection [p].

The Cantabrians and Aſturians rebel, but are ſoon reduced.

THE following year, Auguſtus, being in his eleventh conſulſhip with Cn. Calpurnius Piſo, fell into a dangerous diſtemper, which brought him to the point of death. When he thought himſelf paſt recovery, he ſent for the curule magiſtrates and the chief men of the ſenatorial and equeſtrian order, who came immediately to attend him, not doubting, but he deſigned to name in their preſence his ſucceſſor, and intail the empire on his family. They were therefore greatly ſurpriſed to ſee the dying emperor, without uttering a ſingle word, put into the hands of his collegue Calpurnius Piſo, his laſt will, and with it a book of his own writing, which contained a diſtinct and minute account of all the towns, provinces, allies, forces, riches, and taxes of the whole Roman empire. The contents of his will, which was to be opened only after his death, were never known; but, from his not naming a ſucceſſor and his delivering to the chief magiſtrate, in ſo critical a juncture, an account of the the revenues and forces of the empire, they all concluded, that his deſign was to put the commonwealth once more into the hands of the ſenate and people. His ring he delivered in the preſence of all to Agrippa, ſignifying thereby, as was then interpreted, that if they deſired to be governed by one man, they could not chuſe a perſon more fit for ſo great a truſt than Agrippa. As for Marcellus, his ſon-in-law, his nephew, and his ſon by adoption, whom every one expected he would name for his ſucceſſor, he ſeemed to have entirely forgot him. This unexpected behaviour of Auguſtus at the point of death, when his ſincerity could not be reaſonably queſtioned, gained him the affections of the people, above any thing he had hitherto done in their behalf. They thought him more worthy of being ſolemnly deified and ranked among the gods, in regard of the diſintereſted love he ſhewed for his country, than his father Julius on account of all his warlike exploits. But the apotheoſis of Auguſtus was put off for many years; for Antonius Muſa, a famous Greek phyſician, and brother to Euphorbus phyſician to Juba king of Mauritania, by cooling potions and the uſe of the cold bath, reſtored him to his health, to the great real, or ſeeming, ſatisfaction of the ſenate and people, who immediately ordered a ſtatue of braſs to be erected to Muſa over-againſt that of Æſculapius, a diſtinction never before granted to any freed-man. He was alſo allowed to wear a gold ring, and all perſons of his profeſſion were for ever, out of gratitude to him, excepted from all manner of taxes and tributes [q].

Antonius Muſa reſtores him to his health.

The recovery of Auguſtus occaſioned great rejoicings in the city; medals were ſtruck, many of which have reached our times, and the moſt magnificent ſports exhibited that had ever been ſeen in Rome. We are told, that ſome fathers, then on their death-beds, commanded their children to ſacrifice victims in their name by way of thankſgiving to Jupiter Capitolinus, with this inſcription, "The "day of our death was the day of Auguſtus's recovery [r]." The emperor, as ſoon as he was in a condition to appear abroad, went to the ſenate-houſe, and, after having thanked the fathers in moſt obliging terms for the concern they had ſhewn during his illneſs, and the joy they had expreſſed on his recovery, he oppened his will, and offered to read it to the aſſembly, in order to convince them, that he

he had appointed himself no successor, but left them at full liberty either of re-establishing the antient form of government, or chusing for themselves a sovereign; but they all cried out with one voice, That they would not by any means suffer him to take that trouble, which was to no purpose, since they were, without any further proof, fully convinced of the sincerity of his intentions, and his disinterested zeal for the public welfare [s].

Misunderstanding between Marcellus and Agrippa.

THE behaviour of Augustus during his illness occasioned a misunderstanding between Marcellus and Agrippa. The former thinking himself injured by his uncle, who had preferred to one of his own family a man of a mean descent, a mere soldier of fortune, expressed his resentment, not against the emperor, but against his favourite, treating him on several occasions with great contempt. On the other hand, Agrippa was not a man to bear with any ill usage. The emperor therefore, to prevent the evil consequences of their mutual jealousies, thought it adviseable to part them; and accordingly appointed Agrippa governor of Syria, who immediately left Rome, but went no farther than Mitylene in the island Lesbos, whence he sent his lieutenants to govern the provinces committed to his care [t].

AND now Augustus, thinking his authority sufficiently established, resigned the fasces, after having held them nine years together, to P. Sestius, a man of an unblemished character, but a constant and faithful friend to Brutus, under whom he had served, in the battle of Philippi, in quality of proquæstor, and whose memory he still reverenced, keeping his picture in his house, and commending on all occasions the zeal of that brave patriot for the welfare of his country. The senate was so affected with this impartial conduct of Augustus, in preferring a man of Sestius's character to many of his own friends, who aspired at the same dignity, that they heaped new honours upon him, declared him perpetual proconsul of the Roman empire, impowered him to assemble the senate when he pleased, and, what he valued above all other prerogatives, allowed him to exercise the authority of the tribuneship, and enjoy all the privileges annexed to that dignity, not only within the walls of Rome, but in the most distant provinces.

New honours heaped upon Augustus.

Such an ample and unlimited power was without precedent; but the emperor readily accepted it, as it rendered his perſon ſacred, and ſecured him againſt all outrages and inſults, whether in words or actions. His ſucceſſors never parted with this power; but, after the example of Auguſtus, cauſed it to be recorded in public regiſters in theſe terms; "Tribunitiæ poteſtatis, primum, ſecundum, &c. [u]." Thus were the Romans, by raiſing the authority of their emperors, daily rivetting their own chains. In the conſulate of Cn. Calpurnius Piſo and L. Seſtius, Phrahates, king of Parthia, being reſtored to the throne by the Scythians, Tiridates, whom the Parthians had choſe in his room, being obliged to ſave himſelf by flight, came to Rome, with the chief men of his party, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of Auguſtus, promiſing to hold the kingdom of him, in caſe he was reſtored by his means to the throne. On the other hand, Phrahates, hearing he had fled to Rome, ſent embaſſadors after him to defeat his deſigns, and to demand of Auguſtus the delivery of his rebellious ſlaves, as he ſtyled them, and the releaſe of his ſon, whom Tiridates had put into his hands at Antioch, when he paſſed through that city on his return to Italy after the reduction of Egypt. Auguſtus introduced the embaſſadors of the contending parties to the ſenate; but after they had pleaded the cauſe of their reſpective princes before the fathers, without conſulting them, he anſwered the embaſſadors himſelf in the ſame manner as he had done before at Antioch, viz. That he would not deliver Tiridates into the hands of Phrahates, nor aſſiſt either of them againſt the other. However, to gratify both in ſomething, he gave Tiridates leave to live at Rome, ordering him out of the public treaſury an allowance ſuitable to his rank, and ſent back to Phrahates his ſon, on condition that he ſhould reſtore all the captives and enſigns taken from Craſſus and Antony. This Phrahates promiſed, but did not perform, till three years after [x]. This year Marcellus was ſeized with an hectic fever, which Antonius Muſa undertook to cure; but the remedies he preſcribed, the ſame which had ſaved the life of Auguſtus, were commonly believed to have occaſioned his death, which happened in the nineteenth year of his age, to the inexpreſſible grief of Auguſtus, his mother Octavia, and the Roman people, whoſe hearts hearts he had won by his extraordinary accomplishments, obliging behaviour, and uncommon modesty. Tho' this year proved very sickly, and many were carried off by the reigning distempers, yet the ambitious Livia was generally charged with the death of that hopeful youth, whom she was believed to have dispatched by means of Antonius Musa, to make room for Tiberius and Drusus her own children. His funeral obsequies were performed with the utmost magnificence in the campus Martius, Augustus himself, who was his neareſt relation, pronouncing, according to custom, his funeral oration. [y].

THE next year, M. Claudius Marcellus Æserninus and L. Arruntius being consuls, a dreadful plague raged in Rome and all the other cities of Italy; which, as the lands were left untilled, was attended with a general famine. The Tiber overflowed, and laid great part of the city under water. Lightning fell on the Pantheon, and there dashed to pieces several statues, &c. The populace imagining, that the gods visited them with these, and threatened them with greater calamities, because they had suffered Augustus to lay down the consulate, surrounded the senate-house, and threatened to set fire to it, unless the fathers immediately created him dictator. The conscript fathers readily complied with their requeſt; whereupon the people repaired in great crouds to the house of Augustus, with twenty-four axes and fasces, entreating him to accept of the dictatorship; but he wisely declined the envy and danger of that title, having already all the power and authority annexed to it. However, that he might not seem to despise the favours of the people, he accepted the office of general purveyor, which had been formerly conferred on Pompey the Great, and took care to supply the city with great plenty of provisions, appointing annually two persons for that purpose, who had discharged the prætorship two years before. As to the office of perpetual censor, he could by no means be prevailed to take it upon him; but named to that important employment Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, brother to the triumvir, by whom he had been proscribed, and L. Munacius Plancus, formerly one of Antony's most zealous partizans; but Lepidus dying soon after, and Plancus, who was a man of a most infamous character, being no ways qualified to cenſure the vices of others, Auguſtus took upon himſelf to perform the functions, tho' he declined the title, of that magiſtracy, and enacted many excellent laws relating to the reformation of manners, which gained him the love and eſteem of the whole city. He ſuppreſſed ſeveral private aſſemblies, and reformed others; from the ædiles he transferred the care of the public ſhews and ſports to the prætors, whom he reduced to ten, and would not allow them to exhibit the uſual ſports at their own charges, but obliged the people to contribute a ſmall ſum for their own diverſions, and paid the reſt out of the public treaſury. As the ædileſhip was the firſt ſtep to public honours, the young noblemen often ſpent their whole fortunes, and reduced themſelves to beggary, by the expenſive ſhews with which they entertained the people, in hopes of being raiſed by their ſuffrages to the ſuperior magiſtracies; and it was to obviate this abuſe, that Auguſtus committed the celebrating of the games to the prætors, and would have the charges attending them divided between the people and the public treaſury. To the curule ædiles he committed the care of extinguiſhing fires, allowing them for that ſervice ſix hundred ſlaves, who were bought and maintained at the public expence. He likewiſe ordered by a particular edict, that none ſhould exhibit the ſhew of gladiators without leave from the ſenate, and then only twice a year, and with no more than one hundred and twenty combatants. As many perſons of rank, women as well as men, had of late debaſed themſelves to act and dance upon the ſtage, Auguſtus reſtrained ſuch ſcandalous practices, by forbidding, under the ſevereſt penalties, any of the ſenatorial or equeſtrian order to appear on the ſtage, and extending this prohibition to the children and grand-children of ſenators[z]. In theſe regulations he exerted the power and authority of an abſolute prince and legiſlator; but in other things uſed great condeſcenſion, affecting to appear in courts of judicature like a private perſon, and even to plead for his friends, or attend them when cited before the prætors or other judges. This complaiſance often drew inſults upon him from the adverſe parties, as it happened in the caſe of one M. Primus, who was accuſed of having made an irruption into the country of the Odryſians, while he was governor of Macedon. Primus maintained, that he had been ordered by Auguſtus guſtus to make war upon the Odryſians; whereupon Auguſtus, appearing ſoon after in court, was aſked by the prætor, Whether Primus's plea was true or no? The emperor anſwered, That Primus was certainly miſtaken, ſince he was very ſure he had given no ſuch orders. This open and poſitive declaration left no room for any reply; which ſo provoked L. Murena, who pleaded for Primus, that he could not help aſking the emperor with great boldneſs and anger, "What buſineſs he had there? and what had "brought him to a place where he was neither expected "nor wanted? The public good," replied Auguſtus with great calmneſs and moderation. This deportment gained him the eſteem of many; but others, who were enemies to Auguſtus in their hearts, and wiſhed to ſee the antient form of government reſtored, laid hold of this opportunity to ſtir up Murena, and to enter into a conſpiracy with him againſt the tyrant of Rome, as they ſtyled him. Murena and Fannius Cæpio, the former a man of an unblemiſhed character, and the latter the greateſt debauchee in Rome, took upon them the whole management of the plot, for the execution of which, a day and place was already appointed. But, in the mean time, Murena diſcloſed the whole to his ſiſter Terentilla, and ſhe to her huſband Mecænas, who gave notice of it to the emperor, after having adviſed his brother-in-law and the other conſpirator to abſcond, till ſuch time as he ſhould obtain, as he hoped to do, their pardon. But Auguſtus would not hearken to the entreaties either of Mecænas or Proculeius, who was brother to Murena, and in ſuch favour with the emperor, that he had been long in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould beſtow his daughter Julia on him or Marcellus. As Auguſtus proved inflexible, the conſpirators were ſummoned to take their trials, and not appearing, interdicted by a majority of ſuffrages fire and water, throughout the whole extent of the Roman empire. Cæpio was conveyed in the night-time by a faithful ſlave to the Tiber in a baſket, and put on board a ſmall veſſel which landed him at Oſtia. From Oſtia the ſlave conducted him ſafe to Laurentum, and from thence to Cumæ, where he was betrayed by another ſlave to a centurion, who cut off his head and carried it to Rome. Murena was diſcovered in Rome, and aſſaſſinated by Auguſtus's emiſſaries. As the conſpirators were abſolved by the votes of ſome of the judges, the emperor, fearing ſuch criminals might for the future go unpuniſhed, enacted the two following laws, viz. That all guilty per-ſons who refuſed to appear, ſhould be condemned to the ſame puniſhments, which would have been inflicted upon them, if they had been regularly tried and convicted; and that for the future the judges in criminal caſes ſhould deliver their opinions, not in writing, but openly and by word of mouth. Leſt the ſeverity he ſhewed on this occaſion, and the new laws he enacted, might eſtrange the minds of the people from him, he took no notice of the odd behaviour of old Cæpio, who not only ſet at liberty the ſlave who had conveyed his ſon out of Rome, but ſentenced the other to be crucified, after having cauſed him to be led through all the ſtreets of Rome with a writing, which expreſſed the cauſe of his puniſhment. At this time, Auguſtus, out of complaiſance to the ſenate, whom his ſeverity towards two men of rank might have provoked, delivered up to the conſcript fathers the provinces of Cyprus and Narbonne Gaul, which, from this time, began to be ranked among the proconſular provinces, and to be governed by magiſtrates ſent thither by the ſenate [a]. This ſame year, the Cantabrians and Aſturians revolted anew; but were ſoon brought under ſubjection by C. Furnius. Many of the Cantabrians, finding they could not ſhake off the yoke, choſe rather to lay violent hands on themſelves, than to bear it; ſo deep was the love of liberty imprinted in the hearts of that brave people [b]!

The provinces of Cyprus and Gaul delivered up to the ſenate.

AND now Italy and all the provinces in the weſt enjoying a profound tranquillity, Auguſtus reſolved to take a progreſs into the eaſt, and, with this view, ſet out for Sicily towards the end of the year, leaving the people at full liberty to chuſe for conſuls whom they pleaſed. At the time therefore appointed for the great elections the centuries met, and with one conſent raiſed to the conſulate Auguſtus, and gave him M. Lollius for his collegue; but he refuſing to accept of that dignity, and even to name another in his room, the centuries met a ſecond time, when ſuch diſorders were raiſed in the comitia, by the ambition of two competitors, L. Silanus and Q. Æmilius Lepidus, that the wiſer citizens thought it proper to acquaint Auguſtus therewith, and ſolicit him to return to Rome, and with his preſence put a ſtop to the conteſts and diviſions, which the oppoſite factions had raiſed in the city. Auguſtus heard the account of theſe diſturbances with a ſecret

cret satisfaction, hoping they would convince the most zealous and obstinate republicans, that they were no longer capable of governing themselves as formerly. However, left the quarrels of two such men, who had a great number of clients and were allied to most of the chief families in Rome, should produce a civil war, he sent for the candidates, reprimanded them severely, and commanded them to keep at a distance from Rome till the election was over. But this did not restore tranquillity to the city; the friends of the two competitors supported their respective interest with the same warmth as if they had been present; but at length Lepidus's party prevailed, and he was chosen consul. However, Augustus, to prevent such disturbances for the future, as he could not be always at Rome himself judged it necessary to create a new magistrate, whose province should be to maintain peace and tranquillity in the metropolis. Agrippa seemed to him the most proper person for so great a command. He therefore dispatched a messenger to him, ordering him to quit the island of Lesbos and repair to him in Sicily. On his arrival, to procure him more respect and authority in his new employment, he commanded him to divorce Marcella, tho' daughter to Octavia and Augustus's niece, and to marry his daughter Julia, the widow of Marcellus. We are told, that Mecænas promoted this match, by suggesting to Augustus, when he consulted him about it, that since he had already made Agrippa so great and powerful, he ought either to cut him off, or unalterably attach him to his interest by marrying him to his daughter [b]. The marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence, and Agrippa immediately after took his leave of Augustus, and set out for Rome, where he discharged his new office with great applause, being equally beloved by the senate and people.

Agrippa made governor of Rome.

He marries Julia, Augustus's daughter.

In the mean time, Augustus, having settled the affairs of Sicily, passed over into Greece, where he shewed particular marks of his favour to the Lacedæmonians, on whom he bestowed the island of Cithera and five cities, as a reward for the kindness they had formerly shewn to Livia, when she fled with her husband and son out of Italy. The Athenians he punished for having erected statues to Brutus and Caſſius, and afterwards ſided with Antony. He took from them the iſland of Ægina and the city of Eretria, forbidding them for the future to ſell the right of citizenſhip, which brought them in vaſt ſums, the Romans themſelves glorying in being free of Athens [c]. From Greece Auguſtus ſailed to Samos, and there wintered.

Auguſtus paſſes into the eaſt.

EARLY in the ſpring, M. Apuleius and P. Silius Nerva being conſuls, Auguſtus left Samos, and croſſed over into Aſia, ſettling the affairs of the provinces through which he paſſed, in as abſolute a manner as if they had belonged to himſelf and not to the ſenate. He deprived the Cyzicans of their liberty, for having whipt and put to death ſome Roman citizens. The ſame puniſhment he inflicted on the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, judging this the moſt effectual method of putting an end to the factions, which reigned in theſe two cities, and were attended with frequent murders. As he drew near the borders of Parthia, Phrahates king of that country, dreading a foreign war, as he was univerſally hated by his ſubjects, not only ſent back to him all the enſigns and captives taken by the Parthians, in their wars with Craſſus and Antony, but yielding to all the conditions which Auguſtus required, giving four of his ſons with their wives and children as hoſtages for the performance of them [d]; whereupon Juſtin obſerves, that Auguſtus did more by the greatneſs of his name, than any other commander could have done by a long and bloody war [e]; but Tacitus tells us, that not the fear of Auguſtus, but the diffidence Phrahates had of his own people, induced him thereunto [f]; and with him agree Strabo [g] and Joſephus [h] (C). However, Auguſtus, no leſs proud

(C) So far as we can gather from their writings, the whole matter ſeems to have paſſed in the following manner: A very beautiful Italian woman, named Thermuſa, having been formerly ſent by Auguſtus to Phrahates as a preſent, the king entertained her firſt as his concubine, and afterwards, on her bringing him a ſon, married her, and declared her queen. In this ſtation ſhe gained an abſolute aſcendant over him, which ſhe made uſe of to ſecure the ſucceſſion to her ſon. With this view ſhe propoſed to Phrahates the putting of his other ſons, whoſe names were proud of having thus recovered the Roman eagles and captives, than if he had overcome the Parthians in battle, ſent orders to the ſenate to ſhut up the temple of Janus, which he had opened on his ſetting out for the eaſt, and to offer ſacrifices, by way of thankſgiving to the gods, for the ſucceſs which had attended him in this expedition. To perpetuate the memory of an action, which he looked upon as the moſt glorious of his whole reign, on his return to Rome, he cauſed a temple to be built in the capitol to Mars the Avenger, upon the plan of that which had long before been built in honour of Jupiter Feretrius. In this new temple were hung up the military enſigns, which the king of Parthia had reſtored, as monuments of the homage which that proud monarch had paid to Auguſtus [i]. At the ſame time Auguſtus ſettled the affairs of Armenia. Artabazes, king of that country, having been taken priſoner by Antony and carried to Alexandria, as we have related above, Artaxias his ſon, whom Dion calls Artabazes, ſucceeded him. But he having made himſelf obnoxious to his ſubjects by a moſt tyrannical and oppreſſive reign, they complained of him to Auguſtus, deſiring to have

were Saroſpades, Ceroſpades, Phrahates, and Vonones, into the hands of the Romans. Phrahates, not thinking himſelf ſafe againſt his ſubjects, ſo long as there were any of the race of Arſaces of an age fit to govern, readily complied with the queen's propoſal; and accordingly, when matters were made up between him and Auguſtus, and hoſtages demanded for the ſecuring of the terms of that agreement, he delivered his four ſons into the hands of Auguſtus, who carried them to Rome, where they remained many years. As for Thermuſa's ſon, who was named Phrahatices, he was bred up to ſucceed his father in the kingdom. The Parthians were ſo ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to the race of Arſaces, that Phrahates well knew they would bear him, ſo long as they had no other of that family of an age fit to be ſet up to reign in his room; and this was, according to Strabo and Joſephus (6), the reaſon why Phrahates ſo readily yielded up his ſons to the Romans; but at length his deſtruction came from what he thus projected for his ſafety, as we have related in our hiſtory of the Parthians (7).

to reign over them in his ſtead. Auguſtus complied with their requeſt, and ſent Tiberius, the ſon of Livia, who had attended him into the eaſt, with an army into Armenia to drive out Artaxias and place Tigranes on the throne But Artaxias being killed by his own ſubjects before the arrival of Tiberius, and Tigranes thereupon admitted, without oppoſition, to ſucceed him, the young Roman had no opportunity of ſignalizing himſelf by any military exploits However, he crowned the new king with great pomp and magnificence, placing the diadem upon his tribunal, and obliging Tigranes to receive it of him, as if he had been indebted to him for his kingdom [k]. Velleius Paterculus, the great flatterer of Tiberius, tells us, that, entering Armenia at the head of his legions, he reduced the whole country, and obliged the Armenians to receive Tigranes, whom he calls Artavaſdes, for their king. He adds, that the Parthians were ſo terrified at his approach, and the fame of his name and exploits, that they ſent back to Auguſtus the Roman enſigns and captives [l]. But all other writers aſcribe the recovery of the enſigns to Auguſtus, and agree, that Tiberius performed nothing worth mentioning.

Who receives the crown of Tiberius.

This year, Julia, who had had no children by her firſt huſband Marcellus, brought Agrippa a ſon, who was named Caius, and on whoſe birth-day a perpetual ſacrifice, with other ſolemnities, was decreed by way of thankſgiing to the gods [m]. Towards the end of the ſummer, Auguſtus left Syria, and being attended by Herod, king of Judea, to the ſea ſide, he embarqued and ſailed for Samos, where he paſſed the enſuing winter. In the mean time, the conſular year being expired, Auguſtus was named conſul in the aſſembly of the people, and C. Sentius Saturninus given him for his collegue. But Auguſtus declining that office, the factions revived, and the campus Martius was turned into a field of battle, many perſons being killed in the fray; inſomuch, that Auguſtus, to put a ſtop to the diſorders that were raiſed on this occaſion by the ambitious competitors, was obliged to name a collegue to Sentius of his own authority. The perſon he pitched upon was Q. Lucretius Veſpillo, who had been formerly proſcribed by the triumvirs, but at this time ſerved under Auguſtus in quality of lieutenant.

lieutenant. Theſe two magiſtrates together with Agrippa maintained peace and tranquillity in the city, by puniſhing with the utmoſt ſeverity the ring-leaders of the late tumult [n].

A ſecond embaſſy to Auguſtus from the king of India.

While Auguſtus reſided at Samos, he received a ſecond embaſſy from the king of India, ſoliciting an alliance with him. The embaſſadors, as we are informed by Nicolas of Damaſcus, who ſaw them as they paſſed through Antioch, delivered to Auguſtus a letter in the Greek tongue, wherein the king of India told him, that though he reigned over ſix hundred kings, yet he had ſo great a value for his friendſhip, that he ſent this embaſſy on ſo long a journey on purpoſe to deſire it of him; that he was ready to meet him in what place ſoever he pleaſed to appoint; and that upon the firſt notice he would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power in whatever was right. This letter he ſubſcribed by the name of "Porus, king of India." The ſix hundred kings, whom he boaſted to reign over, were the rajas, or petty princes, who governed the kingdom under him, ſeveral of whoſe deſcendents remain to this day, who, paying an annual tribute to the Great Mogol, govern their ſubjects with an abſolute authority. Of the embaſſadors, who firſt ſet out from India, three only reached the preſence of Auguſtus, the others dying by the way. Of the three ſurviving one was Zarmar a gymnoſophiſt, who following Auguſtus to Athens, there burnt himſelf in his preſence, as Calanus, another of that ſect, had formerly done in the preſence of Alexander, it being cuſtomary for the gymnoſophiſts to put an end to their lives, by throwing themſelves on their funeral piles, when they thought they had lived long enough, or apprehended ſome misfortune [o]. Among the preſents which they brought were huge vipers, ſerpents ten cubits long, a river tortoiſe three cubits long, a partridge bigger than a vultur, and ſeveral tygers, the firſt that had ever been ſeen either by the Greeks or Romans [p]. Auguſtus early in the ſpring left Samos, after having declared the inhabitants free, and returned to Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations and all poſſible marks of honour, his bringing back the military enſigns and priſoners taken in the Parthian wars being what the Romans valued beyond the greateſt victories. Auguſtus himſelf took ſo much pride in having thus retrieved the glory of the Roman name among foreign nations, that he cauſed a great number of medals, many of which have reached us, to be ſtruck with this legend on the reverſe. "Signis receptis." The poets of his time made, as is well known, his recovering of the enſigns and priſoners, the common topic of their flatteries [q]. Three triumphal arches were decreed him by the ſenate, an altar was erected to Fortune with this inſcription, "Fortunæ reduci;" and it was ordained, that the day of his arrival in the capital ſhould be annually ſolemniſed with ſacrifices, ſports, ſhews, &c. and diſtinguiſhed by the name of Auguſtalia, or "the feaſt of Auguſtus." This year died the prince of the Latin poets in the fifty-firſt year of his age, having bequeathed a conſiderable part of his great wealth to Auguſtus and Mecænas, his two chief patrons and benefactors. He had deſigned to attend Auguſtus into the eaſt, but was obliged by the bad ſtate of his health to remain at Naples, whence he paſſed over to Athens to meet Auguſtus on his return from the iſland of Samos. The emperor received him with uncommon marks of kindneſs and eſteem; but he, leaving Athens ſoon after to viſit the antiquities of Megara in the hot ſeaſon of the year, fell ſick there, but nevertheleſs embarqued for Italy, and reached Brunduſium, where he expired ſoon after his arrival. As he had not yet put the laſt hand to his Æneid, he ordered by his will that inimitable performance to be burnt; but Auguſtus ſaved Troy, we may ſay with an antient poet, from a ſecond conflagration, and by that means preſerved for all future ages a moſt perfect pattern of epic poetry. Virgil's body was, according to his own appointment, conveyed to Naples, and there laid in a monument erected for that purpoſe on the road from Naples to Puteoli. On the monument was engraved a diſtich wrote by the poet himſelf, wherein he gave a modeſt account of his birth, his death, the place of his burial, and his works [r]. (D)

But to return to Auguſtus; as there reigned at this time in Rome a general depravation of manners, and the city was in a manner over-run with all kinds of vices, the ſenate prevailed upon Auguſtus to accept the office of cenſor for five years.

years. At the same time, they conferred upon him the consular power for life, ordaining, that he should always have twelve axes and fasces carried before him, and should sit in a curule chair between the consuls. At the same time, they entreated him to make new laws, offering to bind themselves by oath to the observance of them. But the emperor refused an oath, which he judged useless, intimating, that if his laws were good, they would observe them without that tie; if not, their oath would be ineffectual [s]. And now, the presence of Agrippa being no longer necessary in Rome, Augustus dispatched him into Gaul to stop the incursions of the Germans, who, having passed the Rhine, committed horrible disorders in the countries subject to Rome. But, at the approach of so renowned a commander, they repassed the river, and sheltered themselves in their woods. Hereupon Agrippa, having settled the affairs of that country, and left a sufficient number of troops to guard the banks of the Rhine, the boundary between Gaul and Germany, passed from thence into Spain, where the Cantabrians, notwithstanding their former losses, had raised new disturbances. Most of their youth had a few years before been taken prisoners, and sold for slaves to the neighbouring nations; but, having found means to break their chains, they had cut the throats of their masters, and returning into their own country, fortified themselves there, and attacked with incredible fury the Roman garrisons. Agrippa marched against them with great expedition, but, on his arrival in their country, he met with so vigorous a resistance from that brave and gallant people, that his soldiers began to despair of ever being able to reduce them. As the Cantabrians had waged war with the Romans for two hundred years and upwards, they were well acquainted with their manner of fighting, no ways inferior to them in point of courage, and now become desperate, as well knowing, that if they were conquered, after having so often attempted to recover their liberty, they must expect the most severe usage and cruel slavery. Animated with this reflection, they fell upon the Romans with a fury hardly to be expressed, put them to flight in several rencounters, and defended themselves, when attacked by the enemy, with such intrepidity and resolution, that Agrippa afterwards owned, that he had never, either by sea or land, been engaged in a more dangerous expedition. That brave commander was obliged to use entreaties, menaces, and to brand some of his legionaries with ignominy, ignominy, before he could bring them to enter the liſts with ſo reſolute and formidable an enemy. But having at length with much ado prevailed upon them to try the chance of an engagement in the open field, he ſo animated them by his own example, that, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, he gained in the end a complete victory, which indeed coſt him dear, but put an end to that deſtructive war. All the Cantabrians fit to bear arms were cut in pieces, their caſtles and ſtrong-holds were taken and razed, and their women, children, and old men, none elſe being left alive, were obliged to abandon the mountanious places and ſettle in the plain. Thus Agrippa completed the reduction of a brave nation, which had kept the Roman arms employed for the ſpace of two hundred years, that is, ever ſince the time of Scipio Africanus, the firſt Roman who made war in Spain. The final reduction of Cantabria and the quieting of all Spain, was judged both by the ſenate and Auguſtus well worthy of a triumph; but Agrippa modeſtly declined that honour, aſcribing the whole glory of ſo ſucceſsful an expedition to Auguſtus, under whoſe auſpices he had fought. He was well acquainted with the jealous humour of the emperor, no ways renowned for military atchievements; and therefore, to avoid giving him the leaſt umbrage, he artfully leſſened his own glory for fear of eclipſing his, which, he knew, might be attended with dangerous conſequences [t]. Agrippa on his return to Rome applied himſelf wholly to the embelliſhing of the city with new edifices, and ſupplying it with great plenty of water, which proved no leſs ornamental to that great metropolis, than convenient and uſeful to the vaſt multitudes of people who flocked thither from all parts of the then known world. The waters, Virgo, Julia, and Tepula, were by him conveyed, at his own expence, into the city, by aqueducts, of a moſt magnificent ſtructure, and for the moſt part ſupported by large and beautiful columns of marble. The aqueducts of the waters, Appia and Marcia, which conveyed into Rome, we may ſay, whole rivers, were by him repaired at a vaſt charge. In ſhort, to Agrippa chiefly is Rome indebted for that great plenty of wholeſome water, which it enjoys to this day, perhaps above all the cities in the world; and to this Auguſtus alluded, when he pleaſantly anſwered the people, who complained to him of the ſcarcity and dearth of wine, that "Agrippa had taken care they ſhould not die of thirſt [u]."

Towards the end of this year, Auguſtus granted a triumph to Lucius Cornelius Balbus for having ſubdued the Garamantes, a people of Africa, hitherto unknown to the Romans. Balbus made himſelf maſter of that country, which lay between Africa properly ſo called, that is, the antient dominions of Carthage, Lower Æthiopia, and Getulia, extending by that means the limits of the Roman empire as far as the river Nigris. Such an important conqueſt Auguſtus judged well worthy of a triumph, which was accordingly granted to Balbus, though he was not ſo much as a native of Italy, but born at Gades in Spain, and lately admitted to the rights of a Roman citizen. He had the glory of being the firſt foreigner who was honoured with this mark of diſtinction, Auguſtus wiſely overlooking antient cuſtoms, to honour and reward valour without diſtinction in men of all nations [w]. This year Ælius Gallus, præfect of Egypt, made a progreſs into the upper parts of that country, as far as Syene and the borders of Ethiopia, in which Strabo the greographer attended him, who tells us, that at Thebes he ſaw the ſtatue of Memnon, which, according to the poets [x], ſaluted the ſun at his firſt riſing with an harmonious ſound. He adds, that being one morning on the place, he heard the ſound without knowing how it was produced, but ſuſpected it came from ſome of thoſe who were there preſent, and not from the ſtatue [y].

The Garamantes ſubdued.

The next year, P. Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, either brothers or relations, being conſuls, Auguſtus prorogued his authority for five years more, the firſt ten years of his ſovereign power being near expired. This, he well knew, would ſtir up the zealous republicans againſt him; and therefore, dreading the fate of his father Julius, he took care never to appear in public, but armed with a breaſt-plate under his robe; and, to deprive them of all hopes of ever ſeeing the antient form of government reſtored, he made Agrippa, as it were, his partner in the ſovereign power, conferring upon him an authority almoſt equal to his own, and the high prerogative of the tribuneſhip for the ſpace of five years; ſo that the few republicans, who ſtill remained, being well appriſed, that if they ſhould cut off Auguſtus, Agrippa might eaſily ſtep into his place and revenge his death, as he was greatly adored both by the people and ſoldiery, gave gave over all thoughts of any further attempts for the reco very of their liberty [z]. The firſt thing Auguſtus undertook after the prorogation of his power was, to reform the ſenate many perſons of no birth and of infamous characters, having been admitted into that venerable body, during the confuſion of the civil wars. In order to purge the ſenate of ſo many unworthy members, he agreed with Agrippa, whom he took for his collegue in the cenſorſhip, to reduce the number of the fathers from a thouſand to ſix hundred; but, to avoid the odium of chuſing them all himſelf, he named only thirty empowering each of them to elect five: of the five, each of them named, one only was to be choſen, and he by lot; ſo that thirty only were elected at a time; but as ſoon as that election was over, five others were named by each of the thirty electors, and one of the five choſen by lot as before. Though each of the thirty electors had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath not to elect any of his own relations, or perſons unworthy of that rank, yet in ſome of their tablets were found the names of men of a moſt infamous character, while others of known probity were excluded. This unjuſt partiality induced Auguſtus and Agrippa to change the method of election, and ſince they could not depend upon others, to name the reſt themſelves to the number of ſix hundred wherein to do them juſtice, they proceeded with the utmoſt impartiality, chuſing only men of merit, and by that means reſtoring the ſenatorial order to its former ſplendor. Thoſe who were degraded, to the number of four hundred, were allowed to appear at the public ſhews with the antient badges of their dignity, and to ſtand for the firſt offices, as if they had been ſtill members of the ſenatorial order. But, notwithſtanding this diſtinction, many of them were ſoon after put to death, for having, as it was ſuppoſed, conſpired againſt the emperor; though Tacitus tells us [a], that Auguſtus laid hold of this opportunity to get rid of ſuch as he ſuſpected of being republicans in their hearts, and ſecret enemies to abſolute power. Some writers think he followed, in putting many of the degraded ſenators to death, the old maxim, that "a prince ought to cut off thoſe whom he has once provoked." Be that as it will, it is certain, that Auguſtus for ſome time after betrayed a great fear of being aſſaſſinated, admitting no body to his preſence, but after a narrow ſearch, whether they had any arms concealed under their garments, and forbidding even the ſenators to approach his chair more than

than one at a time. This precaution gave the fathers an opportunity of making a propoſal, which was highly agreeable to the timorous emperor. They offered to watch night and day at the door of his room, each in his turn, to guard his perſon. But while they were conſulting about their propoſal, Antiſtius Labeo, a learned civilian and a man of great humour, pretending to ſleep, ſnored very loud, and waking as it were all on a ſudden, "Don't depend upon me," ſaid he, "to guard the emperor; for I ſhall be apt to fall "aſleep, and prove more troubleſome to him than ſervice-"able." The ſenators could not forbear laughing, and Auguſtus aſhamed of his cowardice, made them drop the propoſal, when they were ready to confirm it by a decree [b].

Auguſtus, having thus reſtored the ſenate to its antient ſplendor, applied himſelf in the next place to the reforming of ſeveral abuſes in the city. He decreed, that ſuch, as ſhould be convicted of having purchaſed the ſuffrages of the people with money, ſhould be excluded from all public offices for the ſpace of five years. That the people, who uſed to ſell their votes, might not be ſufferers by this law, he cauſed large ſums to be diſtributed among them, on condition, that they ſhould not require any thing of the candidates. To check the debauchery of the Roman youth, which at this time was greater than ever had been known, he laid heavy taxes upon ſuch as continued unmarried after a certain age, and encouraged with great rewards the procreation of lawful children. He allowed the patricians and plebeians to intermarry, declaring, that though a patrician ſhould marry a liberta or freed-woman, his children ſhould rank among the patricians. However, he excepted the ſenators, whom he would not allow to marry under their rank; and becauſe the Hortenſian family had been by the civil wars reduced almoſt to beggary, he preſented young Hortenſius with a large ſum, which put him in a condition of marrying a woman of diſtinction. The looſe behaviour of the married women was what chiefly deterred the young Romans from marriage; but Auguſtus, who had himſelf debauched many, not ſparing even the wife of his great friend Mecænas, refuſed to put a ſtop to that diſorder, ſaying, that he left the care of married women to their huſbands. Having reformed many abuſes in the ſtate, he applyed his thoughts to matters of

of religion, calling in a great many prophetic books, which were then in vogue, and causing most of them, to the number of two thousand volumes, to be burnt as spurious, reserving only those which were commonly ascribed to some of the Sibyls. These also he subjected to a strict examination, and retained such only as were on this trial judged genuine; the rest he committed to the flames, but those that were judged genuine he caused to be copied by the pontifices themselves, and lodged them in two golden cabinets, which he placed in the temple of Apollo built by him in his palace [c]. These Sibylline oracles were of great repute among the Gentiles, and often appealed to by the antient Christian writers.

Lucius Cæsar born.

This year, Julia brought Agrippa a second son, who was named Lucius, and Augustus adopted both him and his brother Caius, declaring them his successors, in order to put a stop to any attempts that might be made by the old republicans, for the recovery of their liberty [d].

Augustus rejects the title of Dominus or Lord.

The following year, C. Furnius and C. Julius Silanus being consuls, the secular games, which had not been celebrated for an hundred years before, were exhibited by Augustus and Agrippa, with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. In these games one of the players giving him the title of Dominus, that is, lord or sovereign, he shewed great marks of dissatisfaction, and the next morning published an edict, forbidding all persons under severe penalties to give him that title for the future. It was on occasion of these games that Horace wrote the Hymn, entitled, "Carmen Seculare," which was sung at the sacrifice, that was offered to Pluto and Proserpine before the shews and spectacles of the circus, the theatre, and amphitheatre. Great part of this year was spent in public games and diversions, of which Augustus himself was a great admirer, especially of the tournament, or warlike exercise, called Troy, which he thought becoming the education of the young nobility. He was likewise a great encourager of wrestling, but would not allow women to be present at those games. He enticed to Rome with great rewards the best players and actors from all parts of the world, took them under his protection, and would not allow the prætors and ædiles to cause them, according to antient custom, to be publicly whipt, when they had not performed to the satisfaction of the audience. But, notwithstanding the encouragement he gave them, he severely examined their morals, not not allowing the leaſt licentiouſneſs in their lives, or indecency in their actions. Being informed, that one Stephanio a comedian was attended by a woman in the diſguiſe of a boy, he ordered him to be whipt through the three theatres, and baniſhed the city. He likewiſe drove out of Rome Pylades a famous actor, for having behaved diſreſpectfully towards a Roman citizen, and becauſe he was continually quarreling with Bathyllius, an actor no leſs famous than himſelf, and greatly favoured by Mecænas. But he ſoon recalled him to gratify the people, and the comedian, on his return, inſtead of thanking the emperor, told him, that it was his intereſt the people ſhould be diverted by men of his profeſſion, leſt they ſhould watch too narrowly his actions, or ſeriouſly reflect on their own condition [c].

Entices players to Rome, but puniſhes their licentiouſneſs.

The enſuing year, Auguſtus, having got L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and P. Cornelius Scipio, two perſons wholly addicted to him, raiſed to the conſulate, reſolved to leave Rome for a while, and march with an army into Gaul, to quell ſome diſturbances there occaſioned by the avarice of Libinius Enceladus, who, being appointed by the emperor to gather the taxes in thoſe parts, had obliged the people to pay them monthly, and, by a deceitful account, reckoned fourteen months in the year. However, the diſturbances were not ſuch as required the preſence of the emperor. It was therefore commonly believed, that he undertook this expedition with no other view, but to enjoy the company of Terentia, or, as others call her, Terentilla, the wife of his friend Mecænas, without being diſturbed in the enjoyment of his ſcandalous pleaſures, either by her huſband, or his own wife Livia. He took Terentia with him, and, becauſe Mecænas could not help reſenting this baſe treatment, he appointed Statilius Taurus governor of Rome during his abſence, paſſing over his old friend, who had, in more difficult times, diſcharged that office with great applauſe. As for Agrippa, he diſpatched him again into the eaſt, to ſettle there ſome differences between the princes and ſtates of Aſia. Auguſtus no ſooner paſſed the Alps, than the Gauls returned to their duty, but the Sicambri, Uſipetes, and Tencteri, people of Germany, having paſſed the Rhine, defeated firſt a conſiderable body of Roman horſe, and afterwards M. Lollius, proconſul of Gaul, from whom they took a ſtandard. Lollius, though no great commander, found ſoon after an opportunity of retrieving his honour, by falling upon the Germans unawares, and driving them with great loſs beyond the Rhine. Though all was now quiet in Gaul, yet Auguſtus ſpent the remaining part of this and all the following year, when M. Lucius Druſus Libo and L. Calpurnius Piſo were conſuls, in that province, not caring to return to the capital, where he well knew his criminal converſation with his friend's wife would give occaſion to endleſs ſatires and lampoons, eſpecially, after he had ſet up for a reformer of manners, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity leſs crimes in others. During his ſtay in Gaul, the inhabitants flocked to him from all parts of the country with complaints againſt Enceladus. He was by birth a Gaul, and formerly a ſlave of Julius Cæſar, by whom he had been taken in the Gauliſh wars; but being afterwards manumitted by him, and having found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Auguſtus, he had been appointed by him receiver-general of all the taxes paid annually by his countrymen. In this employment he oppreſſed the Gauls in a moſt barbarous manner; inſomuch that Auguſtus, aſhamed of having employed a man of ſo infamous a character, was determined to inflict upon him ſuch puniſhment as ſhould deter others from the like practices. But the crafty Gaul found means to appeaſe the emperor, by delivering up to him the vaſt ſums he had heaped up by rapine and extortion, and aſſuring him, that in plundering the Gauls he had nothing elſe in view, but to enrich the public treaſury, and put his countrymen out of a condition of being ever able to ſhake off the Roman yoke. Auguſtus pleaſed with this defence, and more with the large ſums, which were delivered to him upon the ſpot, not only abſolved the iniquitous extortioner, but approved of his conduct, and, deaf to the complaints of the oppreſſed Gauls, continued him in his office [e].

Auguſtus refuſes to redreſs the grievances of the Gauls.

But according to Strabo and Pliny, whoſe opinion is by all modern geographers preferred to that of Ptolemy, the Rhœti inhabited only the Alps, and the vallies formed by thoſe mountains, their country reaching no farther than the lake of Conſtance; from that lake to the conflux of the Ænus and the Danube extended Vindelicia, or the country of the Vindelici, and Noricum from thence to the Cethian mountains. In the country of the Vindelici were antiently ſome cities of no ſmall note, viz. Auguſta Vindelicorum, Juvavium, or Colonia Jovavia, Reginum or Regina caſtra, Batava caſtra, Abuſena, Guntia, Campodunum, Abudiacum, Iſiniſca, now Auſburg, Saltzburg, Regenſburg, Paſſau, Abenſberg, Gurtzberg, Kempten, Fueſſen, and Munchen, now the metropolis of Bavaria; Boiodurum was the metropolis of that country in former times, ſo called from the Boii, who being driven out of Boiohemia, now Bohemia, by the Marcomanni, under the conduct of Maroboduus, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak anon, ſettled in Bojoaria or Boiuvaria, now called Bavaria. Vindelicia borrowed its name from the rivers Vindo or Vinda, now the Wert, and Lycus, which, watering great part of it, and running the one to the eaſt, the other to the weſt, of Auguſta Vindelicorum, now Auſburg, join at a ſmall diſtance from that city, and with one ſtream fall into the Danube. They are both mentioned by Venantius Fortunatus in the following verſe:

The chief cities of Rhœtia, or, as ſome write it, Rœtia, were Tridentum, Curia, Feltria, and Belunum, now Trent, Chur, or Coira, Feltri, Belluno. Some writers place Verona in Rhœtia; but Strabo reckons Verona among the cities of Italy. Horace mentions the victories gained by Tiberius and his brother Druſus over the Vindelici and Rhœti.

The Genauni and Breuni were inhabitants of Rhœtia, as is plain from Strabo (11). For the better underſtanding of the antients, it is neceſſary to obſerve here, that though Rhœtia and Vindelicia were two diſtinct countries, yet they formed but one Roman province, called Rhœtia; and hence the antients, when they mention Rhœtia, or the Rhœtian province, are to be underſtood as ſpeaking of Rhœtia, properly ſo called, and Vindelicia; that is, of the countries lying between the lake of Conſtance, the Danube, the Ænus, and the territories of the Carni, of the Veneti, and of the Inſubres. And hence it is, that Tacitus, in ſpeaking of Auguſta Vindelicorum, calls it, the faireſt colony of the Rhœtian province (12); and Horace calls the Vindelici, Rhœti Vindelici, to diſtinguiſh them from the inhabitants of Rhœtia, properly ſo called (13). In the time of the emperor Adrian, or rather of Diocleſian, the Rhœtian province was divided into two, whereof the firſt was called Rhœtia Prima, and comprehended Rhœtia Proper, and the ſecond, comprehending Vindelicia, Rhœtia Secunda: the metropolis of the former was Curia, of the latter Auguſta Vindelicorum (14).

Noricum, formerly a kingdom (15), and afterwards a Roman province, extended between the Danube and the Alpes Noricæ in the neighbourhood of Trent, from the Ænus, which parted it from

on this occaſion with a prudence far ſuperior to his years; for he found means to draw the enemy to a battle, gained a complete victory over them, and cut great numbers of them in pieces, with the loſs of a very ſmall number of his own men. Thoſe who eſcaped the general ſlaughter, being joined by the Vindelici, took their rout towards Gaul, with a deſign to invade that province. But Auguſtus, upon the firſt notice of their march, detached Tiberius, who had attended him into Gaul, at the head of ſeveral choſen legions, to complete the ſlaughter, which his brother had begun: and indeed Tiberius was no leſs ſucceſsful than Druſus; for having tranſported his troops over the lake Brigantium, now the lake of Conſtance, he fell unexpectedly upon the enemy, gave them a total overthrow, took in that ſurpriſe and confuſion moſt of their ſtrong-holds, and obliged the whole nation to ſubmit to what terms he thought proper to impoſe upon them. Thus were the Vindelici, the Rhœti, and the Norici, three of the moſt barbarous nations of Germany, by the valour of Druſus and Tiberius, brought under the Roman yoke [f]. Tiberius, to keep in awe the country he had ſubdued, planted two colonies from Vindelicia, to the Cetian mountains its boundaries on the ſide of Pannonia; ſo that antient Noricum comprehended great part of Auſtria, the archbiſhopric of Saltzburg, and all Stiria and Carinthia. It was afterwards, probably in the time of Dioclesian (16), divided into two provinces, viz. Noricum Ripenſe, ſo called, becauſe it extended along the Danube, lying on the ſouth ſide of that river, which divided it from Germany properly ſo called; and Noricum Mediterraneum, compriſing that part which lay at ſome diſtance from the Danube. In the province of Noricum Ripenſe were the following cities of note, Jovavum or Jovavia, Boiodurum, Lentin, Ovilia, or Ovilabis, and Lauriacum or Laureacum, now Saltzburg, Innſtadt, Lintz, Wels, and Lorch; in Noricum Mediterraneum, Pons Æni, Viſcelli or Viſcellæ, Graviacis, Aguntum, Teurnia and Solva, now Inſpruck, Weltz, Gurch, Innichen, and Villach: Lauriacum was the metropolis of the former province, and Solva, long ſince buried in its ruins, of the latter (17).

colonies in Vindelicia, and opened a road from thence into Noricum and Rhœtia. One of the cities, which he built for the defence of his colonies, he called, by the name of his father Druſus, Druſomagus, the other, by the name of Auguſtus, Auguſta-Vindelicorum, which cities are now known by the names of Mimminghen and Augſburgh.

Agrippa's exploits in the eaſt.

WHILE Auguſtus and his two ſons-in-law were thus employed in Gaul and Germany, Agrippa was ſettling with equal ſucceſs the affairs of the eaſtern provinces. On his firſt arrival in the province of Aſia properly ſo called, Herod king of Judæa haſtened thither to wait upon him, and having prevailed with him to take a tour into Judæa, he entertained him and all his attendants in a moſt elegant and ſumptuous manner. After having ſhewn him all his new-built cities and caſtles viz. Sebaſte, Cæſarea, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hyrcania, he carried him in the laſt place to Jeruſalem. As he drew near that city, he was met by all the people in their beſt apparel, and attended into the metropolis of Judæa, by a ſolemn proceſſion and with loud acclamations. After he had ſtaid there ſome days to view the curioſities of that great city, he offered an hecatomb at the temple, feaſted all the people, and then haſtening to the port, where his fleet waited for him, he ſailed back into Ionia before winter, highly pleaſed at the reception he had met with from the Jewiſh king [g]. Early in the ſpring, he was obliged to quit Ionia, and advance towards the Cimmerian Boſphorus [h], to quell ſome diſturbances there. For Aſander, king of that country, dying without iſſue, had left his kingdom to Dynamis his wife, in whoſe right he had held it, ſhe being the daughter of Pharnaces the ſon of Mithridates. One Scribonius, a native of Aſia, pretending to be the grandſon of Mithridates, and to have a grant from Auguſtus to ſucceed Aſander, married Dynamis and ſeized the crown. But Agrippa, knowing him to be an impoſtor, ſent Polemon, whom the Romans had made king of Pontus and the Leſſer Armenia, to drive him from the throne. Before the arrival of Polemon, the Boſphorans themſelves, being well ſatisfied that Scribonius was no ways related to their royal family, but an impoſtor in all his pretenſions, had put him to death. However, they would not ſubmit to Polemon, but, though overcome by him in a pitched battle on his firſt coming into their country, ſtill held out, and were likely likely in the end to get the better of him. Hereupon Agrippa marched with all his forces to the assistance of Polemon, which Herod no sooner heard, than he hastened after him with a considerable fleet, and a good number of his best troops on board; and having sailed first to Mitylene, and thence to Byzantium, overtook him at length at Sinope in Pontus. Nothing could be more acceptable to the Roman general than such a supply; for he stood in great need both of sea and land-forces, the Bosphorans having armed a great many vessels, and beset with their land-forces, which were both brave and numerous, all the defiles and narrow passes, through which the Romans were to pass. However, with the assistance of Herod, he opened himself a way into the heart of the enemy's country, and having brought the Bosphorans under subjection, he obliged Dynamis to marry Polemon, conferring on him the kingdom of Bosphorus, which by the favour of Augustus, who confirmed that grant, he held with that of Pontus and Armenia Minor. However, he had not the whole kingdom of Pontus, but only that part of it which lay next to Cappadocia, and was afterwards by way of distinction called Pontus Polemoniacus. Agrippa, having thus settled matters in Bosphorus, returned through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Phrygia, to Ephesus in Ionia, being attended thither by Herod, who obtained many favours of him in behalf of the nations, through which he passed; and, on his coming into Ionia, not only got the many grievances redressed, of which the Jews, who were spread all over Asia and the adjacent islands, with great reason complained, but all their immunities and privileges restored, in as ample a manner, as they had ever enjoyed them, either under the kings of Syria or the Romans [i]. Julia, Agrippa's wife, attending him in this expedition, suffered great hardships, and narrowly escaped being drowned in the Scamander, as she passed that river in the night-time, while it was swelled with sudden rains. The inhabitants of Ilium, whose territory was watered by the Scamander, were altogether ignorant of her coming; but nevertheless Agrippa was, contrary to all justice, so provoked against them for not having assisted her, that he laid a fine upon them of an hundred thousand drachmas. Hereupon the Ilienses, not daring to appear before Agrippa, prevailed upon Nicholas of Damascus, who happened to be at that time in their city, to engage Herod to speak

ſpeak to Agrippa in their behalf. The king of Judæa readily eſpouſed their cauſe, and by his intereſt with Agrippa prevailed upon him to remit the fine, for which ſignal favour great honours were decreed him by the Ilienſes [k]. After this Agrippa paſſed from Epheſus to Samos, and Herod, taking his leave of him, returned into Judea, where he received the thanks of the whole nation, for what he had done in behalf of the Jews in Aſia Minor [l]. Auguſtus, who was ſtill in Gaul, being informed of the ſucceſs which had attended Agrippa in the Cimmerian Boſphorus, ordered ſupplications to be made in the capital, and paſſed a decree, empowering Agrippa on his return to enter Rome in triumph [m]. This year Lepidus the triumvir dying, Auguſtus took upon him the office of pontifex maximus, or high prieſt, vacant by his death [n]. This dignity he held to the hour of his death, as did all his ſucceſſors, as well Chriſtians as Heathens, till the time of the emperor Gratian, who, ſucceeding his father Valentinian in the year of the Chriſtian æra 305, and thinking it inconſiſtent with the Chriſtian religion, of which he was a zealous profeſſor, to bear even the name of high-prieſt in the rites of the Gentiles, refuſed that title, as did afterwards all thoſe who ſucceeded him in the Roman empire [o]. This year died likewiſe Vedius Pollio, famous in hiſtory for the cruelty with which he treated his ſlaves, throwing them often for the ſmalleſt faults into his fiſh-ponds to fatten his murænas. As he had been raiſed by Auguſtus from the mean condition of a libertinus, or the ſon of a freed-man, to the rank of a Roman knight, he appointed him his chief heir, bequeathing to him his fine country ſeat, called Pauſilypus, in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, and his houſe in town, which was one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent buildings in Rome. Auguſtus, however, cauſed it to be pulled down, and a ſumptuous portico to be built in its room, for the uſe of the public, which from his wife's name he called Porticus Livia [p].

affairs of Gaul, ſtopped the incurſions of the Germans, and brought under ſubjection moſt of the nations inhabiting the Alps, left Druſus with an army upon the Rhine, and returned to the capital, either in the end of this, or in the beginning of the following, year, when Tiberius Claudus Nero, his ſon-in-law, and P. Quintilius Varus were conſuls. As he had been near three years abſent, he was received by the people with univerſal joy and ſatisfaction. But he could not be prevailed upon to accept any of the honours, which the fathers, ſome out of fear, others out of flattery, decreed him. Nay, he would not even allow the people to come out and meet him, but, according to his cuſtom, entered the city by night. The next morning the whole city went to wait upon him at his palace, for his houſe was ſo called, becauſe it was ſituated on the Palatium or Palatine hill. Auguſtus received them with great politeneſs and condeſcenſion, and afterwards, being attended by moſt of the ſenators and knights and numberleſs crouds of people, he went up to the capitol, and, proſtrating himſelf before the ſtatue of Jupiter Capitolinus, took the laurel from about his faſces, and laid it at his feet. A few days after he aſſembled the ſenate, but, not being able to ſpeak himſelf by reaſon of a violent cold he had got on his journey home, he gave the quæſtor a paper to read, containing an account of what he had done ever ſince he left the capital. As he was not interrupted this year by any diſturbances either at home or abroad, he enacted many excellent laws, which were long obſerved by his ſucceſſors. Among the reſt he publiſhed one, by which it was enacted, to the great ſatisfaction of the inhabitants of Italy, that for the future the ſervices of the veterans ſhould not be rewarded with lands, but money. What evils attended the beſtowing of lands upon them, is plain from Virgil's eclogues. By the ſame law the time was fixed, which each corps was to ſerve, the pay which they were to receive during their ſervice, and the ſum they were to expect, if they continued to ſerve after the time preſcribed by law was expired. The emperor's own guards, known by the name of the prætorian cohorts or bands, were, by this law, to ſerve twelve years before they could demand their diſmiſſion, and the reſt ſixteen; the former were allowed about twelve pence of our money a-day, and the latter five pence; if they were refuſed their diſmiſſion, when the time of their ſervice was expired, or choſe to continue in the army, they were accounted veterans, and, as ſuch, exempted from all drudgeries, and obliged ſolely to fight, and that for the ſpace of five years only; after which term they were abſolutely to obtain their diſcharge, if they choſe to quite the ſervice, and the rewards due to veterans, which were, according to Auguſtus's appointment, five thouſand drachmas for the prætorian cohorts, and three thouſand for the common legionaries. Some years after, Auguſtus extended the time of ſervice to ſixteen years for the former, and to twenty for the latter [p]. To give new luſtre to the nobility, and attach them more firmly to his intereſt, he required but one year's ſervice of the young patricians to qualify them for military employments, which they could not bear in the times of the republic, till they had ſerved ſeveral years. To this diſtinction he added another in favour of the ſons of ſenators, whom he allowed to have a place in the ſenate, and to wear the laticlavium, which was peculiar to the firſt magiſtrates, ſenators, and chief officers of the army, at the age of ſeventeen, whereas they could not enjoy this honour in former times, till they had attained to the twenty-ſixth year of their age.

He corrects the calendar.

THIS year Auguſtus, in quality of pontifex maximus, corrected a groſs miſtake in the Roman calendar. For the pontifices having for the ſpace of thirty-ſix years, that is, ever ſince the reformation of the calendar by Julius Cæſar, made every third year a leap year inſtead of every fourth, twelve days had been inſerted inſtead of nine, ſo that theſe thirty-ſix years conſiſted of three days more than they ought. Auguſtus, for the rectifying of this miſtake, ordered firſt, that for the twelve enſuing years there ſhould be no leap year; and ſecondly, that, after the expiration of the ſaid twelve years, the leap years ſhould thenceforth be made every fourth year [q]; by which means the three ſuper-added days being thrown out, and the leap years fixed to their true terms, according to Julius Cæſar's inſtitution, the form of this year has ever ſince been regularly obſerved, and is ſtill, under the name of "the "old ſtyle," in uſe among us. When Auguſtus made this reformation, a decree was paſſed by the ſenate and people, enacting, that the month Sextilis, ſhould thenceforth from the emperor's name be called Auguſtus, which name it retains to this day, in all the calendars that have been formed from the Roman. Suetonius tells us, that Auguſtus himſelf, in

in ſettling the year, gave his name to the month Sextilis, preferring it to September, in which he was born, becauſe in the former he had been firſt raiſed to the conſulate, and obtained many ſignal victories [r]. But the very words of the decree of the ſenate are related by Macrobius [s], who alſo mentions the decree of the people, and tells us, that the law was propoſed by the tribune Pacuvius. Towards the end of this year, Agrippa, having ſettled the affairs of the eaſtern provinces, and left Sentius Saturninus and Titus Volumnius governors of Syria and Phœnicia, returned to Rome with Antipater, Herod's eldeſt ſon by Doris his firſt wife. Auguſtus received him with all the marks of a ſincere affection and friendſhip, and was for having him enter the city in triumph; but he declined that honour, aſcribing, according to his cuſtom, all the glory of his conqueſts to the emperor, under whoſe auſpices he had fought: and this was the chief cauſe, why the cuſtom of triumphing, in former times of great advantage to the Romans, was laid aſide, other generals following the example of Agrippa, and not caring for an honour, which he ſeemed to deſpiſe [t]. However, Auguſtus confirmed to him the tribunitial power for five years more, the former term being near expired; and then ſent him at the head of a powerful army into Pannonia (F), where a new war began to break out, with greater power and authority than had ever been granted to any commander. Agrippa left Rome in the beginning of the conſulate of M. Valerius Meſſala Barbatus and P. Sulpicius Quirinus, or, as others call him, Cirinus. The former, who was father to the famous Meſſalina,

(F) Pannonia was bounded on the eaſt by Upper Mœſia, on the weſt by Noricum, on the ſouth by Dalmatia, and on the north by the Danube (17); ſo that Pannonia comprehended Carniola, Croatia, Windiſch-Marck, part of Auſtria, part of Hungary, all Sclavonia and Boſnia, and part of Servia. It was antiently divided into Upper and Lower Pannonia, the former comprehending Carniola, Croatia, Windiſch-Marck, and part of Auſtria; the latter Boſnia, Sclavonia, and the part of Hungary which lies between the Danube, the Drave, and the Arabo, now the Raab; ſo that ſcarce the third part of the preſent kingdom of Hungary was ſalina, dying ſome months after his election, was ſucceed by Caius Valgius, a man of great learning [u], who before end of the year reſigned the faſces to Caius Caninius Rebil The Pannonians were ſo frightened at the very name of grippa, that, upon his approach, they ſent deputies to hi offering to ſubmit upon what terms he ſhould think fit to in poſe upon them. Hereupon Agrippa, having obliged the to deliver up their arms and give him hoſtages for their peac able behaviour, returned to Italy, but was taken with a vi lent illneſs as he marched through Campania, which in a fe days brought him to his grave. Auguſtus, upon the fir news of his danger, left the ſports, which his two grandſon Caius and Lucius, were then exhibiting in honour of Miner va, and haſtened into Campania, to ſee and relieve, if h could by any means, his dying friend. But Agrippa expire a few minutes before his arrival, which he no ſooner un derſtood, than he burſt into tears, bewailing in the illuſtrio deceaſed the loſs of the greateſt general of his age, the wiſe miniſter, and the moſt faithful, conſtant, and diſintereſte friend he had in the world. He cauſed his body to be con veyed to Rome, and took upon himſelf to make his funer oration, a curtain being drawn between him and the bier perhaps becauſe it was not lawful for him as pontifex maxi mus to look upon a dead body. His obſequies were perform ed with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and his re mains depoſited, not in the campus Martius, where the ſenat had allowed him a monument, but in Auguſtus's own mauſo læum near Marcellus, the emperor declaring, that he would not was within the limits of antient Pannonia, that tract which lies beyond the Danube, between that river and the Tibiſcus, not belonging to Pannonia, but to the Iazyges Metanaſtæ. The chief cities of antient Pannonia were Segeſte or Siſcia at the confluence of the Calpe and the Save, Amona, a Roman colony, Nauportum, upon a river of the ſame name, now known by the name of Laubach, Vindoniana, or Vindobona, Scarabantia, Sirmium on the Save, and Taurunum, now Siſeck, and Unterlaubach, Oberlaubach, Vienna, Scharbing, Simach, and Belgrade. Sirmium was the metropolis of all Pannonia. Some geographers place Stridon, the native city of St. Jerom, in Pannonia, others in Dalmatia; but St. Jerom himſelf calls it the boundary of Dalmatia and Pannonia (18).

not be ſeparated even after his death from two perſons, whom he ſo tenderly loved in his life [w]. He died in the fifty-firſt year of his age, and left behind him by his firſt wife Cæcilia Attica, the daughter of the famous Pomponius Atticus, one daughter named Agrippina, who was married to Tiberius; and by his third wife Julia, three ſons, viz. Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa Poſthumus, ſo called becauſe he was born after his father's death; and two daughters, Julia married to Lucius Paulus, and Agrippina married to Germanicus, by whom ſhe had the emperor Claudius and Agrippina the mother of Nero; Agrippa had no children by his ſecond wife Marcella, whom he divorced to marry Julia. He bequeathed his fine gardens and a bath, which was called by his name, to the Roman people, and to Auguſtus among other things the Taurica Cherſoneſus; but how he acquired the dominion and property of that country is what we find no-where recorded, Dion owning himſelf quite in the dark as to this point.

His offſpring.

THUS long did Auguſtus reign, in ſome meaſure with a partner, though not a rival, in the empire. Upon his death the emperor, judging it neceſſary that he ſhould have one to aſſiſt him in the government, ſuperior to all others in power and authority, the better to prevent plots and conſpiracies, made choice of Tiberius, though much againſt his will, as Dion informs us, his grandſons, Lucius and Caius Cæſars, being yet too young to bear any public offices [x]. He obliged Tiberius, before he inveſted him with the power, which Agrippa had enjoyed, to divorce his wife Agrippina, who had already brought him a ſon, and was then big with child, and to marry Julia, whoſe leud and ſcandalous behaviour was well known to Tiberius, and to all the young debauchees of Rome, and had given great uneaſineſs to Agrippa ſome time before his death. However, Tiberius complied without betraying the leaſt reluctance, through fear of diſguſting Auguſtus, who was the only perſon in Rome unacquainted with his daughter's infamous conduct. The uſual ceremonies were no ſooner over, than Auguſtus diſpatched his new ſon-in-law againſt the Pannonians, who, upon the news of Agrippa's death, had attempted to ſhake off the yoke, and recover their antient liberty. But Tiberius, with the aſſiſtance of their neighbours the Scordiſci, who had remained faithful to the Romans, obliged them in a ſhort time to return to their duty, and ſubmit to the will of the conqueror. They delivered up their arms, gave hoſtages, and put the Romans in poſſeſſion of all their towns and ſtrong-holds. Tiberius ſpared their lives, lives, but laid waſte their fields, plundered their cities, and having ſent the beſt part of their youth into other countries, returned to Rome the ſame year, Q. Ælius Tubero and Paulus Fabius Maximus being conſuls. The ſenate, as we may well imagine, decreed him great honours, and among the reſt a triumph. But Auguſtus obliged him, ſore againſt his will, to reject the offers of the conſcript fathers, and content himſelf with the marks of diſtinction, which were granted for life to thoſe who had triumphed, viz. to have a particular place apart from the reſt at the public ſhews, and to appear with the triumphal robes and a crown of laurel. On the other hand, his younger brother Druſus ſignalized himſelf no leſs among the Gauls and Germans. Having been left in Gaul by Auguſtus to ſtop the incurſions of the Germans, he had begun there a ſecond cenſus, taking a minute account of each perſon's eſtate and fortune, the better to regulate the annual taxes and contributions. This the Gauls looked upon as a new attempt upon their liberties, and ſeemed diſpoſed to take up arms, and attempt the recovery of their antient rights and privileges. But Druſus, being appriſed of their deſign, ſummoned all the Gauliſh chiefs to aſſiſt at the ſolemn ceremony of conſecrating a temple, which the Lugdunenſes had built in honour of Julius Cæſar. When they were all aſſembled, Druſus by his addreſs and engaging behaviour won their affections to ſuch a degree, that they not only dropt the deſign they had formed of ſhaking off the Roman yoke, but agreed to erect an altar in honour of Auguſtus, and to pay him even in his life-time divine honours. Sixty different nations concurred in this deſign, each of them contributing their quota, and ſending a ſtatue to adorn the new altar, which was conſecrated with great ſolemnity on the firſt day of Auguſt, and became ſoon very famous all over Gaul, as is plain from the writings of almoſt all the antients [y]. Games were inſtituted in honour of the new deity, much of the ſame nature with the Nemæan and Iſthmian games.

Druſus prevents the Gauls from revolting.

An altar erected in honour of Auguſtus at Lions.

And now Druſus, having nothing to fear from the Gauls, turned his arms againſt the Germans, who, having raiſed the moſt numerous and formidable army that had ever been ſeen in thoſe parts, were advancing towards the Rhine, in order to invade Gaul. But the young Roman not only defeated them as they attempted to croſs that river, but, purſuing the advantage he had gained, entered the

the country of the Uſipetes or Uſipii, now known by the name of Relinchuſen, and from thence advanced againſt the Sicambri in the neighbourhood of the Lyppe and Iſſel; theſe he overthrew in a great battle, laid waſte their country, burnt moſt of their cities, and, following the courſe of the Rhine, approached the German ocean, and reduced the Friſii and the Chauci between the Amiſius and the Albis, now the Ems and the Elbe. In theſe marches his troops ſuffered extremely for want of proviſions, and he himſelf was often in great danger of being drowned, as the Romans, who attended him, were quite unacquainted at that time with the flux and reflux of the ocean. As winter drew near, he led his troops into eaſt Frieſland, and, leaving them there under the command of his lieutenants, returned to Rome, where he was honoured with the prætorſhip, Q. Fabius Maximus and Julius Antonius, the ſon of the triumvir, being then conſuls. Early in the ſpring, Druſus left the capital, and returning to his army quartered in Friſia or Frieſland, marched from thence into the country of the Tencteri, whom he eaſily ſubdued; and afterwards paſſing the Lupias, now the Lyppe, in Weſtphalia, brought into ſubjection the Catti and the Cheruſci, extending his conqueſts to the banks of the Viſurgis, now the Weſer, which he would have paſſed, had he not been obliged to return for want of proviſions, the enemy having laid waſte the neighbouring country to a great diſtance. As he was retiring, the Germans unexpectedly fell upon him in a narrow paſſage, and having ſurrounded the Roman army, cut a great many of them in pieces. But the brave Druſus, animating his men more by his example than his ſpeeches, after a warm conflict, which laſted almoſt the whole day, in the end put the enemy to flight, and made ſuch havock of them, that the ground was ſtrewed for ſome miles with dead bodies. Druſus found in their camp a huge quantity of iron chains, which they had prepared for the Romans; and ſo great was their confidence, that they had agreed before-hand about the diviſion of the booty; the Tencteri were to have the horſe, the Cheruſci and Sicambri the baggage, and the Uſipetes and Catti the captives. Druſus, was ſaluted imperator by his troops on the field of battle, where they erected a trophy as a monument of ſo ſignal a victory; after which Druſus, to ſecure the countries he had conquered, built two forts, the one at the confluence of the Lupias and the Aliſo, the Lyppe and the Alme, the other in the country of the Catti or Chatti on the Rhine, and made that famous canal, long known by the name of Foſſa Druſiana, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. For theſe exploits Druſus on his return to Rome was honoured with the triumphal ornaments, as his brother Tiberius had been the preceding year, but was not allowed by Auguſtus to triumph, or even to retain the title of imperator, with which he had been honoured by the army, that title being now peculiar to the ſovereign. Druſus, as well as Tiberius, had fought under the auſpices of Auguſtus, who therefore, aſcribing to himſelf the glory they had acquired, allowed them ſuch marks of diſtinction as were uſually conferred on triumphant victors, but not the triumph itſelf [z]. This ſame year, Tiberius being ſent againſt the Pannonians, who had again rebelled, reduced them anew, and likewiſe the Dalmatians, who had joined them in their revolt. One Vologeſes, a prieſt of Bacchus, by birth a Thracian, raiſed far greater diſturbances in that part of Thrace, which was ſubject to Raſcuporis, the ſon of Cotys, a faithful ally of the Romans. Vologeſes ſtirring up the people againſt that prince, whom he ſtyled a ſlave of Rome, committed moſt dreadful ravages in all parts of his dominions, overthrew and killed the young prince himſelf in a pitched battle, put to flight Rhemetalces his guardian, and, having over-run the whole country, advanced, without oppoſition, into the Thracian Cherſoneſus, with a deſign to paſs from thence into Macedon. But, in the mean time, Lucius Calpurnius Piſo, one of the beſt generals of his age, being ordered by Auguſtus to quit Pamphylia, which he governed in quality of proconſul, and to ſtop the progreſs of the barbarians under the conduct of Vologeſes, arrived in Thrace, and coming up with the enemy near the confines of Macedon, attacked them, but had the misfortune to be defeated, his men not being accuſtomed to the enemy's manner of fighting. However, as he was a man of great experience in military affairs, he made his retreat in good order, and falling the next day unexpectedly on the barbarians, gave them a total overthrow, purſued them into Thrace, and made himſelf maſter of the fruitful plains lying between mount Pangæus and mount Hæmus. Auguſtus was ſo pleaſed with this conqueſt, that he decreed to Piſo, not indeed a triumph, but all the honours and priviledges which were formerly granted to thoſe who had triumphed, ordaining beſides ſupplications, by way of thankſgiving, to

to the gods, for the ſucceſs which had attended his arms [a]. The joy and ſatisfaction which Auguſtus received from theſe ſucceſſes was greatly allayed by the death of his ſiſter Octavia, who was a true heroine, and a perfect pattern of all the virtues peculiar to her ſex, and therefore greatly lamented by perſons of all ranks and conditions. Auguſtus cauſed her body to be expoſed on a bed of ſtate in a temple lately erected in honour of Julius Cæſar, and pronounced himſelf her funeral oration, but would not admit of the many honours which were decreed her by the ſenate. Her body was carried to the grave by her four ſons-in-law, the huſbands of the two Marcellæ, whom ſhe had by her firſt huſband Marcellus, and of the two Antoniæ, her daughters by Antony the triumvir. She died in the fifty-fourth year of her age [b].

THE following year, Nero Claudius Druſus and T. Quinctius Criſpinus being conſuls, Auguſtus, bent upon the total reduction of Germany, left the capital, attended by his two ſons-in-law, Tiberius Claudius Nero and Nero Claudius Druſus, and, paſſing the Alps, advanced to the banks of the Rhine, whence he ſent Tiberius againſt the Daci, and Druſus to complete the conqueſt of the reſt of Germany. Tiberius eaſily ſubdued the Daci, obliged them to give him hoſtages, and tranſplanted forty-thouſand of them into Gaul. On the other hand, Druſus having paſſed the Rhine, and afterwards, in ſpight of all oppoſition, the Weſer, brought under ſubjection all the nations from the Rhine to the Elbe, or, as the Romans called it, the Albis. Having attempted in vain to paſs this river, he erected ſeveral trophies in that neighbourhood, and began his march back to the Rhine. Dion tells us, that as he was deliberating with himſelf whether he ſhould penetrate ſtill farther into theſe northern countries, or make the Albis the boundary of the Roman empire, a woman of a ſtature more than human appeared to him, and calling him by his name, asked him, "Whither his ambi-" tion would carry him? The fates," ſaid ſhe, "will not " allow you to ſee all parts: retire therefore, and know, " that the period both of your life and actions approaches." With this and ſuch like prodigies, Dion pretends, that the death of Druſus, which happened ſoon after, was foretold. For before he reached the Rhine, he was ſeized with a violent fever, which carried him off in a few days. Auguſtus, upon the firſt notice of his illneſs, ſent an expreſs to Tiberius, acquainting

His death. His ſudden death occaſioned a report, which was credited l many, viz. that Auguſtus and Tiberius had conſpired to tal him off by poiſon, and effected their wicked deſign by mea of their emiſſaries. It is at leaſt certain, that Druſus w in his heart a zealous republican, and had on ſeveral occaſio betrayed a great deſire of ſeeing the antient form of gover ment reſtored. Though he was generally thought to be tl ſon, not of Claudius Nero, but of Auguſtus, yet he looke upon him as an uſurper, and wrote the following letter to h brother Tiberius, while they were both waging war in Ge many at the head of two powerful armies: "The gods hav

" put it into our power to render Rome happy or miſerable " Auguſtus has truſted us with the forces of the empire " can we employ them better than in re-eſtabliſhing the re " public, and reſtoring Rome to her antient liberty an " ſplendor: how glorious a thing it is to be the deliverer an " avenger of one's country!" This letter Tiberius ſent t Auguſtus, and ſoon after happened the death of Druſus in th manner we have related [c]. However, moſt of the antient clear Auguſtus from all ſuſpicion of being any ways acceſſor to the death of the young hero. Livy, who here ends hi hiſtory, ſays, that he died of a fall from his horſe: perhap that fall occaſioned the fever of which he died. Suetoniu thinks the report, 'which was ſpread upon his death to the prejudice of Auguſtus, to have been entirely groundleſs, ſince the emperor loved him with great tenderneſs, and had even named him in his will for his ſucceſſor in conjunction with his two grandſons, Lucius and Caius [d]. Tacitus, whom we cannot ſuſpect of partiality towards Auguſtus, or indeed towards any of his ſucceſſors, tells us, that Auguſtus never extended his cruelty to any of his own family [e]. Dru-hands, that he would have re-eſtabliſhed the republic, and reſigned with joy the ſovereign power, had it ever devolved to him. He died in the thirtieth year of his age, and left behind him three children by his wife Antonia Minor, the younger daughter of Antony and Octavia, viz. Druſus, ſurnamed Germanicus, Livilla, and Claudius, who ſucceeded Caligula, in the empire. His ſoldiers, to teſtify their grief for the loſs of a general, whom they ſo tenderly loved, erected to his memory a ſtately monument on the banks of the Rhine, and aſſembling yearly on the anniverſary of his death, that is, on the eleventh of July, performed round it their military evolutions in honour of the illuſtrious deceaſed [f]. As for his body, it was conveyed to Rome, and attended the whole way by Tiberius, the chief officers and magiſtrates of the Roman colonies and municipia, through which it paſſed, meeting it on the road, and attending it with the utmoſt pomp from one city to the other. Auguſtus himſelf received it at Rome, being returned from Gaul for that purpoſe, and pronounced in the Circus Flaminius a funeral oration in honour of the deceaſed, in which he begged of the gods, with great earneſtneſs and many tears, that they would "grant him a death as glorious as that of the young hero, "and make the grand-children they had given him tread "in his foot-ſteps." Tiberius made another funeral oration in the forum, where the body was expoſed, and from thence carried on the ſhoulders of the Roman knights to the field of Mars, where it was burnt with great ſolemnity; as for the aſhes they were depoſited in the mauſoleum of Auguſtus. The ſenate did not neglect, as we may well imagine, ſo favourable an opportunity of making their court to the emperor. A triumphal arch was erected to his memory, and ſtatues in moſt public places of the city: the ſurname of Germanicus was conferred upon him by a decree of the ſenate, and confirmed to his poſterity; many trophies were erected, and medals ſtruck with the inſcription de Germanis, to perpetuate the memory of his victories over the Germans, &c. Extraordinary honours were decreed to his mother Livia and his widow Antonia, who had inherited both her mother Octavia's beauty and virtue; ſhe continued inconſolable to the hour of her death, nor would ſhe ever be prevailed upon to marry again, though often and earneſtly preſſed to it by Auguſtus [g].

Honours paid him after his death.

New regulations of Auguſtus.

THE emperor was in haſte to return to Gaul, but nevertheleſs before his departure he made ſeveral new regulations. The conſcript fathers, finding their authority to be of no weight, aſſembled very ſeldom, and in ſmall numbers. Auguſtus therefore appointed certain days in each month, on which they ſhould be obliged to meet; and at the ſame time enacted, with the approbation of the ſenators themſelves, that ſuch as abſented themſelves on thoſe days, without a lawful cauſe, ſhould pay a certain ſum by way of mulct; and that their determinations, when they were but few, ſhould not obtain the force of a ſenatuſconſultum, or decree of the ſenate, but only be called a regulation of the ſenate. He granted the prætors the prerogative of voting in the ſenate, and extended the juriſdiction of the queſtors, giving them the ſuperintendency of all the maritime cities of Italy. The election of the new conſuls, C. Marcius Cenſorinus and C. Aſinius Gallus, gave riſe to a new regulation. They were both accuſed of having purchaſed their dignity with money diſtributed among the tribes. Auguſtus did not oblige them to reſign the faſces, but ordered, that for the future all the candidates ſhould depoſit a certain ſum with him, which they ſhould forfeit, if convicted of bribery or any unlawful practices. This law was generally approved of, at leaſt by the patricians; but another, which he publiſhed ſoon after, was as much diſliked. The depoſitions of ſlaves had never been admitted at Rome in the courts of judicature. But Auguſtus, for the ſafety of his own perſon, though under pretence of the public ſafety, publiſhed a law, enacting, that when any perſon was accuſed of treaſonable deſigns, the evidence of ſlaves ſhould be of the ſame weight as that of freedmen. That this law might not ſeem to claſh with the antient cuſtom of rejecting the evidence of a ſlave againſt his maſter, it was ordained by the ſame law, that the ſlaves of the accuſed perſon ſhould be firſt ſold to the emperor or the public. By this low evaſion, unworthy of a man of ſenſe, he pretended not to have intrenched on the antient cuſtom, ſince it was ſtill true, that ſlaves were not allowed to accuſe their maſters, nor admitted as evidence againſt them. This innovation occaſioned great complaints but the crafty emperor ſoon quieted the minds of the people by public ſhews and ſports, by a pretended clemency and condeſcenſion, and above all by affecting popularity, and carefully avoiding all needleſs ceremonies and marks of grandeur.

The antients relate many inſtances of his extraordinary condeſcenſion: they tell us, that a common legionary, having deſired him to plead his cauſe in one of the courts of judicature, the emperor told him, that he was ſo overwhelmed with buſineſs that he could not well do it himſelf; but that he would ſend him an orator better qualified for that purpoſe than himſelf. This obliging anſwer did not ſatisfy the ſoldier, who anſwered bluntly, "Have I thus fought for you by proxy?" The emperor, highly pleaſed with this unexpected anſwer, "Neither will I," ſaid he, "plead for you by proxy." He was as good as his word; for on the day appointed he appeared at the bar, and pleaded his cauſe in perſon. In like manner he undertook the cauſe of another citizen, and gained it; which ſo provoked the accuſer, that he behaved very diſreſpectfully toward the emperor, who was ſo far from reſenting it, that he afterwards pardoned him, when he was accuſed before him as cenſor of ſome faults which deſerved ſevere puniſhment. Though he was very kind and generous to his friends, yet he never allowed them greater privileges than others, nor would he by any means exempt them from the judiciary laws. Of all the criminals he reſcued but one, during the whole time of his long reign, who had been very ſerviceable to him, and that by prevailing with entreaties on the accuſer to drop the proſecution [h].

in

He begins the third term of his decennial power.

THIS year, the ſecond term of Auguſtus's ten years drawing to an end, he pretended to be willing to lay down the power with which he had been truſted, ſaying, that he was no longer able to bear ſo heavy a burden; but he was eaſily perſuaded to carry it ten years longer. This limitation contributed, in the opinion of the antients, more than any thing elſe, to his ſafety, ſince by receiving his power from the ſenate and people, he openly acknowledged the ſovereignty to be lodged in them; ſo that they were not quite deſtitute of all hopes of recovering it one day. The term of his power being prolonged, he reſolved to quit the capital, having his mind ſtill bent on the entire reduction of the many nations that inhabited Germany. He was not indeed inclined to wage war with thoſe barbarous nations in perſon, but choſe to be as near the generals, whom he employed, as he could with ſafety. The perſon he thought the moſt proper for the purſuing and completing of the conqueſts, happily began by Druſus, was his brother Tiberius; whom therefore he ſent into Gaul, after having honoured him with an ovation, on account of the advantages he had gained in Germany the foregoing year. Auguſtus guſtus ſoon after the departure of Tiberus left Rome, but inſtead of paſſing the Alps, as he had done the year before, he took his rout towards Aquileia, and paſſed the whole ſummer in the neighbourhood of that city, having with him his grandſon Caius Cæſar, then twelve years old. In the mean time, Tiberius, having paſſed the Rhine at the head of a powerful army, over-ran all the countries between that river and the Elbe, and ſtruck ſuch dread into the inhabitants of thoſe northern provinces, that ſeveral of them ſent deputies to Auguſtus at Aquileia to ſue for peace, which they could not obtain upon any terms, the emperor declaring, that he would not grant a peace to any particular nation, till they had all agreed to demand it. But the Catti, or as ſome authors write, the Sicambri, could not by any means be prevailed upon to ſubmit; ſo that the project of peace did not take place this year. We ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory what ſtreams of blood it coſt the Romans to reduce them. As winter approached, Auguſtus returned to Rome with his grandſon Caius; but Tiberius remained with his troops in Germany, in order to renew the war, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would allow him to take the field [i]. Auguſtus upon his return made a ſecond cenſus, in which were numbered, according to the Ancyran marbles, 4233000 Roman citizens [k]. While he was thus employed, his great friend Mecænas died, which was a ſenſible affliction to him, though he had not of late honoured him with the ſame intimacy as formerly. His criminal converſation with Terentilla could not but diſpleaſe Mecænas, who thought he did not deſerve that treatment at the hands of one, whom he had ſerved with the utmoſt fidelity. On the other hand, Auguſtus in that particular could not bear any controll; and hence that coldneſs and indifference which appeared between theſe two great friends, ſome years before death parted them. Mecænas was a man of great penetration, and underſtood the art of governing well better than any man of his age, as appears from the many wiſe directions and maxims, which he ſuggeſted to Auguſtus in the beginning of his reign. But though poſſeſſed of talents equal to the higheſt employments of the ſtate, yet he was ſuch an enemy to all trouble, ſo fond of his eaſe, ſo addicted to his pleaſures, that he abhorred all buſineſs, and ſeemed in a manner to have attained to that indolence, in which the Epicureans placed happineſs. As he

he was remarkably good-natured, and slighted preferments himself, as capable of disturbing his quiet and interrupting his pleasures, he employed all his credit and interest with the emperor in behalf of others, and for the most part with good success. Of the ascendant which he had gained over Augustus, and the liberty he took in correcting his faults and curbing his cruel temper, Dion Cassius gives us the following remarkable instance. As Augustus was one day judging some criminals, Mecænas perceiving him to be in a bad humour, and inclined to give himself over to revenge without check or compassion, attempted to approach his tribunal; but not being able to break through the croud, he wrote the following note; "Come down from the tri-"bunal, butcher," and threw it into his lap. Augustus no sooner read it, than he rose up and quitted the tribunal, without sentencing any of the criminals to death [l]. As for the scandalous lewdness and debaucheries of Augustus, which gave occasion to many severe lampoons and cast a great blemish upon his reputation, Mecænas was not at all a proper person to set up for a censor in that particular. The generous protection, which he afforded to men of learning, especially to Virgil and Horace, will render his name immortal, and transfer his fame to the latest posterity. He was not only on encourager of learning, but published according to Priscian [m], Isidorus [n], and Seneca [o], several works, which entitled him to a place among the best writers of that polite age. The works ascribed to him by the above-mentioned writers are, a "history of animals;" a "journal of the life of Augustus;" a "treatise on short-"hand writing;" of which some will have him, others Tyro, Cicero's freedman, to have been the inventor, another "treatise on the nature and different kinds of preci-"ous stones;" and two tragedies, the one intitled "Oc-"tavia," and the other "Prometheus:" but none of these works have reached our times. Horace the prince of the Latin lyric poets, did not long survive his great patron and benefactor; for Mecænas died about the beginning of September, and Horace on the twenty-seventh of the following November. The fame of so great a poet will be as lasting as his works, which all ages must admire, as the utmost effort of a human genius. The same year died one Caius Cæcilius Isidorus, famous for the immense wealth wealth of which he was poſſeſſed; for he left to his heir 4116 ſlaves, 3600 yoke of oxen, 200057 head of other cattle, and above three millions of our money in ſpecie.

Tiberius triumphs.

ON the calends of January of the enſuing year, Tiberius who was now come to Rome, entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip with Cn. Calpurnius Piſo, and was the ſame day honoured with a triumph, which was a new ſight to the Roman people. The bucklers and arms, which he had taken from the Germans, were carried before him, and the captive generals and officers of diſtinction marched in chains by the chariot of the triumphant victor. Before he left Rome, he repaired the temple of Concord, placing his own name and that of his deceaſed brother Druſus on the frontiſpiece of that ſtately building. After this he dedicated a temple, which the ſenate had erected, to his mother Livia, ſhe herſelf being preſent at the ceremony. On this occaſion he gave a moſt ſumptuous entertainment to all the ſenators, while Livia feaſted the women of diſtinction by themſelves. In the beginning of the ſpring he left the capital and returned to Germany, but performed nothing which hiſtorians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. This year a dreadful fire happened in Rome, which reduced to aſhes many ſtately buildings, and was thought to have been occaſioned by the debtors, with a deſign to make their eſcape, in that confuſion, out of the houſes of their creditors. To prevent the like misfortunes and diſorders for the future, Auguſtus created new officers called "curatores vicorum," who were permitted on certain days to wear, within the verge of their juriſdiction, the robe peculiar to magiſtrates, and to have two lictors to attend them. To them were now aſſigned the ſix hundred ſlaves, who had been formerly appointed to attend the ædiles for the extinguiſhing of fires. At the ſame time, by Auguſtus's particular order, the city was divided into fourteen regions or wards, and theſe into inferior precincts, the government of which wards and precincts was committed to the above-mentioned "curatores vicorum," and alſo to the tribunes of the people and the prætors [n].

Curatores vicorum appointed by Auguſtus.

THE following year, Caius Antiſtius Vetus and D. Lælius Balbus being raiſed to the conſulate, Lucius Cæſar boldly demanded of Auguſtus in the public theatre, that his elder brother Caius Cæſar might be named conſul for the enſuing year. two brothers, anſwered, that he hoped he ſhould never lie under the neceſſity of raiſing any to the conſulate under twenty years of age. The bold youth not being ſatisfied with this anſwer, but continuing to ſolicit him with great earneſtneſs in behalf of his brother, the emperor raiſing his voice, told him with a grave air, "That an office of ſuch "importance ought to be diſcharged only by a man who "could bridle his own paſſions, and reſiſt the deſires of the "giddy and head-ſtrong multitude." However, his tenderneſs for the two brothers, whom he looked upon as his own children, having adopted them into the Julian family and the name of Cæſars, in ſome degree got the better of his reaſon; for he granted to Caius the prieſthood, a place in the ſenate, and the privilege of ſitting among the ſenators at all public ſhews and ſports; but at the ſame time, to curb their ambitious temper, he conferred on Tiberius the tribunitial power for five years, which gave the two young Cæſars no ſmall jealouſy. But Tiberius had ſcarce received this new addition of power, when, to the great ſurpriſe of Auguſtus and the whole city, he deſired leave to quit the city and retire to Rhodes. Various reaſons are alledged by the antients for this ſudden reſolution; Tiberius indeed pretended a deſire of improving himſelf in the ſtudy of philoſophy and eloquence, there being then at Rhodes famous profeſſors of both theſe ſciences. But Suetonius is of opinion, that the infamy of his wife Julia, which was now the talk of the whole city, and reflected great diſgrace on his perſon and family, prompted him to retire, that he might not be an eye-witneſs of her ſcandalous debaucheries [o]. Velleius Paterculus, a great flatterer of Tiberius, tells us, that he withdrew out of reſpect to the two young Cæſars, that he might not ſtand in their way to the higheſt preferments [p], following therein the example of Agrippa, who had retired to Mitylene, when Marcellus firſt entered upon public offices. Dion thinks he was piqued at the favour which Auguſtus ſhewed to his grandſons, eſpecially at his declaring them "princes of the Roman youths (G)," which entirely defeated his ambitious projects, and Tiberius demands leave to retire.

[o] Suet. in Tiber. c. 10. [p] Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 99.

(G) The firſt Roman emperors gave this title to their children, or to thoſe whom they had appointed their heirs and ſucceſſors in the empire. The youth, who was honoured with this title, had all the children of the Roman noblemen under his command, and appeared and left him no hopes of ever enjoying the ſovereign power, the ſole object of all his wiſhes [q]. But, whatever his motive was, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances and tears of his mother Livia, he was very preſſing with Auguſtus for his permiſſion to retire; which the emperor not only refuſed, but took great pains, in concert with Livia, to divert him from ſuch an unſeaſonable reſolution. He even complained to the ſenate of his being abandoned by one, from whoſe abilities he had promiſed himſelf great relief in the government of the republic. But Tiberius, deaf to all entreaties and remonſtrances, and obſtinately bent upon departing, continued importuning Auguſtus for his permiſſion, which he conſtantly refuſed, being unwilling to loſe the only perſon, in whom, after the death of Agrippa and Mecænas, he repoſed any confidence, his grand-children not being yet of an age fit to be truſted. At length Tiberius, finding all other means ineffectual, retired into his own apartment, and, there ſhutting himſelf up, abſtained four whole days from all kind of nouriſhment. Hereupon the emperor, ſeing he could not get the better of his obſtinate and inflexible temper, complied at length with his requeſt, and granted him the ſo much wiſhed-for permiſſion to retire; which he no ſooner obtained, than he ſet out for Oſtia, without ſpeaking a word on the way to thoſe who attended him to the place where he embarqued, or taking any notice of them, a ſmall number of his particular friends excepted, at his departure [r]. However, Dion tells us, that before he took his leave of Livia and Auguſtus, apeared at their head, when they performed their military exerciſes in the field of Mars, or exhibited the tournament called Troy. In the times of the republic the children of the moſt diſtinguiſhed families were called "principes juventutis," and "principes equitum(19)," becauſe they were reckoned "equites" or knights, till they attained the age, which the laws required in the candidates for offices. The principes juventutis was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by a triumphal robe, as Tacitus informs us (20). On the reverſe of a medal of the emperor Severus, which has reached our times, are repreſented three youths on horſeback, and one of them in the attitude of commanding, with this legend, Princ. juvent. which ſhews, that the princeps or principes juventutis had ſome command over the young nobility.

guſtus, he opened his will and read it in their preſence[s]. From Oſtia he ſailed along the coaſt of Campania, and ſtaid ſome time in that province, being informed there, that Auguſtus was indiſpoſed. But, in the mean while, a report being ſpread abroad, that he waited for the news of Auguſtus's death, he weighed anchor as ſoon as it came to his ears, tho' the ſea ran then very high, and ſailed for Rhodes, where he led at firſt a very private and retired life, frequenting the ſchools and academies without any attendants, converſing familiarly with the Greeks, and avoiding all appearance of grandeur both in his houſe and equipage. However, he once exerted the tribunitial power with which he was inveſted; for a warm diſpute ariſing one day in the ſchool of Theodorus the Gadaræan, of whom he was a conſtant hearer, he interpoſed, and endeavoured to put an end to the conteſt. But one of the diſputants, judging him partial, not only refuſed to acquieſce with his deciſion, but abuſed him in a moſt outrageous manner; which ſo provoked him, that he returned home, and aſſuming the habit of a public magiſtrate, appeared in the ſchool, as tribune of the people, with his apparitors, and ſummoning by a crier the philoſopher, who had reviled him, ordered him to be carried to priſon[t]. Velleius, a ſcandalous flatterer of the Cæſars, eſpecially of Tiberius, tells us, that he appeared greater in his retirement, than if he had been at the helm of affairs; that all the proconſuls and governors, who were ſent into the eaſt, went to wait upon him, lowering their faſces to him; that he gained the affection and eſteem of all the Greeks, &c.[u]. But all other writers tell us, that not being able to keep his vices concealed from the inhabitants of the iſland, they daily more deſpiſed and hated him, inſomuch, that the Nemauſians threw down his ſtatues and defaced his pictures; nay, ſome time after, as Caius Cæſar paſſed that way, mention being made of Tiberius at a private entertainment, one of the company addreſſing Caius, "Give only the word," ſaid he, "and you ſhall "have the head of the exile in an inſtant." The name of exile well ſuited Tiberius; for though he voluntarily retired to Rhodes, yet he was long kept there againſt his will. Growing weary of his retirement, he publicly declared, that he had left Rome purely to avoid giving umbrage to Caius and Lucius, and wrote to the emperor, after they had attained to man's eſtate and were promoted to the higheſt dignities, begging ging leave to return home and viſit his friends, ſince his preſence could no longer be diſagreeable to his grand-children. But the favour was abſolutely denied him, and a meſſage ſent, bidding him lay aſide all care and thoughts of his friends, ſince he had been ſo impatient to abandon them. Thus he was obliged, ſore againſt his will, to continue at Rhodes, and it was not till after ſeven years that Auguſtus was prevailed upon to conſent to his return [w]. This year Auguſtus himſelf was conſul, and had for his collegue Cornelius Sylla. He had reſumed the faſces, after having declined the conſular dignity for ſeventeen years together, with no other view, as is ſuppoſed, but to render the ceremony of giving the "toga "virilis" to his grandſon Caius more ſolemn. For he preſented him in perſon to the ſenate, gave him the "toga viri-"lis" himſelf, with the uſual ceremonies, and deſigned him conſul; which dignity, as he was then but fifteen, he was to hold, after five years, to be reckoned from the day he was preſented to the ſenate. Thus the Ancyran marble [x]. This year Auguſtus reduced the number of thoſe who were ſupplied with corn at the public expence, to two hundred thouſand, corn having for ſome years been given indifferently to all who deſired it. Nothing remarkable happened in Rome or Italy the two following years, in the firſt of which C. Calviſius Sabinus and L. Paſſienus Rufus were conſuls, and in the ſecond L. Cornelius Lentulus and M. Valerius Meſſalinus. The enſuing year, Auguſtus again reſerved the conſular dignity for himſelf, and took for his collegue M. Plautius Sylvanus or Silanus. As Lucius, the younger of his grandſons was now of an age to receive the "toga virilis," Auguſtus conferred on him the ſame honours as he had done three years before on his brother Caius. Several medals, coined on this occaſion, have reached our times, on which are the heads of the two brothers with bucklers and ſpears, and this legend on the reverſe; "Caius and Lucius Cæſars, "the ſons of Auguſtus, deſigned conſuls, princes of the "youth." Thus were the two ſons highly favoured and honoured by Auguſtus; but their mother Julia met with a very different treatment. Her lewdneſs, infamy, and ſcandalous debaucheries, hardly to be matched in hiſtory, had for ſome years been the talk of the whole town. But Auguſtus had the misfortune of moſt princes, who are, generally ſpeaking, the leaſt acquainted with their neareſt concerns. He believed indeed, that ſhe did not lead a very ſtrict life, but

but never imagined her capable of committing thoſe monſtrous and almoſt incredible exceſſes, of which he now found her guilty. Upon a full diſcovery of her actions and conduct, he was ſo ſenſibly affected with grief and confuſion, that he ſhut himſelf up in his palace, and there continued ſeveral days, bewailing his misfortune, without ſeeing any even of his moſt intimate friends. Not able to conceal the tranſports of his grief and anger from the public, he communicated to the ſenate by a letter the exceſſes of the infamous proſtitute, and the diſgrace of his family, an indiſcretion which he afterwards ſaid ſhe would never have been guilty of, had Agrippa or Mecænas been living. Overcome with ſhame and rage, he firſt reſolved to put his daughter to death; but afterwards altered his mind, and contented himſelf with baniſhing her to Pandataria, a deſert iſland on the coaſt of Campania, now known by the the name of Santa Maria. Her mother Scribonia, whom Auguſtus had divorced the ſame day ſhe was born, that is, thirty-eight years before, attended her to the place of her baniſhment, and never afterwards abandoned her. The emperor not only puniſhed the infamous Julia with baniſhment, but at the ſame time forbad her the uſe of wine, and all ſorts of delicacy whatſoever either in diet or cloaths. By an expreſs order from the emperor, no perſon of what condition ſoever was to come near her without his leave. Not long after, her eldeſt daughter by Agrippa, named alſo Julia and married to L. Paulus, being convicted of the ſame crimes as her mother, was confined to the iſland of Tremera, now Tremiti, in the Adriatic ſea [y]. The puniſhment of Julia was followed by that of all thoſe who were any ways acceſſory to her debaucheries. Sempronius Gracchus, T. Quinctius Criſpinus, C. Claudius, and L. Scipio, all perſons of great diſtinction, were condemned to perpetual baniſhment. But Julius Antonius (H), the ſon of the triumvir, and many others, were by the emperor's orders put to death. Some writers tell us, that Auguſtus laid hold of this opportunity

Julia baniſhed;

(H) Julius Antonius was a man of learning, and wrote a poem entitled Diomedeæ, conſiſting of ten books. To him Horace addreſſed the ſecond ode of his fourth book. He left a ſon very young, whom Auguſtus baniſhed to Marſeilles under colour of having him inſtructed by the great maſters, who flouriſhed then in that city. tunity to get rid of many conſiderable Romans, who gave him uneaſineſs and jealouſy. Be that as it will, it is certain that an incredible number of illuſtrious Romans were ſacrificed, under pretence of having received favours of Julia. Her chief confident, by name Phæbe, laid violent hands on herſelf before ſentence was pronounced againſt her. Auguſtus, when news was brought him of her death, could not help admiring her courage, and wiſhing that Phæbe, and not Julia, had been his daughter, intimating thereby, that he would have been well pleaſed, if Julia had had courage enough to end her days in the ſame manner. Tiberius heard, as we may imagine, the news of the diſgrace and baniſhment of Julia with great joy; but as no man knew better the art of diſſembling, he became her advocate; and, pretending great tenderneſs and compaſſion for her, he wrote frequent letters to Auguſtus, entreating him to forgive her, and reinſtate her in his favour. But the emperor continued inflexible to the hour of his death, nay, he carried, in a manner, his reſentment beyond his grave; for by his laſt will he ordained, that ſhe ſhould not be depoſited after her death among the Cæſars, whom ſhe had ſo diſgraced during her life. As for Tiberius, Auguſtus obliged him to divorce her, notwithſtanding the tenderneſs and affection which, by the deepeſt diſſimulation, he ſtill pretended to retain for her [z].

Many illuſtrious Romans baniſhed, and put to death, on her account.

AND now Auguſtus, to divert his mind from fixing on his domeſtic misfortunes, exhibited the moſt magnificent and expenſive ſhews that had ever been ſeen in Rome, chariot-races in the circus, repreſentations on the ſtage, combats of gladiators, &c. were now become common. Auguſtus therefore, the better to divert both himſelf and the people, revived thoſe ſports which had been for a conſiderable time laid aſide, on account of the extraordinary charges that attended them. He cauſed a canal to be dug eighteen hundred paces in length and two hundred in breadth, conveying into it the Flaminian water, and building ſcaffolds quite round it capable of holding numberleſs multitudes of ſpectators. And indeed the concourſe of people was ſo great, that the emperor was obliged to place guards in all the quarters of the city, leſt the thieves ſhould lay hold of that opportunity to plunder the empty and abandoned houſes. Auguſtus had frequently entertained the people with fights of lions, tygers, elephants, rhinoceros, &c. but now the new canal appeared all on a ſudden covered with crocodiles, of which thirty-ſix were killed led by Egyptians brought from the banks of the Nile for that purpose. The multitude were highly delighted with this fight, which was quite new; but the sea fight which ensued afforded them still greater diversion. For at the opposite ends of the lake, or canal, two fleets appeared, the galleys of one being built after the Greek, and those of the other after the Persian, manner. Both fleets engaged; and as they fought in good earnest, most of the combatants being persons sentenced to death, the battle proved very bloody [a].

Disturbances in Armenia.

In the midst of these public sports and diversions, news was brought to Augustus, that the Armenians, entering into an alliance with the Parthians, had driven out Artabazes, whom he had appointed king of that country, and raised to the throne Tigranes in his room. Hereupon the emperor, dreading the consequences of an alliance between those two powers, was greatly at a loss what measures he should take to put a stop to the war, which threatened the eastern provinces. He could not manage it in person, being now stricken in years; Tiberius was retired to Rhodes, and the emperor determined not to recall or employ him; on the other hand, he was afraid to trust any with the command of the army, except those of his own family. In this perplexity, he at length resolved to send into the east his grandson Caius, who was then entered into the nineteenth year of his age (I); but before his departure, to procure him the greater esteem, he honoured him with the title of proconsul, and married him to Lollia Paulina, either the daughter or niece of M. Lollius, an officer of great experience, who was his governor,

This commiſſio of Caius Cæſar is variouſly mentioned by the antients; Taci tus writes, that he had Armenia for his province [e]; Velleiu Paterculus, that he was ſent into Syria [f]; Suetonius, that h was appointed governor of the eaſt [g]; Oroſius, that he wa ſent by Auguſtus to ſettle the provinces of Egypt and Syria [h] and Pliny quotes a book wrote by king Juba, in which men tion is made of Caius's expedition into Arabia [i]; but adds that the young prince had only ſome thoughts of invadin Arabia [k]. In the mean time, Phrahates, king of Parthia, be ing informed of the warlike preparations that were carryin on in different parts of the empire, and not doubting, bu they were deſigned againſt him, wrote a ſubmiſſive letter to Auguſtus; but as he deferred, under various pretences, with drawing his troops out of Armenia, which Auguſtus in his answer required him to do without delay, Caius, taking his leave of Augustus, set out from Rome, and hastened into Armenia [l]. In his passage he touched at Chios [m], or, as Suetonius will have it, at Samos [n]; which Tiberius no sooner understood, than he went to wait upon him, behaving himself on that occasion in a very submissive manner, and shewing the utmost respect not only to the young prince, but to all those of his attendance. Caius received him with great coldness, his governor M. Lollius, who hated Tiberius, having filled the mind of his pupil with prejudices against him [o]. Thus Suetonius: but Velleius, flattering Tiberius, according to his custom, tells us, that Caius received him with the greatest marks of esteem, and treated him as his superior [p]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Tiberius's tribuneship, expiring about this time, he earnestly solicited the emperor for leave to return home, and received from him the answer, which we have related above; so that he was obliged much against his will to continue at Rhodes, which he no longer looked upon as the place of his retreat, but as the place of his banishment. However, his mother Livia, who had a great influence over the emperor, to cover the ignominy of her son, got him, with much ado, declared Augustus's lieutenant in those parts. But he, finding himself obnoxious to the sovereign, and apprehending himself in danger of his life, not only lived as a private citizen, but retiring into the midst of the island, concealed himself there to avoid the compliments of the Roman officers and magistrates, who were sent into the east [q]. Nay, he wrote to Augustus, desiring him to send some person, in whom he could confide, with a charge to watch him, and transmit to Rome a faithful account of all his words and actions [r].

Ovid was quite out in what he foretels of Caius, but ſets dow the juſt year of his age; for Auguſtus was nineteen years ol when he firſt put himſelf at the head of his army, as is manife from the Ancyran marble, containing a ſummary of the chief a tions of his life; and Caius was entered into his nineteenth ye when he began to prepare for his expedition againſt the Parthian ſo that his father and he went commanders at the ſame age.

Tiberius waits upon him.

Tiberius in disgrace.

But to return to Caius Cæsar; from Samos or Chios he hastened into Syria, where all the Roman forces in the east, and those of the allies of Rome, were assembled and ready to march. Suetonius tells us, that he passed through Judæa, but scorned to worship at Jerusalem, and adds, that his conduct therein was approved of, and much commended by, Augustus [s]. Upon his arrival in Syria, he put himself at the head of the army, and began his march towards the frontiers of Parthia. Upon his approach Phrahates, diſtruſting his own ſubjects, who bore him an irreconcileable hatred, ſent deputies to him to treat of a peace. The young general received the embaſſadors with great politeneſs, and it was agreed, that Caius and Phrahates would have an interview in an iſland formed by the Euphrates. Thither they both repaired on the day appointed, each of them being attended with the like number of guards, while their two armies, drawn up in battalia, lined the oppoſite banks of the river. In the conference Caius only inſiſted upon the Parthian's renouncing all pretenſions to Armenia, which he readily conſented to; ſo that a treaty was ſoon concluded, and tranquillity reſtored, when leaſt expected, to the eaſtern provinces. Matters being thus ſettled, the two chiefs feaſted each other; Caius entertained Phrahates on the Roman ſide of the river, and Phrahates, Caius on the Parthian ſide. Thus Velleius Paterculus, who was preſent, as a ſpectator, at theſe entertainments, he being then a military tribune in Caius's army [t]. The ſame writer tells us, that the Parthian king acquainted Caius in a private conference, that he was betrayed by his governor M. Lollius, who had taken large bribes of him, and had heaped up immenſe ſums by laying, without his knowledge, heavy contributions on all the provinces of the eaſt. The ſame writer adds, that the king bid him beware of the treacherous deſigns and counſels of Lollius, at which the young prince being alarmed, forbid him his preſence. Lollius thus diſgraced, died a few days after; but whether of a natural or violent death, our author will not take upon him to determine [u]. Pliny and Solinus ſay, that he put an end to his life with poiſon; but none of the antients impute his death to Caius, though he deſerved to be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, if the charge, brought againſt him by the Parthian king, was true. Upon his death Publius Quirinius was either appointed by Auguſtus, or choſen by the young prince himſelf, for his governor. He was a good commander, and had been rewarded by Auguſtus for his eminent ſervices firſt with the conſulſhip, and afterwards with a triumph, or rather an ovation, for driving the Homonades, a people of Cilicia, out of their ſtrong-holds [w]. He proved a friend to Tiberius, and reconciled Caius to him, as we ſhall ſee anon. The treaty of peace between the the Romans and the Parthians was ſcarce concluded, when Artabazes, whom Auguſtus had placed on the throne of Armenia, died; and then Tigranes, who had been ſet up by the Parthians, ſent rich preſents to Auguſtus, accompanied with a ſubmiſſive letter, wherein, without ſtyling himſelf king, he begged the kingdom of him. The emperor, glad to put an end to the diſturbances of the eaſt, accepted his preſents, and ordered him to attend Caius in Syria; which he did accordingly, and received at his hands the crown of Armenia [x]. [x] Dio, in excerpt. ab Ful. Urſin. Sext. Ruf. in breviario.

(K) From the time of Romulus to the reign of Auguſtus the temple of Janus had been but twice ſhut, viz. during Numa's peaceable reign, and after the firſt Punic war (22). Auguſtus ſhut it up three times, viz. after he had vanquiſhed Antony and Cleopatra, four years after on his return from the war, which he had waged with the Cantabrians in Spain, and ſome years before the birth of our Saviour. Horace, who died ſeven years before, ſpeaks in his laſt ode of Auguſtus's victory over the Sicambri, and obſerves, that the temple of Janus was then ſhut. Oroſius ſays, that after Auguſtus had ſhut it the third time, it continued ſo for the ſpace of twelve years (23). On the other hand, F. Noris, is of opinion, that it was opened on occaſion of Caius Cæſar's expedition againſt the Parthians, whence he concludes, firſt againſt Oroſius, that it did not continue ſhut for twelve years, and ſecondly againſt moſt hiſtorians and chronologers, that our Saviour was born before the troubles in the eaſt broke out; for he was born, as all the fathers affirm, while the world was in peace; and, on the other hand, Tacitus aſſures us, that after Auguſtus had laid open the gates of Janus the third time, they were never ſhut again to the reign of Veſpaſian (24). But as no war was declared, and no hoſtilities committed either by the Romans or Parthians, we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that the temple of Janus was opened on occaſion of this expedition.

"prince of peace, the Lord of heaven," and "Saviour of "the world," joined himſelf, after an ineffable manner, to human nature, and appeared on earth, being born of a virgin in the city of Bethlehem, whither Joſeph and Mary had repaired, to be there regiſtered purſuant to the decree of Auguſtus, as citizens of that place (L). But to dwell on the particular circumſtances of this or the other myſteries of the Chriſtian religion, would be deviating from the deſign of the preſent work, and intrenching on the province of the eccleſiaſtic writers. To their hiſtories therefore we refer

(L) Auguſtus having iſſued out a decree for taking ſuch a deſcription or ſurvey of the whole Roman empire as ſhould contain an account of all perſons, poſſeſſions, and eſtates therein, and the taxes iſſuable from them. it was this year executed in Judæa in the manner St. Luke deſcribes it. When it came to Bethlehem, Joſeph and Mary were called from Nazareth in Galilee, the place of their habitation, to that city, the city of David, to which, as being of the houſe and lineage of David, they originally belonged, that there, as citizens of that place, their circumſtances, and eſtate, or trade, might be deſcribed and regiſtered among thoſe who were of the ſame houſe and family. Whenever a cenſus was made at Rome, the cenſors regiſtered all the Roman citizens, their wives and children, their age, qualities, trades, offices and eſtates both real and perſonal. "Cenſoris officium erat," ſays Florus (25) "omnia patri- "monia, dignitatis, ætatis, artium, officiorum, diſcrimina in tabulas referre;" and Cicero (26) "Cenſores populi ævitates, "ſoboles, familias, pecuniaſque cenſento." Auguſtus was the firſt who extended this cenſus to the provinces, where thoſe who were charged with it, purſued, without all doubt, the ſame method as the cenſors did at Rome. 'Tis true, none of the antient hiſtorians mention this general cenſus extending to all the provinces, and kingdoms ſubject to, or depending upon, Rome but Tacitus (27), Suetonius (28), and Dion Caſſius (29), tells us that Auguſtus left behind him a book containing an exact account or ſurvey of all the provinces of the Roman empire, and their revenues, taxes, and tributes, which, it is manifeſt, he could not have done without a previous and general cenſus. Beſides St. Juſtin (30) and Tertullian (31) frequently refer the Gentiles to the regiſters which were made on occaſion of this cenſus and were ſtill extent in their time.

THE following year, Caſſius Cornelius Lentulus and L. Calpurnius Piſo were raiſed to the conſulate, and ſucceeded the year after in that dignity by Caius Cæſar, tho' then abſent in Syria (M), and L. Æmilius Paulus. During their adminiſtration nothing remarkable happened in Italy, or in the countries ſubject to, or depending upon, Rome, except the death of king Herod, which was no leſs miſerable than his life had been deteſtable, and the diviſion of his kingdom made by Auguſtus, who gave one half of it to Archelaus, and divided the other half between his two brothers, Antipas and Philip, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of the Jews [y]. During the conſulſhip of Caius, Auguſtus ended his great climacterical year, that is, the ſixty-third of his age, on which occaſion he wrote the following letter to his grandſon in Syria: "Hail "my dear Caius, my chief delight: your preſence is the "conſtant object of my moſt ardent wiſhes: I cannot, "my dear child, bear to be from you: when ſhall I have "the pleaſure of ſeeing my beloved Caius again, and tenderly embracing him? Your preſence would have doubled "the mirth of this day, my ſixty-fourth birth-day, which "I hope you have ſolemnly kept in good health: for I "have ended, you ſee, my ſixty-third year, the common "climacteric of old men. May the gods render the remaining part of my life uſeful and ſerviceable to the republic: may they continue to ſhower their bleſſings upon "you, till they ſhall think fit to remove me, and place "you in my room [z].

(M) That Caius was abſent from Rome when he was raiſed to the conſulate, and that he diſcharged the office of conſul in the eaſt, is unanimouſly atteſted by all the antients. It is therefore ſurpriſing Joſephus ſhould tell us, that Auguſtus referred the diſpute, which upon the death of Herod aroſe between Archelaus and Antipas about the ſucceſſion, to a council, at which Caius Cæſar, the ſon of Agrippa and Julia, preſided, he being at that time in Rome.

ter, to deliver himſelf from the importunities of Livia, co ſenting to it at the earneſt entreaties of his new goverr Quirinius; but upon that condition that he ſhould bear office in the commonwealth [a]. We are told, that wh the ſhip, which brought him the news of his being lowed to return to Rome, firſt appeared, he was wa ing by the ſea-ſide with one Thraſyllus, a famous aſt loger, who aſſured him, though the ſhip was at a gr diſtance, that it brought him joyful tidings. The ſudden pearing of the ſhip ſaved Thraſyllus's life; for Tiberius had that very time determined with himſelf to throw h headlong into the ſea, as one who was privy to all ſecrets, and whom he now began to miſtruſt, after he h for ſome years entertained him as his boſom friend. put off the execution of his deſign till the arrival of ſhip, when finding the prediction of the aſtrologer fulfill he tenderly embraced him, and ever after had him in gr eſteem, though he pretended himſelf to a great knowled in judicial aſtrology [b]. Upon his return to Rome withdrew to Mecænas's gardens and there led a retir life, doing good offices to ſome of his friends, but r meddling with public affairs [c]. But he was ſoon deliver from the object of his envy and jealouſy; for Luci Cæſar, who was but a youth of tender abilities, died t year at Marſeilles on his journey to Spain, whither he h been ſent by his grandfather, who had no other view there than to bring him into favour with the ſoldiery, and accuſto him to a military life and a foreign climate [d]. Some write ſuſpect Livia, as if ſhe had found means to take him off poiſon; for his death was ſo ſudden, that it ſurpriſed his a tendants, and the art of poiſoning was at that time broug to great perfection, and became very common in Rom His body was brought by ſea from Marſeilles to one of t ports of Italy, and from thence carried to the capital on t ſhoulders of the military tribunes, and the decurions of t colonies and municipal towns. At Rome it lay in ſtate f ſeveral days in the forum, being watched and guarded by t Roman knights, who had preſented the deceaſed youth wi a ſilver ſpear when he took the toga virilis. ſolemnity, probably in the campus Martius. The aſhes, we ſuppoſe, were depoſited in Auguſtus's own mauſoleum, the burying-place of the Cæſars. The emperor was ſenſibly affected, as we may imagine, with the loſs of a youth whom he ſo tenderly loved, and ſaw thus ſnatched away in the ſpring of his life; and Tiberius, by affecting an extraordinary concern for the death of his ſon-in-law, wrought ſuch a change in the mind of Auguſtus, Livia, no doubt, contributing to it with her uſual art and dexterity, that he would have adopted him, if Velleius is to be credited, had he not abſolutely declined that honour, through fear of giving umbrage to Caius [c] (N).

Tiberius returns into favour with Auguſtus.

In the following conſulate of L. Ælius Lama and M. Servilius, the famous temple of the mother of the gods at Rome was reduced to aſhes; but the flames, which did not reſpect the ſtatue of the goddeſs, ſpared that of the veſtal Claudia, who, in former times being accuſed of inceſt, is ſaid to have given a glaring and miraculous proof of her innocence, by drawing aſhore with her girdle the ſhip which brought the mother of the gods to Rome, and had run a-ground off Oſtia [f]. This pretended miracle is much talked of by the Roman writers, and elegantly deſcribed by Ovid and Silius Italicus [g]. In the conſulate of Sextus Ælius Catus and C. (N) Alphenus Varus was of a mean deſcent, but raiſed himſelf by his own merit to the firſt office in the ſtate. Horace mentions him in the third ſatyr of his firſt book:

" Ut Alphenus vafer omni,
" Abjecto inſtrumento artis, clauſaque taberna,

Upon which paſſage Acron comments thus: Alphenus was a native of Cremona, by profeſſion a ſhoe-maker; but abandoning his trade, applyed himſelf to the ſtudy of the Roman law, under the famous civilian Servius Sulpicius. The great progreſs he made in the Roman juriſprudence gained him ſuch reputation, that he was judged worthy of the greateſt honours of the ſtate. When he died, he was buried at the public expence, a diſtinction granted to few and thoſe perſons of the higheſt merit.

Saturninus was governor or preſident of the province, and that Volumnius was only his lieutenant, or rather Auguſtus's procurator under him; but Joſephus ſpeaks of him as in joint commiſſion with Saturninus (32).

(P) Florus relates this event in the following manner: Domitius, on whom the king of Parthia had conferred the government of Artaxata, pretending to revolt, came out to meet Caius and delivered into his hands a writing, which, he ſaid, contained an account of all the king's treaſures; but while he wa peruſing it with great attention, the traitor, drawing a poniar concealed under his garment, ſtabbed him (33). Sextus Ruſu follows Florus, and, by an unpardonable miſtake, adds, that "th "Parthians theleſs weakened the body, and ſunk the ſpirits of Caius to ſuch a degree, that after he had driven the Parthians out of Armenia, and placed Ariobarzanes, by birth a Mede, on the throne, he gave himſelf up to an idle and indolent life, leaving the whole management of affairs to his officers and lieutenants. Hereupon Auguſtus, who had a great deſire to ſee his favourite grandſon, recalled him to Rome; but he, taken with the delights of that ſoft climate, and having many flatterers about him, who made it their conſtant ſtudy to feed his vicious inclinations with new pleaſures, begged leave to continue in Syria, declaring, that he had rather live in the moſt remote and inhoſpitable corner of the earth, than return to Rome. This unexpected propoſal ſtung Auguſtus to the heart, who, in his anſwer to him, inſiſted on his returning to Italy, aſſuring him, that he ſhould there be allowed to do what he pleaſed. Caius therefore, with the utmoſt reluctance, left Syria, and ſailing for Lycia, arrived at Limyra, a city of that country, where he died ſoon after in the twenty-fourth year of his age [k] (Q). Thus was Auguſtus, His death.

(Q) Tacitus ſays he died of his wound as he was returning from Armenia (35), and Sextus Rufus, that he returned into Syria, and died there; but Suetonius, Dion Caſſius, and Velleius Paterculus, who ſerved under Caius, aſſure us, that he died at Limyra in Lycia on his return to Rome. Auguſtus was extremely grieved at his death, and complained of Aſinius Pollio, one of his chief favourites, for inviting his friends to an entertainment while his grief was yet freſh, Pollio anſwered, " I ſupped after the ſame " manner when I loſt my ſon Arterius, and can any one require " more grief of a friend than of a father (36)?" The body of Caius was conveyed to Rome, and buried there with great pomp. Bellonius tells us, that he ſaw the tomb and epitaph of C. Cæſar at Hama or Emeſa in Syria (37); but that his bones were buried at Rome is manifeſt from the following epitaph, which is ſtill to be ſeen in the church of the apoſtles behind the temple of Minerva: Oſſa C. in the ſpace of eighteen months, deprived of both his grandſons, whom he had adopted, and brought up to ſucceed him in the ſovereign power. His death, as well as that of Lucius, is by ſome imputed to the ſecret arts of Livia, who left no ſtone unturned to advance her ſon Tiberius to the empire. The grief of Auguſtus for the death of one, whom he loved with all the tenderneſs of a fond father, was great beyond expreſſion. Livia and Tiberius endeavoured to comfort him; and on this occaſion it was that the artful Livia who had gained an abſolute ſway over her huſband, prevailed upon him to adopt her ſon Tiberius. However, he adopted at the ſame time Agrippa Poſthumus, the third ſon of Agrippa and Julia, whom he had hitherto quite neglected, as being a youth of no parts, and of an untractable temper. He likewiſe obliged Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the ſon of his brother Druſus, tho' he had a ſon of his own; ſo that the joy of Tiberius in ſeeing himſelf at length adopted into the family and name of the Cæſars, was not a little allayed by this mortifying and unexpected preference. His nephew Germanicus was now become the emperor's grandſon, while his own ſon Druſus was denied that honour [l]. Theſe three different adoptions happened on the ſame day, viz. on the fifth of the calends of July; and it is remarkable, that Auguſtus, in adopting Tiberius, ſolemnly ſwore before the people, that "he adopted him for "the good of the commonwealth [m]." At the ſame time he conferred on him the tribunitial power, for five years according to ſome writers [n], but according to others for ten [o]. Thus, by the addreſs of Livia, were all honours heaped upon her ſon, now ſole candidate, we may ſay for the ſucceſſion.

Tiberius adopted by Auguſtus, and Germanicus by Tiberius.

The conſpiracy of Cinna.

WHILE Auguſtus was thus ſtrengthening himſelf by the adoption of Tiberius and Agrippa, a dangerous conſpiracy was diſcovered, at the head of which was Cornelius Cinna, grandſon to Pompey by his daughter Pompeia. As ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank were engaged in the plot, Auguſtus was greatly at a loſs what meaſures to take in ſo nice an affair. If he uſed rigor, he was afraid their friends, and relations, who were very powerful, might raiſe dangerous diſturbances to revenge their death; if he pardoned them, he apprehended this might encourage others to the like attempts.

tempts. In this perplexity he passed several nights without being able to take the least rest, or come to any resolution. At length Livia, by her refined artifices, drew from him the true cause of his disquiet and uneasiness. Dion Cassius relates a conference between her and the emperor, which seems rather to have been framed by him than real [o]. However that be, it is certain, that she, by many ingenious and politic arguments, convinced him, that it was safer in so critical a conjuncture to use clemency than rigor. Pursuant to her advice, Augustus sent for Cinna, and taking him into his closet, charged him with the conspiracy, named to him all his accomplices, and shewed himself thoroughly informed of the place, time, and other circumstances, which the conspirators had agreed on in their last meeting. Cinna was thunderstruck, as we may well imagine, when he saw his treason thus discovered, and himself in the power of the person whom he sought to destroy, without any possible means of escaping the punishment due to his crime. His surprise was still greater when Augustus, instead of treating him as a traitor, only upbraided him in a gentle manner with ingratitude, putting him in mind of the many favours he had bestowed upon him, and adding, that he was resolved to get the better of his obstinacy; and therefore not only freely forgave him, but, for his sake, all those he had seduced into the same wicked designs; "and to shew you," said he, "that I am sincerely reconciled to you, I now name you "consul for the ensuing year." This generous behaviour made such a deep impression upon the mind of Cinna, that he continued, from that time to the hour of his death, inviolably attached to the interest of Augustus and his family [p]. It was about this time, and perhaps on this occasion, that the people offered him the title of Dominus, that is, Lord or Master, which he not only refused, but published an edict, forbidding any one to address him under that name; a name peculiar to masters with respect to their slaves, and therefore no less injurious to him than the Roman people [q]. Towards the end of this year, the people earnestly entreated him to recal his daughter Julia; but he answered, "That fire and "water should sooner meet than they two;" and when the people were very pressing with him, he could not refrain his anger, but, in a violent passion, wished "they might have "such

In the beginning of the enſuing year, when Cn. Cornelius Cinna, who had conſpired againſt Auguſtus, and L. Valerius Meſſala were conſuls, Tiberius was ſent into Germany, to complete the conqueſt of that country, and keep in awe the ſeveral nations which had been ſome years before ſubdued by him and his brother Druſus. C. Sentius Saturninus, the laſt year's conſul, an officer of known valour and great experience, was appointed by Auguſtus to command under him, as one who was well acquainted with the country, he having been formerly Auguſtus's lieutenant in thoſe parts. Velleius Paterculus the hiſtorian attended Tiberius in this expedition, and ſerved under him in quality of præfectus equitum, or commander of horſe; which poſt had been held by his father, and at his death was conferred upon him. He tells us, that Tiberius, entering Germany, over-ran the country of the Caninefates, now the province of Utrecht; that from thence he advanced againſt the Attuati and Bructeri, that is, the people of the territory of Munſter, whom be eaſily reduced; that the Cheruſci, the inhabitants of the preſent duchies of Brunſwic and Lunenbourg, ſubmitted at his approach; that he made himſelf maſter of all the countries lying on the Viſurgis and the Lupias, now the Weſer and the Lyppe; and that putting his troops into winter-quarters on the banks of the Lupias, he returned to Rome towards the end of December, where he was received with loud acclamations by all ranks of men [s].

The exploits of Tiberius in Germany.

In this and the following year, Rome was afflicted with a dreadful famine, inſomuch, that all foreigners, gladiators, athletæ or wreſtlers, and ſlaves, except phyſicians and ſchoolmaſters, were driven out of the city, and ordered to keep at eighty miles diſtance from the capital, Auguſtus himſelf ſending away the greater part of his own ſlaves and attendants. On this occaſion he doubled his uſual largeſſes, ordering a certain quantity of corn to be weekly diſtributed among the indigent citizens, and proviſions to be brought from Sicily, Sardinia, and the neighbouring countries at the public expence, and ſold at a low rate. This ſtill more gained him the

the affections of the people, who were therefore for decreeing him new honours, which he abſolutely refuſed; but the glory which accrued to him from a ſolemn embaſſy ſent this year to Rome in the name of the Parthian nation, is greatly celebrated by all the writers of thoſe times; for the Parthians, quite tired with the troubles that were daily raiſed in their country by pretenders to the crown, had at length recourſe to Auguſtus, begging him to give them a king. The emperor, highly pleaſed with this embaſſy, named Vonones, one of the ſons of Phrahates, who had been ſent to Rome, as we have obſerved above, commending him both to the Parthian embaſſadors, and the Roman governors in the eaſt. The Parthian nobility received him with great joy, and placed him on the throne; which Auguſtus was no leſs proud of, than if he had ſubdued that warlike nation [t]. The next year, M. Æmilius Lepidus and L. Aruntius, being conſuls, Tiberius, returning into Germany, purſued his conqueſts there with ſurpriſing rapidity, if Velleius his hiſtorian, or rather panegyriſt, is to be credited. He firſt ſubdued the Chauci (R), the moſt flouriſhing and numerous nation of Germany, and then the Langobardi or Lombardi, who ſurpaſſed in fierceneſs all the inhabitants of that vaſt continent. He over-ran and brought under ſubjection all the countries between the Rhine and the Albis or the Elbe, while his fleet ſtruck terror into the warlike and barbarous nations bordering on the ocean. In ſhort, the Roman enſigns and eagles were revered and adored by numberleſs nations, who, till the arrival of the invincible Tiberius, had never heard of the Roman name. Such is the account which Velleius gives us of the victories and exploits of Tiberius [u]. But another writer, unbiaſſed by any affection or prejudice, tells us, that Tiberius indeed over-ran all the countries between the Albis and the Viſurgis; but performed humus, having incurred the diſpleaſure of his grandfathe Auguſtus, was by him baniſhed to the iſland of Planaſia, now Pianoſa, in the Mediterranean ſea. Some writers tell us, that Auguſtus conceived an irreconcileable hatred to him on account of his irregular and ſcandalous life, which he thought a diſgrace to his family; whence, when mention was made of him, or the two Julias, he uſed to ſay with a profound ſigh, "O, had I lived without a wife, or died "without children!" nor did he commonly call them by any other name than his three impoſthumes. But Tacitus aſcribes the diſgrace of young Agrippa not to any vices of his own, but to the arts and ambitious views of Livia, who was glad to remove the only perſon who ſtood in her ſon's way to the abſolute power. As Auguſtus was now very old, ſays that writer, Livia had obtained ſuch an aſcendant over him, that, to pleaſe her, he baniſhed into the iſland of Planaſia his only ſurviving grandſon Agrippa Poſthumus, one indeed deſtitute of extraordinary talents, in his temper untractable, and ſtupidly conceited of his own ſtrength, but guilty of no miſdemeanour or tranſgreſſion [x].

THE next year, when A. Licinius Nerva and Q. Cæcilius Metellus were conſuls, Rome had three mighty wars to maintain, viz. one in Germany, another in Pannonia, and the third in Dalmatia. In Germany, Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni (S), a prince of extraordinary ſtrength, which which was a great merit among the Germans, of uncommon addreſs, and great perſonal courage and experience in military affairs, having raiſed a formidable army, conſiſting of ſeventy thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, threatened the countries lately ſubdued by Tiberius, nay, Italy, itſelf, with an invaſion. Againſt him was ſent Tiberius, who arriving in Illyricum, divided the numerous forces he had under his command into two bodies. The one he put under the conduct of C. Sentius Saturninus, who, purſuant to Tiberius's order, taking his rout through the territories of the Catti, and opening himſelf a paſſage through the Hercynian foreſt (T), brought his legions to the confines of the Marcomanni, called by the antients Boiohemi. As for Tiberius himſelf, he ſeemed to be in no great haſte to enter the liſts with the king of the Marcomanni; for, under various pretences, he put off his march, and continued in Illyricum, as if he were afraid of the enemy, or deſigned to ſpin out the war. Auguſtus was old, and Tiberius

From thence they paſſed with the Harudes and Seduſii into Boiohemia, now Bohemia, and having driven out the Boii, ſettled there. Velleius Paterculus gives us an account of their migration under the conduct of Maroboduus (39). They made themſelves afterwards maſters likewiſe of Moravia. They were in proceſs of time driven out of Bohemia by the Sclavonians, whoſe deſcendents hold that kingdom to this day.

(T) Julius Cæſar ſpeaks in his commentaries of this foreſt thus: "It is nine days journey over; we cannot otherwiſe de-" ſcribe it, becauſe the Germans have no fixed meaſures of di-" ſtances. It begins on the confines of the Helvetii, Nemetes, " and Rauraci, (that is, of Switzerland, Baſil, and Spires) and ex-" tends along the Danube to the borders of the Daci and Arnates " (that is, to Tranſilvania); then turning from the river to the " left, it runs through an infinite number of countries. None " could ever yet come to the end of it, or know its utmoſt " extent, tho' ſome have gone ſixty days journey in it (40)." Mela gives this foreſt an immenſe length; for, according to him, it extended from the Rhine to the country of the antient Sarmatæ, which is at preſent a conſiderable part of Muſcovy. In proceſs of time the Hercynian foreſt was grubbed up, and inhabited by different nations. The black foreſt and the foreſt of Bohemia, were formerly parts of the Hercynian.

The tw chiefs had agreed to act jointly or ſeparately, as occaſio ſhould require, and not to lay down their arms till they ha delivered their reſpective countries, and all Germany, fro the Roman bondage. This general and unexpected inſu rection filled Rome with terror and confuſion. heard that Germanicus was appointed to command againſt the revolted Pannonians and Dalmatians, than he turned his arms againſt them, hoping he ſhould be able to reduce them before the arrival of Germanicus, whom he now looked upon as his rival, and therefore would have willingly deprived of the glory, which might accrue to him from that expedition. With this view, quitting Illyricum, he encamped in the country which parted Pannonia from the kingdom of Maroboduus, to prevent the conjunction of the Pannonians and the Marcomanni. But in the mean time Bato the Pannonian laid ſiege to Sirmium (U); and tho' defeated by Cæcina Severus, governor of Mœſia, had again recruited his army, and obliged Cæcina to quit the field. On the other hand, Bato the Dalmatian laid ſiege to Salona (W), and tho' wounded in the attack of the place, yet marched at the head of his troops to meet Meſſalinus, whom Tiberius, had detached againſt him, gave him battle, and put him to the rout. The Roman general being

The tranſactions of this campaign.

(U) Sirmium, now Sirmiſch, was in former times the metropolis of Pannonia inferior, and the place which the emperors choſe for their reſidence, when the affairs of the empire called them into thoſe parts. Many laws were publiſhed at Sirmium by the emperors, which Jacobus Gothofredus has with great pains collected. The emperor Probus was killed in this city, and Theodoſius, if we believe Aurelius Victor, firſt ſaluted emperor by the Romans who were here in garriſon. The emperor Decius was born in a village called Budalia, or Bubalia, in the neighbourhood of this city. Pliny places it near the confluence of the Save and a river which he calls the Bacuntius (41).

(W) Salona, one of the chief cities of Illyricum, ſtood on the Adriatic ſea, at a ſmall diſtance from the preſent city of Spalatro. It became afterwards a Roman colony, as appears from ſeveral antient medals and inſcriptions, in which it is called ſometimes Colonia Julia, ſometimes Colonia Martia, and ſometimes Colonia Claudia Auguſta. It is mentioned by Lucan in the following verſe:

" Qua maris Adriaci longas ferit unda Salonas (42).

obliged in his retreat to pass through certain defiles, was there unexpectedly shut up, and surrounded on all sides by the enemy. However, he found means to make his escape without losing a man, which Paterculus magnifies as an exploit worthy of a triumph; but Dion Cassius assures us, that Tiberius ascribed it wholly to Bato's generosity, and that he afterwards acknowledged it as a favour, and rewarded him for it. However that be, the two Batos soon after united their forces, and encamping on mount Almus in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, kept that place blocked up, and laid the country to a great distance under contribution. Tiberius detached Rhymetalces, a petty king of Thrace, against them, who gained indeed some advantages over them, but was not able, tho' joined by A. Cæcina governor of Mœsia, at the head of a considerable body of Roman troops, to dislodge them [z]. At length Tiberius, who had hitherto acted only by his lieutenants, marched against them in person; but the enemy, not thinking it adviseable to engage him, upon the news of his approach, abandoned their post, and dividing their numerous forces into several small bodies, retired by different ways into Macedon, committing dreadful ravages in all the countries through which they passed. As winter drew near, Tiberius did not pursue them; but Rhymetalces and his brother Rascipolis, at the head of the Thracian auxiliaries, followed them close, and coming up with them on the confines of Macedon, gave them a great overthrow, and cut many thousands of them in pieces [a]. These are the exploits of Tiberius in this campaign, which Velleius magnifies and extols more with the partiality of a panegyrist, than the sincerity of an historian [b]. As for Germanicus, he did not, it seems, enter Dalmatia this year.

Upon the approach of winter, Tiberius, according to his custom, returned to Rome, where M. Furius Camillus and Sextus Nonius Quinctilianus were soon after raised to the consulate. During their administration, embassadors came to Rome, both from the Jews and Samaritans, to accuse Archelaus, to whom Augustus had given the half of his father Herod's kingdom under the name of ethnarchy, of male-administration, tyranny and oppression. Hereupon Archelaus being called to Rome to answer the charge brought brought againſt him, and not being able to juſtify himſelf before the emperor, he was by him depoſed, his goods were confiſcated, and he himſelf baniſhed to Vienna in Gaul, where he ended his days. Archelaus, being baniſhed, Auguſtus appointed Publius Sulpitius Quirinius, who, according to the Greek way of writing that name [c], is by St. Luke called Cyrenius, to be preſident of Syria, and ſent him into the eaſt to ſeize on the countries over which Archelaus had reigned, that is, Judea, Idumea, and Samaria, and reduce them to a Roman province. Coponius, a Roman knight, was ſent with him to take upon him the government of them, with the title of procurator of Judea. Theſe two arriving at Jeruſalem, ſeized all Archelaus's effects and treaſures, purſuant to the ſentence paſſed againſt him by Auguſtus, and having in great part aboliſhed the Jewiſh polity, introduced the Roman in its ſtead. Coponius took on him, in the name of Auguſtus, the adminiſtration, but in ſubordination to the preſident of Syria, Judea being made a part of that province. Thus was the power of life and death taken out of the hands of the Jews, and placed wholly in the Roman procurator and his ſubordinate officers. All taxes were thenceforth paid immediately to the Roman emperor, and the Jews might now ſay with truth what they were heard to ſay ſome years after, We have no king but Cæſar [d]. But what diſturbances attended this change of government, we have related at length elſewhere [e]. While Cyrenius or Quirinius was in Judea, he depoſed the high-prieſt Joazar, the ſon of Boethus, and appointed Annas, the ſon of Seth, to ſucceed him in that office, which he held ſeveral years [f].

EARLY in the ſpring, Tiberius and Germanicus took the field, the former againſt the Pannonians, and the latter againſt the Dalmatians. We read of no great advantages gained by Tiberius; but Germanicus obliged the Dalmatians to quit the field, and ſhelter themſelves behind the walls of their cities and caſtles, ſome of which he beſieged and took. We are told, that while he lay before one of their ſtrong-holds, and was ready to abandon the enterprize,

In this extremity, Bato, the chief of the Dalmatians, began to think o ſubmitting; and accordingly ſent deputies to treat with Tiberius, who received both them and Bato himſelf, when he appeared before him the next day, in a very obligin manner. Whereupon Auguſtus, having aſſembled the whole body of knights, ordered the married and unmarried perſons among them to be placed ſeparately; then, obſerving the former to be much inferior to the latter in number, he firſt addreſſed thoſe who had complied with his law, telling them, that they alone had ſerved the ends both of nature and civil ſociety; that mankind was ordained male and female to prevent mortality; that as the ſpecies could not ſubſiſt without children, ſo no commonwealth could be ſupplied either with men for the wars, or for civil employments. He added, that they alone deſerved the name of men and of fathers, and as ſuch he praiſed them, promiſing to prefer them to ſuch offices as they might tranſmit to their offſpring. To the others he made a quite different ſpeech, telling them, that he knew not by what name to call them; not by that of men, for they had performed nothing that was manly; not by that of citizens, ſince the city might periſh for them; nor by that of Romans, for they ſeemed determined to extirpate the Roman race and name; but by what name ſoever he called them, their crime, he ſaid, equalled all other crimes put together: for they were guilty of murder in not ſuffering thoſe to be born, who ſhould proceed from them; of impiety, in aboliſhing the names and honours of their fathers and anceſtors; of ſacrilege, in deſtroying their ſpecies and human nature, which owed its original to the gods, and was conſecrated to them: that, by leading a ſingle life, they overturned, as far as in them lay, the temples and altars of the gods, diſſolved the government by diſobeying its laws, betrayed their country by making it barren and waſte, and utterly demoliſhed the city by depriving it of inhabitants. He added, that he was well appriſed their leading a ſingle life did not proceed from any ſentiments of virtue, but from a looſeneſs and wantonneſs, which ought not to be encouraged nor ſuffered in any civil government. Having ended his ſpeech, he doubled the rewards and privileges of ſuch as had children, and laid heavy fines on all unmarried perſons, allowing them, however, the term of a year, in which ſpace, if they complied with the law, they were to be freed from the penalty. This law obliged all men to marry at a certain age, eſtabliſhed great exemptions and privileges to ſuch as had children, and laid heavy fines on all, who, after a certain age, continued ſingle. It was called the Papian-Popæan law, becauſe enacted by the conſuls M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Popæus Secundus, to whom the conſuls of this year C. Sulpicius Camerinus and C. Poppæus Sabinus had reſigned the faſces, after having held them only six months. It was also called the Julian law, as ha ing been published by Augustus's order, who was of the Ju lian family. For the further encouragement of marriag Augustus abrogated the Voconian law (X), forbidding ma ried women to receive any legacies above a certain sum; ye that he might not seem to discourage any thing that had th appearance of virtue, he bestowed upon such women as ha vowed perpetual virginity the same rewards and privileges upon mothers [h].

New troubles in Dalmatia and Pannonia.

During these transactions at Rome, the war broke ou anew in Dalmatia and Pannonia, Bato, who had submitted th year before, being the ringleader of the revolt, whether upo some new provocation, or merely from the fickleness of hi temper

(X) Nothing was more common, before the publication of th law, than for men to give excessive legacies to women, and leave them by will the whole estate of a wealthy family. One the laws of the twelve tables impowered all citizens to appoi whomsoever they pleased to be their heirs, without regard to fa or relations. This law was attended with inconveniencies; de bauchery was encreased by it, and it became more easy to debauc a sex, who are not always deaf to their interest. Besides, it wa no uncommon thing to see women, who were by legacies becom richer than their husbands, insulting them, and behaving them selves in their families with great haughtiness. To remedy th evil, Q. Voconius, tribune of the people, drew up a new law which he at last got passed in the comitia. The chief heads o this law were, 1. Every citizen was forbidden to make any wo man whatsoever universal legatee, even an only daughter not ex cepted. 2. A daughter's fortune, after the death of her father was to be proportioned to his estate, or to be "pro rata" of what h had left, according to the estimation of prudent men; and gene rally speaking, the daughter was allowed only one fourth of he father's estate. 3. It was enacted, that all the legacies of the te tator should not exceed one half of his estate (43). This testamen tary law had been preceded by another, which C. Furius, tribun of the people, had got passed, and which was thence called th Furian law. It forbad, according to Ulpian, Pomponius, and Ju tinian, any Roman citizen to leave by legacy above the value o one thousand asses to any one person, and at the same time con demned the legatee to pay four times the sum which was give him above what the law stipulated; so that the Voconian la ought to be looked upon as a supplement to this, which was probab temper, we know not. Germanicus, who had acquired in the laſt year's war a perfect knowledge of the country, and of the manner of fighting in uſe among the rebels, was ordered to lead the ſame legions againſt them, which he had commanded the year before. He opened the campaign with the ſiege of Rhætinum, a ſtrong city in Dalmatia, where he was in imminent danger of periſhing, with the greateſt part of his army; for the inhabitants, having, after a faint reſiſtance, abandoned the town, and retired into the citadel, Germanicus, at the head of his legions, entered the place, with a deſign to attack the citadel; but while the Romans were buſy in planting their machines and ladders, they ſaw themſelves all on a ſudden ſurrounded by flames, the inhabitants having filled their houſes with all ſorts of combuſtible materials before they abandoned them, and appointed ſome reſolute perſons to ſet fire to them when the Romans were entered. The legionaries, to avoid the fire, crowded round the citadel, which ſtood at ſome diſtance from the houſes: but, by avoiding one kind of death, they met with another; for the beſieged plyed them with ſuch ſhowers of darts, arrows, and ſtones from the citadel, that the ground was in an inſtant covered with heaps of dead bodies. In this extremity the Romans attempted to ſcale the fortreſs; but met with ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance as quite diſheartened them. Nothing therefore now remained but to attempt a retreat through the flames, and this they effected, but with great loſs, many of them being cruſhed by the ruins of the houſes, ſuffocated by the ſmoke, or deſtroyed by the fire, which with great violence flamed out of the houſes on either ſide the ſtreet thro' which they paſſed. In the night the beſieged abandoned the fortreſs, which began to take fire, and concealed themſelves in the neighbouring ly grown out of uſe in the time of Q. Voconius. Cato the cenſor made a ſpeech in favour of the Voconian law, which he inſerted in his book "de originibus," and which was in being in Livy's time. There are ſome fragments of it ſtill extant in Aulus Gellius. Cicero fixes the paſſing of the Voconian law to the year of Rome 584, when Quintus Marcius Philippus and Cneius Servilius Cæpio were conſuls (44). From that time it continued in force to the reign of Auguſtus, who revoked it in favour of Livia, to whom he was reſolved, as Dion Caſſius informs us, to deviſe by will great part of his eſtate; but that hiſtorian ſpeaks ſo ambiguouſly of the Voconian law, that he has given the civilians occaſion to put different interpretations upon it.

neighbouring woods. Hereupon Germanicus, having waite till both the city and citadel were reduced to aſhes, led h legions againſt Sertium, another city of great importance in th ſame country, which he inveſted, and reduced in a ſho time, tho' Tiberius had in vain attempted the reduction of i the year before. Being encouraged with this ſucceſs, and n enemy appearing in the field, he divided his army into ſevera bodies, and laying ſiege to different places at the ſame time, made himſelf maſter of moſt of their ſtrong-holds. But, in the mean time, Auguſtus, impatient to ſee this war ended, ordered Tiberius to march likewiſe into Dalmatia, and haſten the final reduction of that country. Tiberius, without loſing time in beſieging and taking cities, went in ſearch of Bato, who had under his command a conſiderable body of Pannonians and Dalmatians; and having met him in the neighbourhood of Anderium or Andetrium (Y), a ſtrong caſtle, ſituated on a ſteep and inacceſſible rock, offered him battle; but Bato declining an engagement, retired into the caſtle, and poſted his troops on the tops of the neighbouring mountains, where he thought the enemy would ſcarce venture to attack them. Tiberius boldly advanced through the narrow paſſages among the mountains to the foot of the rock on which Andetrium ſtood, with a deſign to beſiege it; but was greatly alarmed, when he ſaw himſelf all on a ſudden ſurrounded by the enemy, who, deſcending from the mountains, had ſeized on the defiles, and by that means cut off his retreat. He expected to find at Andetrium the Caudine forks; and truly he muſt have inevitably periſhed with his whole army, had the Dalmatians

Pliny likewiſe calls it Andecrium (46); but Strabo, Andetrium. It ſtood on a ſteep rock, and was ſurrounded on all ſides by deep vallies and torrents, which rendered it almoſt inacceſſible (47). It is now known by the name of Cliſſa (48).

Dalmatians ſhewed as much bravery and reſolution as the Samnites did on the like occaſion; but while Tiberius gave all up for loſt, as not being able either to retire or advance, the cowardly Dalmatians, ſeized with a panic, abandoned their poſts, and, retreating in diſorder to the tops of their mountains, left all the avenues open to the Roman general, who thereupon advancing without oppoſition to the foot of the rock on which the caſtle ſtood, ſummoned it to ſurrender. Bato, finding he could not depend upon his men, hearkened to the offers made him, and leaving the caſtle in the night, delivered himſelf up to Tiberius, who received him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, and allowed him to retire to what part of the world he pleaſed, after he had ſolemnly promiſed never to bear arms againſt the Romans. But the garriſon of Andetrium ſtill held out, and the place was not taken but after repeated aſſaults, in which great numbers of the Romans loſt their lives. At length they capitulated, and ſurrendered upon honourable terms, which Tiberius religiouſly obſerved [i]. At the ſame time, Germanicus made himſelf maſter of Arduba, a town no-ways inferior in ſtrength to Andetrium, and defended by as numerous a garriſon; but the reduction of that important place was more owing to the diſagreement which reigned among the inhabitants, than to the valour of the Romans; for the greater part of the citizens being for ſurrendering and ſubmitting to the yoke, the women more fond of their antient laws and liberties than the men, joining ſome Roman deſerters, and falling upon their huſbands, made a great ſlaughter of them. But the men prevailing at length ſubmitted, and the unhappy women, diſdaining to outlive the loſs of their liberty, either threw themſelves headlong from the walls, or ſetting fire to their houſes, conſumed themſelves and their children in the flames. After this the two Roman generals uniting their forces, over-ran all Dalmatia and Pannonia, reſtoring every-where peace and tranquillity, and obliging the inhabitants to deliver up their arms, and return to their former employments. The war being thus ended, to the great ſatisfaction of Auguſtus, Tiberius and Germanicus returned to Rome, where they were decreed triumphal honours, and two triumphal arches, which by a decree of the ſenate were to be erected in Pannonia, and adorned with magnificent trophies. The title of imperator was conferred on Auguſtus, and Germanicus was allowed to ſtand for the conſulate before he attained the age required in other candidates, and to vote in the ſenate before the ſenators of con lar dignity. As for Tiberius, it was decreed, that his ſ Druſus, though he had no ſhare in the war, ſhould be a mitted into the ſenate, and deliver his opinion, after he h executed the office of quæſtor, before thoſe who had be prætors. The lieutenants both of Tiberius and Germanic were rewarded with prætorian honours, that is, were allow all the honours and privileges which thoſe enjoyed who h been prætors [k].

BUT the joy, which the total reduction of Pannonia ar Dalmatia occaſioned in Rome, was allayed and changed int the deepeſt melancholy by the diſmal news of the entire defe of Quintilius Varus by the Germans under the conduc of Arminius, which was brought to Rome five days after th arrival of Germanicus and Tiberius. Quintilius Varus wa born, as Velleius Paterculus expreſſes it, rather of an illuſtri ous than a noble family, had governed Syria, and been re moved from thence into Germany to keep thoſe countries i awe, which had been lately ſubdued by the Romans. Whe he firſt entered Syria, he found that province rich, ſays Vel leius, and was himſelf poor; but when he came away, h was rich, and the province poor. In Germany he purſue the ſame methods of filling his coffers as in Syria, loading th people with heavy taxes, and ſelling without diſtinction to th natives thoſe employments which his predeceſſors uſed freely to beſtow on ſuch as were nobly born, or had ſignalized their attachment to the Romans. The Germans before the arrival of Varus had begun to bear the yoke with leſs reluctance; they had quitted their foreſts, built ſome cities, where they lived in a ſociable manner, under the protection of the Roman laws, and, forgetting their native ſavageneſs, had for ſome time applied themſelves to the peaceable arts of huſbandry. But the extortions and rapines of the new governor revived in that warlike nation their antient love of liberty, eſtranged their minds from Rome, and inſpired them with an eager deſire of ſhaking off a yoke which they could no longer bear. Among the Germans was a young nobleman of extraordinary parts, of uncommon penetration, and great valour named Arminius. He was the ſon of Sigiſmer, one of th moſt powerful lords of the Catti, had ſerved with great repu tation in the Roman armies, and been honoured by Auguſtu with the privileges of a Roman citizen and the title of knigh But the love he had for his country getting the better of h gratitude, he reſolved to improve the general diſcontent whic reigne reigned in the nation, to the advantage of his countrymen, and deliver them from the bondage of a foreign yoke. With this view he engaged underhand, by means of his friends and emiſſaries, in a conſpiracy againſt the Romans, the chief lords and leading men of all the nations between the Rhine and the Elb; and then, to draw Varus from the neighbourhood of the former river, where he might with great eaſe and quickneſs receive ſuccours from Gaul, he ſuggeſted to him the neceſſity of ſhewing himſelf to the inhabitants of the more diſtant provinces, of adminiſtering juſtice among them, and accuſtoming them by his example to live after the Roman manner, which, he ſaid, would more effectually render them obedient to Rome, than the Roman ſword. As Varus was a man of a peaceable temper, indolent, and a great lover of his eaſe, he readily came into the propoſal of the crafty Arminius, and, quitting the neighbourhood of the Rhine, marched into the country of the Cheruſci. There he made it his whole buſineſs to civilize the barbarians, by introducing among them the Roman laws and manners. He was continually employed in hearing cauſes, and deciding civil controverſies; inſomuch, that his tent looked more like the tribunal of a prætor, than the prætorium of a general. And indeed this was a more ſuitable employment to the genius of Varus, than military expeditions; not that he wanted courage, but becauſe he loved his eaſe, and thought he could better tame the barbarians by acting the law-giver than the general. In the mean time, the conſpiracy being ripe for execution, and the Germans ready to riſe upon the firſt notice, Arminius, under pretence of clearing the high-ways of robbers, and keeping ſome places in awe, as if they deſigned to revolt, perſuaded Varus to ſend out ſeveral detachments; by which means his army being weakened, ſome diſtant nations in Germany roſe up in arms, by Arminius's directions, while thoſe, through which he was to paſs in marching againſt them, pretended to be in a ſtate of profound tranquillity, and ready to join the Romans againſt their rebellious countrymen. Varus upon the firſt news of the revolt, marched with three legions, a conſiderable body of horſe, and ſix cohorts, to reduce the rebels, being attended by Arminius and his father Sigimer, who, taking upon them to be his guides, led him into a thick foreſt, ſurrounded on all ſides with ſteep hills and marſhy grounds. There while the legionaries gionaries were busy in cutting down trees to open themselves a passage through the forest, and no-ways upon their guard, as not suspecting any treachery, a great body of Germans appeared unexpectedly, and discharging upon them a shower of darts, killed a great number of them, before they could rally and put themselves in a posture of defence. However, they formed themselves at last in order of battle, so far as the ground would allow; but a heavy rain falling, which rendered their arms almost quite useless, and the barbarians pouring in upon them hourly in vast crouds, they attempted to retire to a neighbouring valley; but finding all the avenues beset with numerous bodies of the enemy, they were forced to continue all that night, and the next day, exposed to the darts and arrows which the barbarians incessantly showered upon them. In this extremity Varus, giving up all for lost, and being dangerously wounded, put an end to his life with his own sword, following therein the example of his father and grandfather, who had both fallen by their own hands, the former after the battle of Philippi, and the latter after that of Pharsalia, or, as some writers will have it, after the defeat of Domitius in Africa. Most of the chief officers scorning to outlive their general, or to be made prisoners by the barbarians, laid violent hands on themselves. The greatest part of the cavalry opened themselves a way through the enemy sword in hand, and made their escape; with them Vala Numonius, one of Varus's lieutenants, abandoning the foot, which he commanded, arrived safe at the Rhine, where he soon after perished as a deserter, but of what kind of death our author has not thought fit to acquaint us. Cesonius, another of Varus's lieutenants, after the retreat of the cavalry, and the death of Varus and most of the other officers, was for surrendering at discretion. But this motion cost him dear; for he was immediately tried as a coward by the surviving officers, sentenced to death, and executed; to such a degree were cowards abhorred in the Roman armies. And now a very small number of the legionaries, and scarce any officers, being left alive, the enemy abandoned them as it grew dark, and fell upon the baggage. In the mean time, the Roman trumpets sounding, probably to call those together who were dispersed up and down the forest, the barbarians imagined, that Asprenas, who was quartered at a small distance from that neighbourhood, was come to the assistance of his countrymen; and

and therefore after having plundered the baggage, they retired in the night, and gave the few legionaries, who outlived that fatal day, an opportunity of saving themselves by flight. Thus were three complete legions and six cohorts almost entirely cut off, the greatest overthrow, if Velleius is to be credited, the Romans had received ever since the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians [l]. The legions that perished on this occasion were the best of the whole empire for valour, discipline, and experience; so that the news of this loss threw the city into the utmost consternation, there being few families there that had not a share in the common misfortune. As for Augustus, he set no bounds to his grief, but upon the first news of so dreadful and unexpected an overthrow, he tore his garment, and, like one beside himself, knocked his head against the wall, crying out, "Restore the legions, Varus." This he was observed to do in the transports of his grief for several months, letting in the mean time his hair and beard grow, and abandoning himself entirely to grief and sorrow. However, he did not forget to provide with all possible care for the safety of Rome and Italy: he placed guards in all the quarters of the city, to prevent tumults and disturbances; he raised new levies, obliging all the Roman youth, who were able to bear arms, to list themselves, confiscating the estates of such as refused to give in their names, and even threatening the most refractory with death: he vowed the great games to Jupiter, as had been formerly done in the wars with the Marsi and Cimbri: in short, Augustus never forgot this fatal day, but observed it the remaining part of his life as a day of mourning. Some time after the news of this misfortune had reached Rome, the head of Quintilius Varus was sent to Augustus by Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni; but what induced him to make that present to the emperor, history does not inform us. From his having the head of the deceased general, it was concluded at Rome, that he had contributed to his destruction. However that be, the emperor, though he had great reason to be displeased with Varus, received his remains with great respect, and caused them to be honourably interred in the tomb of his ancestors [m]. Dion tells us, that when news of this defeat was first brought to Rome,

Rome, no-body doubted there, but the Germans after complete a victory would paſs the Rhine, and invade at ſame time Gaul and Italy; but that the fear and conſt nation which had ſeized the city were much abated, wh they underſtood, that Lucius Aſprenas, nephew to Var guarded the banks of the Rhine, and that the barbarians, tisfied with the advantages they had gained, neglected improve them. Junius Silanus, leaving Rom paſſed the Alps, and entering Germany, obliged the rebels though elated with their late ſucceſs, to retire from th neighbourhood of the Rhine, and lay aſide all thought of raiſing diſturbances in Gaul. Velleius Paterculus tells u that he over-ran great part of the country, that he force Arminius to fly before him, that he penetrated into th countries of the Catti and Cheruſci, which he laid waſt with fire and ſword, and in ſhort, that he fully revenge the death of Varus, and the ſlaughter of his legions [n]. But whatever that biaſſed hiſtorian may write in com mendation of Tiberius, Dion Caſſius aſſures us, that he ne ver attempted to bring back to their duty any of the re volted nations, but kept his troops in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, not daring to ſtir from that river for fear of ſome ſurprize. In the latter end of the year, he cele brated the birth-day of Auguſtus in his camp with public games, and then returned to Rome [o].

THIS year the ingenious and celebrated poet Ovid was banished to Tomos (A), for seeing some lewd and scandalous action of Augustus, who had not even in his old age renounced the vices of his youth. That this was the true cause of his disgrace and misfortune, the poet himself tells us in express terms: "Why did I see," says he, "what "I ought not to have seen? Why did I make my eyes "criminal [p]?" (B). Fear restrained him, as is evident, from [p] Ovid. Trist. l. ii. ad August.

(A) Tomos, Tomi, or Tomis, stood on the Euxine sea, and was the metropolis of Lower Mœsia: for Mœsia extended from the confluence of the Save and the Danube to the Euxine sea, being bounded to the south by the mountains of Dalmatia, and to the north by mount Hæmus; and was divided into the Upper and Lower Mœsia; the former contained all the country that lies between the Ciabrus, now the Moravia, and the conflux of the Danube and the Save, and the latter the rest of the country to the Euxine sea; so that the Upper Mœsia comprehended part of Bosnia and Servia, and the Lower Bulgaria. The antients comprised under the name of Pontus that part of Lower Mœsia which bordered on the Pontus Euxinus; and hence the city of Tomi is by them called a city of Pontus, though it did not belong to the kingdom of Pontus properly so called, which we have elsewhere described at length (49). The antient city of Tomos is at present, according to Niger, called Constantia; according to Cœlius Calcagnius, Tomiswar; according to Giosanius, Kiow or Kiovia, there being in the neighbourhood of this last city a lake called by the inhabitants Oviduue jezero, that is, Ovid's lake. Whence it was called Tomos, is well known from the following distich out of Ovid:

"Inde Tomos dictus locus hic, quia fertur in illo
"Membra soror fratris consecuisse sui (50)."

from explaining himſelf any farther, and letting his readers into the particulars of this myſtery (C). The pretence Auguſtus made uſe of for baniſhing him was, the poiſonous books he had wrote of the art of love; whence Sidonius Apollinaris and others aſcribe his diſgrace to the lewdneſs of his muſe, as he does himſelf in ſeveral places of his works out of complaiſance to Auguſtus, and to prevent any farther enquiries. But it is very certain, that he was in high favour with Auguſtus long after he had publiſhed his books of love; for which we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that the emperor would have inflicted ſo ſevere a puniſhment on the poet, after he had written himſelf verſes of that nature, ſome of which have reached our times, and are more ſcandalous than any we read in Ovid. As for Julia, Auguſtus's daughter, ſhe had been many years in ba-

(C) Auguſtus, though ſtricken in years, had not yet renounced the vices of his youth, but carried on an amour with a lady of great diſtinction, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us. The lady's huſband, either out of fear or complaiſance, pretended for a long time to be quite unacquainted with the whole affair; but at length the ſcandal becoming public, he grew very uneaſy, and imparted his concern, and the cauſe of it, to one Athenodorus, who had been preceptor to Tiberius, and was in great favour with Auguſtus. Not long after Auguſtus ſent a covered litter for the lady, and Athenodorus, who happened to be with the huſband when the meſſenger arrived, in order to deter Auguſtus from ſuch ſcandalous practices, and warn him of the danger, to which they expoſed him, diſguiſed himſelf in the lady's dreſs, and covering his face, placed himſelf in the litter, and was conveyed in that attire to the emperor's apartment, who was no leſs frightened than ſurprized to ſee, inſtead of the lady, whom he impatiently expected, a man with a drawn ſword in his hand ſtart out of the litter; but Athenodorus, diſcovering himſelf in that inſtant, "You ſee," ſaid he, "to what dangers your unſeaſon-"able paſſion expoſes you; an enemy inſtead of a friend might "have laid hold of this opportunity to deprive the republic of "ſo gracious a prince." Auguſtus took his advice in good part, and returned him thanks; but whether he reformed his conduct we know not (51). Some writers conjecture, that to this adventure was owing Ovid's misfortune, who, as he had free acceſs to the emperor, might have been an eye-witneſs of his fright and ſurprize; a conjecture which we dare neither warrant or reject.

baniſhment before Ovid's misfortune, and all the accomplices of her debaucheries puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. But whatever was the true cauſe of his diſgrace and baniſhment, he was confined to an inhoſpitable climate, and there lived, or rather pined, to the hour of his death, without ever being able to prevail upon the emperor, either by his friends, or his affecting letters, to mitigate the rigour of the firſt ſentence by removing him to a more friendly climate (D).

(D) Ovid was born in the conſulſhip of Hirtius and Panſa, as he himſelf atteſts, and conſequently was fifty complete when he was baniſhed. This he deſigned to tell us in the following lines:

" Poſtque meos ortus Piſæa vinctus oliva,
" Abſtulerat decies præmia victor eques;
" Cum maris Euxini poſitos ad læva Tomitas
" Quærere me læſi principis ira jubet. (52)."

That is, as he expreſſes himſelf better in his book, " In Iben," which he wrote on his firſt going to Tomos againſt his accuſers;

" Tempus ad hoc luſtris mihi jam bis quinque peractis."

For by no ſmall miſtake he frequently confounds the olympiads, which contained the ſpace of four years, with the Roman luſtra, containing the ſpace of five. Had he lived but ten olympiads, he had been only forty, but ten luſtra make him fifty. In his third book " Triſtium," he tells us, that he had paſſed his firſt winter in Pontus, that is, the firſt year of his baniſhment; for he ſpent the former winter in his journey:

" Frigora jam zephyri minuunt; annoque peracto,
" Longior antiquis viſa Meotis hyems:
" Impoſitamque ſibi quæ non bene pertulit Hellen,
" Tempora nocturnis æqua diurna facit (53)."

In the ſixth book he ſpeaks of the ſecond year of his baniſhment;

THE next year, M. Æmilius Lepidus and T. Statiliu Taurus being conſuls, Auguſtus publiſhed an edict, forbid ding

" Ut patria careo, bis frugibus area trita eſt ;
" Diſſiluit nudo preſſa bis uva pede (54)."

In his fifth book he mentions the beginning of his third winter in Pontus :

" Ut ſumus in Ponto, ter frigore conſtitit Iſter ;
" Facta eſt Euxini dura ter unda maris (55)."

In his firſt book of Pontus he takes notice of the fourth winter he lived in exile in the following lines :

" Hic me pugnantem cum frigore, cumque ſagittis,
" Cumque meo fato, quarta fatigat hyems (56)."

The fifth elegy of the fourth book " De Ponto" is addreſſed to Sextus Pompeius, who with Sextus Apuleius was conſul the year Auguſtus died, and in the ſixth of the ſame book, inſcribed to Brutus, he mentions the death of Auguſtus, and alſo of Fabius Maximus, who died, as is plain from Tacitus (57), in the firſt year of Tiberius's reign ; at which time the poet had paſſed the fifth year of his baniſhment, and was then in the ſixth, as appears from the following verſes ;

" In Scythia nobis quinquennis Olympias acta eſt,
" Jam tempus luſtri tranſit in alterius."

The ſixth year he mentions alſo in the beginning of the tenth elegy to Albinovanus ;

" Hæc mihi Cimmerio bis tertia ducitur æſtas
" Littore, pellitos inter agenda Getas."

And in the thirteenth to Carus ;

" ——— ſed me jam, Care, nivali,
" Sexta relegatum bruma ſub axe videt."

In the ſame elegy he ſpeaks of a poem, written by him on th apotheoſis of Auguſtus in the language of the Getæ;

He likewiſe revived the edict forbidding any of the equeſtrian order to fight in the arena, threatening ſuch as ſhould dare to tranſgreſs it, with infamy, the confiſcation of their eſtates, and death itſelf. He extended his care to the diſtant provinces, ordering, that no public honours ſhould be beſtowed on the governors ſent thither, during the time of their adminiſtration, nor within ſixty days after their departure. The haughty and imperious airs which ſome proconſuls and proprætors had aſſumed, gave riſe to this edict, the emperor judging that the extraordinary honours, which were often conferred upon them, inſpired them with pride, and made them look upon thoſe, over whom they were placed, with an eye of contempt. As there were this year ſixteen perſons of diſtinction who ſtood for the prætorſhip, Auguſtus, unwilling to diſguſt any of the candidates, named them all to that dignity, but the next year reduced their number again to twelve. He raiſed Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius by his firſt wife Vipſania Agrippina, to the quæſtorſhip, though he had not yet attained the age required for the diſcharge of that employment, and named Germanicus conſul for the enſuing year [p]. After this he ſent both Tiberius and Germanicus into Germany at the head of two very numerous armies, but during the whole campaign, they did nothing which hiſtorians have thought worth recording: they paſſed the the conſcript fathers paſſed, at the emperor's requeſt, in

queſt, or rather by the command, of Auguſtus. The next by moſt dreadful conſequences under the ſucceeding emperors, who abuſed this wreſted law to the deſtruction of many innocent perſons, whom on other accounts they diſliked. Towards the end of this year, Auguſtus wrote two letters; one to the ſenate, recommending Germanicus to the conſcript fathers, and another to Tiberius, recommending the ſenate, to him; which was generally looked upon as an open declaration on the part of Auguſtus, that he deſigned to leave the ſame authority to Tiberius over the ſenate, which he himſelf had enjoyed, but would have all others, thoſe of his own family not excepted, to pay an entire obedience to that venerable body. In his letter to the ſenate he begged the fathers not to be at the trouble for the future of waiting upon him, according to their cuſtom, at his houſe, adding, that he hoped they would diſpenſe with him for not attending in the ſenate-houſe as formerly, ſuch an attendance being very inconvenient to him by reaſon of his age; he deſired they would appoint him twenty counſellors out of their body, with whom he might adviſe in matters of importance relating to the ſtate; the ſenate readily granted him his requeſt, and moreover decreed, that whatever he ſhould reſolve upon with the twenty ſenators aſſigned him, the conſuls for the year, the conſuls elect, and his adopted ſon and nephew, ſhould have the ſame force as if voted and paſſed in the ſenate [u]. The following year, when C. Silius and L. Munacius Plancus were conſuls, the fourth term of his ten years being near ended, he accepted, though much againſt his will, ſays Dion Caſſius, of the government of the republic for ten years longer; and at the ſame time renewed the tribunitial power in favour of Tiberius for the like ſpace of years [w]. As for Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius, he empowered him to ſtand for the conſulate after two years, though he had not yet diſcharged the office of prætor; but as both he and Germanicus had places in the ſenate, and it was natural to ſuppoſe that their ſentiments were thoſe of Auguſtus, which none of the conſcript fathers would dare to contradict, he ordered them not to vote, or any ways declare their opinion, in ſuch matters as were debated by the conſcript fathers. Auguſtus having thus ſettled matters at home, and made his will, which he delivered to the veſtal virgins, reſolved once more to attempt the reduction of Germany, and the revenging of the death of

Varus, and the loſs of his legions. With this view he raiſed two numerous armies, the one to be commanded by Tiberius, and the other by Germanicus. The latter was ordered to march this very year into Gaul, and from thence to invade the countries, which at the inſtigation of Arminius had withdrawn their obedience to Rome. As for Tiberius, he was appointed to lead his army into Illyricum, and penetrate on that ſide into the kingdom of Marobo-duus, which the Romans had not yet ſubdued. Auguſtus, however, kept him at Rome all this, and part of the following, year, when Sextus Pompeius and Sextus Apuleius were raiſed to the conſulate: the former was grandſon to the famous Sextus Pompeius, whoſe war with Auguſtus we have deſcribed in this volume: his collegue Apuleius was one of Auguſtus's chief favourites, and is ſaid to have prevailed upon him to change the ſentence of death, which he firſt pronounced againſt Ovid, into that of perpetual baniſhment. During their adminiſtration, Auguſtus, taking Tiberius for his collegue in the cenſorſhip, made a third cenſus, by which it appeared, that the number of Roman people amounted to four millions one hundred and thirty-ſeven thouſand, counting women and children as well as men [x]. Euſebius makes the number of Roman citizens amount to 9370000, counting probably thoſe who lived both at Rome, and in the provinces [y]. While the ceremony was performing in the field of Mars, an eagle was obſerved to fly ſeveral times round Auguſtus, and then light on a neighbouring temple over the firſt letter of Agrippa's name. This was looked upon not only by the multitude, but by Auguſtus himſelf, as an omen of his approaching end. He therefore ordered his collegue Tiberius to make the vows which were uſual at the time of the cenſus, "for the ſafety of the "Roman ſtate, and the proſperity of the citizens," ſaying, that he would not make vows which he ſhould not live to perform [z]. He was confirmed in his opinion by ſeveral other prodigies: the firſt letter of his name in an inſcription on the pedeſtal of one of his ſtatues was ſtruck off with lightning, and the ſoothſayers, who were conſulted on that occaſion, declared that he had only an hundred days to live, the letter C ſtanding for that number among the Latins; they added, that after his death he would be ranked among among the gods, the word Cæsar, which was the remaining part of his name, signifying a god in the Hetruscan language [a]. To these two omens Dion Cassius adds a third which in his opinion plainly presaged his imminent death. It had been customary ever since the death of Julius Cæsar, to place his chair with a crown upon it at the public sports. In this chair Augustus used to sit, when he assisted at the shews; but it happening to be empty while the sports were exhibiting this year in honour of Augustus, a fool placed himself in it, and taking up the crown, put it upon his head; and hence it was concluded, that the sovereign power, signifyed by the crown, would soon pass into other hands [b]. In the mean time, Augustus wrote a short account of the chief actions of his life, which he caused to be engraved on brass, and placed over his tomb [c]. Great part of this valuable monument has been transmitted to us in the Marmor Ancyranum, and is to be seen in the inscriptions of the learned Gruter [d].

As Augustus visibly declined every day both in his health and strength, so that no body could doubt but his end was at hand, some few there were who began to talk of restoring the republic to its former liberty; but far the greater part, dreading a civil war, were for tamely submitting to the person, whom Augustus should think fit to place over them. All the zealous republicans had been slain in the battles of Philippi and Actium; their posterity had been long inured to the yoke, there being scarce any living now who had beheld the old free state, and as for the Roman people, they were become a mere mob, addicted to idleness, void of all sentiments of honour or virtue, without any traces of the antient Roman spirit, or any attachment to the virtuous institutions of their ancestors. The zealous republicans therefore, who were very few, despairing of success, and laying aside all hopes of ever seeing the antient free state restored, resolved to submit to the heir and successor whom Augustus should name, and bear with patience the evils which it was not in their power to prevent or redress [e].

The Romans lay aside all thoughts of attempting the recovery of their liberty.

And now it being high time for Tiberius to leave Rome, and set out for Illyricum, Augustus, to the great surprize of the whole city, declared his intention of accompanying him as

as far as Beneventum, and purſuing his journey from thence to Naples in Campania, in order to aſſiſt at the ſolemn ſports which were to be exhibited there on his approaching birth day. As he found his ſtrength decaying apace, he promiſed himſelf no ſmall benefit from the wholeſome air of Campania, eſpecially of Naples, whither many Romans uſed to reſort, even in thoſe days, for the recovery of their health; and this was, as is ſuppoſed, the true motive of this ſudden and unexpected reſolution, though he did not think fit to own it. He performed the journey with uncommon chearfulneſs and alacrity, being attended by his beloved Livia, who, as we may well imagine, was very aſſiduous about him in ſo critical a juncture. At Beneventum he parted with Tiberius, and purſued his journey to Naples, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy. After he had ſpent ſome time at Naples very agreeably, and aſſiſted there at the public ſports, he was ſeized with a diarrhœa, a dangerous diſtemper in a perſon of his years. He therefore reſolved, before his ſtrength failed him, to return to Rome, and accordingly, leaving Naples, ſet out for his capital; but his illneſs encreaſing in ſpight of all the remedies preſcribed him by the phyſicians who attended him, he was obliged to ſtop at Nola in Campania, and there betake himſelf to his bed. In the mean time, Livia, well appriſed that his end was at hand, diſpatched meſſenger after meſſenger to Tiberius, acquainting him with the ſtate of the emperor's health, and preſſing him to return with all poſſible expedition. Tiberius, upon the receipt of his mother's letters, immediately left Illyricum, and flew to Nola, not with any private view, ſays Velleius, but merely out of the great tenderneſs and filial affection he had for Auguſtus, whom he found alive, if that author is to be credited, and had long conferences with him; in one of which, the dying emperor, after having publicly declared him his ſucceſſor in the ſovereign power, deſired him to maintain all his acts in their full vigor, and to purſue the ſame methods of government which he had uſed [f]. But Tacitus tells us, that it was never well known, whether Tiberius on his arrival at Nola found the emperor dead, or ſtill alive, Livia having carefully beſet the palace, and all the avenues to it, with detachments of the guards, and given out from time to time good news of the emperor's recovery. He adds, that when ſhe had taken all neceſſary meaſures in ſo nice a juncture, in one and the ſame moment moment were publiſhed the death of Auguſtus, and acceſſion of Tiberius [g]. But to return to Auguſtus; finding his end approaching, he looked death in the face with greater intrepidity than was expected from one who had ever carefully avoided it in the field. He diſcourſed very chearfully with his intimate friends and chief favourites, giving them many wiſe and uſeful inſtructions relating to the management of their private affairs, and thoſe of the public. In ſpeaking of his own actions, he told them, that "he had found Rome "of brick, but left it of marble," alluding by this expreſſion, ſays Dion Caſſius, not ſo much to the beauty and ſtatelineſs of the buildings, as to the majeſty, grandeur, and firmneſs of the empire. And now finding his ſtrength quite failed him, he called for a looking-glaſs, and having cauſed his hair to be ſet in order, and his wrinkled cheeks to be ſmoothed, as was cuſtomary among the ſtage-players, he asked his friends with a languiſhing voice, "Whether he "had acted his part well?" and they anſwered, "he had; "Then clap me" ſaid he, "for I have ended my part." After this fixing his eyes on Livia, who held him in her arms, he deſired her "to remember their marriage, and the "ties which had kept their hearts ſo long united," and then quietly expired [h]. Thus died the celebrated Auguſtus on the nineteenth of Auguſt, which month was ſo named from him, the ſame day on which he had entered upon his firſt conſulſhip. He had lived ſeventy-five years, ten months and twenty-ſix days, and reigned from his firſt conſulſhip fifty-ſix years, but from the battle of Actium only forty-three. Tacitus and Dion Caſſius obſerve one very remarkable circumſtance of his death; for he died in the ſame town, as theſe two writers tell us, in the ſame houſe, and in the ſame chamber, where his father Octavius died [i]. Livia was ſuſpected of having haſtened the emperor's death, fearing he might be reconciled on his return to Rome with his grandſon Agrippa Poſthumus, whom he had privately viſited ſome months before, ſailing over to the iſland of Planaſia with Fabius Maximus alone, without the privity of Livia, Tiberius, or any other of his moſt faithful and truſty favourites. This Fabius diſcloſed to his wife Martia, and ſhe to Livia, and thence the emperor knew that the ſecret was betrayed; which which ſo provoked him againſt Fabius, that he baniſhed him his preſence for ever, bidding him, when he came to wait upon him the next morning, "an eternal farewel." Fabius did not long ſurvive his diſgrace; but ſoon after laid violent hands on himſelf [k]. We are told, that in the interview between Auguſtus and his grandſon Agrippa many tears were ſhed on both ſides, and many tokens of mutual tenderneſs ſhewn, which gave the unhappy youth hopes of being reſtored to his own place in his grandfather's family. This Livia dreaded, and in order to prevent it, haſtened her huſband's death, as ſome authors write, with poiſoned figs [l]. The body of the deceaſed emperor was carried from Nola to Bovillæ in the neighbourhood of Rome on the ſhoulders of the chief magiſtrates of the colonies and municipal towns on the road. At Bovillæ it was received by the Roman knights, and by them conveyed to Rome, and expoſed in the porch of the imperial palace on mount Palatine. Tiberius, in virtue of the tribunitial power with which he was inveſted, appointed the ſenate to meet the next day, but would ſuffer no other buſineſs to be tranſacted, except what related to the funeral of his deceaſed father. In the firſt place, his laſt will was brought in by the veſtal virgins, and read aloud by Polybius one of Auguſtus's freedmen. It began thus: "Since the gods have been pleaſed to deprive me "of my grand children Caius and Lucius, I declare Tiberius my heir, &c. (E). By the ſame will Tiberius and Livia

(E) From this preamble it is manifeſt, that Auguſtus would never have adopted Tiberius, or appointed him his ſucceſſor, had thoſe two young princes, or either of them, lived. Some writers tell us, that Auguſtus was well acquainted with the bad qualities and tyrannical temper of Tiberius, and that on his death-bed he could not help pitying the Roman people, who, to uſe the expreſſions aſcribed to him, "Were to be under "ſo ſlow a pair of grinders; Miſerum populm Romanum, qui "ſub tam lentis maxillis erit." What then prompted him to adopt for his ſon, and name for his ſucceſſor one whom he knew to be no ways qualified for ſo great a charge; To this queſtion ſome writers anſwer, that the promotion of Tiberius was entirely owing to his mother Livia, who had gained an abſolute aſcendant over Auguſtus, eſpecially in his old age; others others ſays, that he was actuated therein by a ſecret ambition of making his death more regretted by the badneſs of his ſucceſſor. But Suetonius cannot perſuade himſelf, that a prince of Auguſtus's ſagacity and prudence could proceed upon motives of this nature, in an affair of ſo great importance; he is rather inclined to believe, that having weighed both his vices and virtues, he thought the latter overbalanced the former; and hence, when he adopted him, he ſolemnly declared upon oath, that he was prompted thereunto by no other motive but that of the public welfare, and often commended him in his letters not only as an excellent commander, but as the only ſtay and ſupport of the Roman people. Out of theſe letters Suetonius inſtances ſome of his expreſſions: "Farewel," ſays he, in one of them, "my dear Tiberius; may you be happy "in your enterprizes, fighting, as you do for me and the muſes: "may I be happy, as you are a moſt valiant and accompliſh-"ed commander, Farewel, take care of your ſummer-quarters; "as for my own part, my dear Tiberius, I confidently believe, "that amongſt ſo many difficulties and diſorders, in the midſt "of ſo much remiſſneſs and cowardice in the army, no man "could have behaved with more prudence than you have "done; inſomuch, that all thoſe, who have had the honour of "attending you, do unanimouſly acknowledge that this verſe "cannot more properly be applied to any man living, than to "yourſelf:

"Unus homo nobis vigilando reſtituit rem."

And in another letter; "Whether I ſeriouſly conſider of an "affair, or any thing falls out which I ought to reſent, I want "my Tiberius immediately, and this ſaying comes conſtantly "into my mind. By this man's conduct and prudence we might "both eſcape even out of the fire. As often as I am told "how much you are fallen away by your indefatigable labour, "may I periſh if I do not tremble to hear it. Let me de-"ſire you therefore to have more care of yourſelf for the "future, leſt the firſt news of your ſickneſs be the death of "your mother and me, and the people of Rome be in great "danger of loſing their empire. I do not value my own health, "unleſs you be well too. I beg the gods to preſerve you "for our good, if they bear no prejudice or grudge to the "Roman people (59)." From theſe letters it plainly appears, that third heirs: Livia was adopted into the Julia family, a honoured with the title of Auguſta. As for the great me of Rome, Tacitus tells us, that he hated them, but nevel theleſs named them out of vanity. To the Roman peopl he left by way of legacy four hundred thouſand great ſeſter ces; to the populace thirty-five-thouſand; to every com mon ſoldier of the prætorian guards a thouſand ſmall ſeſter ces; and to every ſoldier of the Roman legions thre hundred. His laſt will being read, Druſus produced to th conſcript fathers four ſmall books wrote by the deceaſed em peror; the firſt of which contained regulations relating t the ceremony of his obſequies; the ſecond was a journal o the moſt memorable actions of his life, which by his laſt will he ordered to be engraved on the pillars of braſs, which ſup ported the frontiſpiece of his ſtately mauſoleum. Grea part of this journal has been preſerved in an antient marbl found about an hundred and fifty years ſince in the city o Ancyra [m]. The third book contained a ſummary of th ſtrength and income of the empire, the number of the Romans and auxiliaries in pay, the condition of the navy of the ſeveral kingdoms paying tribute, and of the variou provinces and their revenues, with the ſtate of the treaſury the expences of the empire, and the demands upon th public. This regiſter, as we may call it, was all writ wit Auguſtus's own hand. The fourth book was a collection inſtructions for the uſe of Tiberius, and the other governor and magiſtrates of the republic, whom he adviſed to la aſide all thoughts of extending the limits of the empire by new conqueſts [n]. But whether this advice was dictated by his love for the public, ſays Tacitus, or by envy and jealouſy of the glory of his ſucceſſors, is uncertain [o]. The funera honours were next conſidered, when Aſinius Gallus moved that the funeral ſhould paſs through the triumphal gate Lucius Aruntius, that the titles of all the laws he had made and that Auguſtus had a real value and ſincere affection for Tiberius that he looked upon him as the only perſon capable of ſup porting with dignity the title of emperor, and conſequently that it was not out of complaiſance to Livia, nor a ſecret ambition of inhancing his own reputation with poſterity by the badneſs of his ſucceſſor that he choſe him.

and the names of all the nations he had conquered, ſhould be carried before the corſe; ſome were of opinion, that on the day of his funeral all the magiſtrates and knights ſhould in token of their grief wear iron rings inſtead of their gold ones, and that, to eternalize his memory, not only the month Sextilis, but the whole time he had lived, ſhould bear his name, and be ſtiled "Seculum Auguſtum," that is, "the age of Auguſtus." Valerius Meſſala, departing from the matter in queſtion, added, that the oath of allegiance to Tiberius ſhould be renewed every year. Tiberius, ſurpriſed at this unexpected propoſal, asked him, whether he had made that motion at his inſtigation! "I ſpoke it," anſwered Meſſala with a new turn of flattery, "as my own "opinion, nor will I ever be controuled by any man in "things which concern the welfare of the public, let who "will be provoked at my freedom [p]." The ſenators at length all agreed to carry the body of the deceaſed emperor to the funeral pile on their ſhoulders; but this Tiberius would not ſuffer; nay he cautioned the people by an edict to refrain their zeal, and not to inſiſt upon having his body burnt, as Julius Cæſar's had been, rather in the forum, than in the field of Mars, which was the place appointed. However, his funeral was performed with the greateſt pomp and magnificence, that had ever been ſeen in Rome. Druſus read from the roſtra a ſhort elogium of the deceaſed emperor, and Tiberius pronounced his funeral oration in the forum, which was received with the applauſe it well deſerved, it being a maſter-piece of the kind [q]. When fire was ſet to his pile, an eagle was let looſe from the top of it, as it were to carry his ſoul to heaven. Livia, and with her ſome of the chief men among the knights, continued for five days together in the field of Mars gathering up the aſhes and the bones which the flames had ſpared. Theſe Livia put in an urn of gold, which ſhe repoſited in the magnificent mauſoleum, which Auguſtus had long before built for himſelf in a grove between the Tiber and the Flaminian way. It was decreed that men ſhould mourn for him according to cuſtom, that is, about three weeks; but women a whole year, probably for Livia's ſake. As ſoon as the funeral was over, divine worſhip was decreed him with a temple and prieſts: the houſe, in which he was born, that in which he died, and moſt of the houſes, in which he had lived, were changed into ſanctuaries.

ries. Livia, now Julia Auguſta, took upon her to be the chief prieſteſs of the new deity, and made a preſent of ten thouſand great ſeſterces to a ſenator, named Numerius Atticus, who ſolemnly declared upon his oath, that he had ſeen the ſoul of Auguſtus aſcend up to heaven. This fable, which was a copy of that which Julius Proculus had many ages before publiſhed concerning Romulus, was ſoon ſpread and credited in all the provinces ſubject to Rome: temples were every-where erected in honour of the deified Auguſtus, and a new order of prieſts inſtituted. Tiberius conſecrated a ſanctuary to his deceaſed father in his own palace, and choſe twenty-one prieſts from among the ſenators, naming himſelf, his ſon Druſus, and his nephew Germanicus, among the firſt [r]. It was not out of any principle of religion, or any regard to Auguſtus, as Tacitus well obſerves, that Tiberius procured the deification of Auguſtus, but becauſe it nearly concerned him to have all the laws and acts of one who had left him his ſucceſſor paſs for ſacred. Beſides, in promoting this kind of ſuperſtition, he had another view, which was to rivet the public ſlavery, evidently included in religious worſhip paid to a prince who had enthralled his country.

His character. AUGUSTUS was a man of a ſound judgment, and great penetration, had a particular turn for buſineſs, and a wonderful talent in improving opportunities, and applying the abilities of others to his own ends. In the times of the republic, when valour and eloquence were the only means of riſing, and acquiring fame, he would have made but a middling figure; for he was quite deſtitute of the former, being bold indeed in council, but a coward in the field; and as to his eloquence, it was, according to Tacitus, eaſy and flowing, ſuch as became a prince, but no ways fit to move or controul the ſpirit of republicans. He did not make his way to the throne, but found it already made by his great uncle Julius, who happily accompliſhed what he would never have thought of attempting. He had, 'tis true, powerful enemies to contend with, whom he overcame; but his victories were owing to others, and not to himſelf. Thus by the bravery of Antony he conquered Brutus and Caſſius, and by the valour of Agrippa he conquered Antony. Nor did it require extraordinary abilities to hold the empire, when he had once acquired it, the Roman ſpirit being entirely tirely broken, and all thoſe cut off either in the battles of Philippi and Actium, or by bloody proſcriptions, who had courage enough to ſtand up in defence of their liberties. He was naturally of a cruel and vindictive temper, and did many mean things to ſatisfy his revenge, which the great heart of Cæſar would have ſcorned. We meet with no inſtances of his ſo much boaſted clemency and moderation, till he had ſacrificed to his jealouſy all thoſe whom he either feared or ſuſpected. When he had thoroughly maſtered the ſtate, utterly extinguiſhed all maxims of liberty, and inhumanly maſſacred ſuch as he thought capable of thwarting his deſigns, or diſturbing him in the poſſeſſion of his uſurped power; he then governed with great mildneſs, and diſcharged all the duties of an excellent prince; which gave riſe to the ſaying, that "he ſhould never have been born, "or never have died." As he ſtuck at no wickedneſs to gain power, we cannot help thinking but that he would have committed more to maintain it, if he had found more to be neceſſary. He made, 'tis true, a feint or two to abdicate the ſovereignty; had he been in earneſt, he might at leaſt have left for a legacy to the Roman people that liberty of which he had robbed them. But inſtead of reſtoring to them that dominion over themſelves, which none but themſelves had any right to exerciſe, he provided by a long train of ſucceſſors againſt any poſſible recovery of liberty. When he had no longer any heirs of his own blood, whom he liked, he adopted the ſons of his wife, and their ſons; which plainly ſhews, that he was determined to entail ſlavery upon his country, and extend his uſurpation even beyond his grave. Some writers to excuſe him tell us, that the ſtate was irretrievable, and that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary the ſovereign power ſhould be lodged in one man. But Auguſtus himſelf judged otherwiſe; for by propoſing to reſign, however inſincere this propoſal was, he at leaſt ſhewed, that he thought the reſettling of the republic practicable. Druſus, brother to Tiberius, declared his deſign to effect it; nay, it was what Tiberius himſelf, after he was emperor, pretended to do. Auguſtus might, without all doubt, by his abſolute authority have reduced the commonwealth to her firſt principles and firmneſs. This would have been true glory, the only true uſe of his abſolute power, and the only amends for having aſſumed it. But inſtead of reſtoring the ſtate to its antient luſtre, he did all that lay in his power to perpetuate ſlavery, to extinguiſh all maxims of liberty, and to render his ſucceſſors as abſolute as himſelf.

But not to dwell any longer on this ſubject, we ſhall conclude with Dion Caſſius, that Auguſtus would have been deſervedly eſteemed one of the beſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter, had he not uſurped, but received the ſovereign power lawfully conveyed to him from his anceſtors. But whether the wiſe laws he publiſhed, and the mildneſs with which he governed, after his ſovereignty was thoroughly eſtabliſhed, ſufficiently attoned for his uſurpation, and the many crimes attending it, is what we ſubmit to the judgment of our readers (F).

(F) The news of Auguſtus's death, when firſt brought to Rome, gave occaſion to various diſcourſes and obſervations concerning him, which it would be an unpardonable omiſſion in us not to take notice of, ſince they acquaint us with the ſentiments, which his friends as well as his enemies entertained of him, and have been tranſmitted to us by one of the moſt judicious and accurate writers of antiquity (60), in whoſe words we ſhall deliver them: "The ſuperſtitious multitude," ſays that writer, "admired the fortuitous events of his life, the laſt day of which "and the firſt of his reign was the ſame; that he died at "Nola, in the ſame town, in the ſame houſe, and in the ſame "chamber, where his father Octavius died. They obſerved "to his glory his many conſulſhips, equal in number to thoſe "of Valerius Corvinus and Caius Marius put together; that "he had exerciſed the tribunitial power for thirty-ſeven years "ſucceſſively; that he had been proclaimed emperor twenty-one "times, and that he had enjoyed many honours, ſome of which "had been conferred upon others, and ſome created for him. "Men of penetration entered further into his life, but differed "about it. His admirers ſaid that his filial piety, and the diſ-"orders which reigned in the republic, and had got the bet-"ter of the laws, forced him to enter into a civil war, which "can never be carried on without dreadful diſturbances; that "to be revenged on thoſe who had murdered his father, "he had been obliged to comply with the violent temper of "his collegues, Antony and Lepidus, and give up to their "revenge and jealouſy many illuſtrious citizens! that when "Antony was loſt in ſenſuality, and Lepidus in ſloth and idle-"neſs, there was no other remedy for the diſtracted ſtate, rent "into parties and factions, but the ſovereignty of one: Auguſtus, "however, did never take upon him to rule over his country "as king or dictator, but ſettled the government under the "legal title of prince of the ſenate: he extended the bounds "of young Agrippa, whom he cauſed to be diſpatched by a military

" to death. Neither was his domeſtic life ſpared on this occa-
" ſion: he had arbitrarily robbed Nero of his wife, when ſhe
" was big with child, and in deriſion of the gods conſulted the " prieſts, whether he might marry her before, or was obliged to " wait till after her delivery. His favourites, Tedius and Ve-
" dius Pollio had lived in exceſſive luxury: his wife Livia, who " had an abſolute ſway over him had proved a cruel governeſs to " the republic, and a more cruel ſtep-mother to the Julian fa" mily: he had even uſurped honours peculiar to the gods,
" and raiſing temples to himſelf, would be adored as a deity
" with all the ſolemnity of prieſts and ſacrifices: he adopted
" Tiberius for his ſucceſſor, not out of affection to him, or " any concern for the republic, but having diſcovered in him a " cruel and haughty temper, he ſought glory from the com-
" pariſon of their reigns." Such were the ſentiments and ob-ſervations of the Romans on the deceaſed emperor. But after all, it muſt be owned, that Auguſtus, whether we conſider him as a magiſtrate at the helm of the republic, or, as a private citizen in his domeſtic life, had many good qualities, which few perſons in either ſtation have ever ſince his time poſſeſſed in ſo eminent a degree. Theſe together with his vices we ſhall here without any prejudice or partiality expoſe to the conſideration of our readers, that they may the better be able to form a right judgment of the famous and ſo much celebrated Auguſtus.

In the firſt place, when his authority was once thoroughly eſtabliſhed, he made it his whole ſtudy to redreſs the public grievances, to ſuppreſs the diſorders which had been introduced by the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiery, during the civil wars, to ſettle in all the provinces a laſting peace, and to promote the happineſs and welfare of his ſubjects. That he had nothing more at heart than to ſee the republic flouriſh, he frequently declared in his private diſcourſe, but more remarkably in one of his edicts in the following words: " I wiſh I may be able " to eſtabliſh the commonwealth on its proper baſis, and reap
" ſuch fruits of my labour as I deſire, that I may hereafter be " reputed the founder of ſo excellent a fabric, and carry this " hope with me to the grave, that the commonwealth will " continue and flouriſh upon the foundations which I have
" laid." Some writers have thought, that he would have reſigned after his firſt illneſs, or at leaſt left Rome free at his death, had he not been perſuaded, that other pretenders would have riſen up, and involved the republic in new troubles. He enacted many excellent laws for the reformation of manners, ners, and extirpation of vice; and it may be truly ſaid, that virtue was never more countenanced than in his reign. His ſumptuary laws, his laws againſt bribery, adultery, unnatural luſt, and all kind of incontinence, wrought a great change in the city, where vice had long appeared bare-faced, and triumphed. After he had reformed the manners of the citizens, he applied himſelf wholly to the embelliſhing of the city. In order to this, he raiſed many public buildings, among which the chief were, the forum, or court of juſtice, the temple of Mars the avenger, the temple of Apollo in Palatio, the temple of Jupiter the thunderer in the capitol, the portico of Lucius and Caius, the palaces of Livia and Octavia, and the theatre of Marcellus. He repaired many old temples, and rebuilt many, which had been deſtroyed either by time or fire, enriching both them and the reſt with moſt magnificent preſents. To the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, not to mention others, he gave at once ſixteen thouſand pound weight of gold, beſides jewels and precious ſtones, to the value of fifty millions of ſeſterces. He often exhorted the principal and moſt wealthy citizens to repair or erect ſome monument or other, which might ſerve as an ornament to the city: and upon his perſuaſion Marcius Philippus built the temple of Hercules Muſarum, L. Cornificius, the temple of Diana, Aſinius Pollio the court of Liberty, Munatius Plancus the temple of Saturn, Cornelius Balbus a theatre, Statilius Taurus an amphitheatre, and Marcus Agrippa a great number of moſt ſtately and magnificent ſtructures. In order to ſecure the city, thus embelliſhed, againſt fires and inundations, to which it was ſubject, he divided it into fourteen regions or wards, appointing a peculiar magiſtrate for each ward, and committing the care of each ſtreet to ſome citizen of diſtinction. Theſe had under their command guards and watchmen, who were to patrol all night to prevent fires, robberies, and other diſorders: againſt the inundations of the Tiber, which often laid the lower parts of the city under water, he cleanſed and enlarged the bed of that river, which had been long choaked up with rubbiſh, and the ruins of houſes; and that the city might be the more acceſſible on all ſides, he took upon himſelf the reparation of the Flaminian way as far as Ariminum, leaving the reſt of the public ways to be mended by ſuch as had triumphed, and the charges to be defrayed out of the ſpoils of the enemy.

He ſhewed high regard for the Roman name, and was ſparing in admitting foreigners to the rights of citizens; whereof we have the two following inſtances: Tiberius, having deſired him

he ſuffered Auguſtus's death to be made public. Tiberius avoided to grant the citizenſhip of Rome to a certain Greek, who was one of his clients, he wrote him this anſwer; that "he would "not comply with his requeſt, unleſs he came himſelf, and ſatiſ- "fied him of the juſtice of it:" in like manner Livia interceding for a Gaul, he peremptorily rejected her petition, but granted the Gaul an exemption from his tribute with this declaration; that "he would rather condeſcend to a diminution of the "public revenue, than to proſtitute the honour of the Roman "name." As he had a particular veneration for the memory of thoſe heroes who had contributed to the advancement of the Roman empire, he repaired all their monuments, retaining their old titles and inſcriptions, and dedicating their ſtatues in the two portico's of his forum; on which occaſion he declared in an edict, that "his deſign was to propoſe them as a pattern and "example, by which he himſelf, and the princes, who ſhould "ſucceed him, might frame themſelves, and regulate their "conduct."

As he had no great talent for war, he commanded the army in perſon but twice againſt a foreign enemy, viz. in Dalmatia, when he was but young, and in his expedition againſt the Cantabrians. The other wars he managed by his lieutenants, who under his auſpices reduced the Cantabrians, Aquitans, Dalmatians, Pannonians, Illyrians, Rhœtians, Vindelicians, Salaſſians, and the Germans inhabiting the countries between the Rhine and the Elbe. He held it for an infallible maxim, that war was never to be undertaken, nor a battle fought, but when the advantage hoped for was apparently greater than the loſs feared; "for "thoſe who hazard much," ſaid he, "to gain but little, are "like men who fiſh with hooks of gold, the loſs of which "will hardly be repaired by what they catch." He uſed to ſay, that raſhneſs and precipitancy were the greateſt faults in a general; whence he had this ſaying frequently in his mouth, Feſtina lente, which is much the ſame in ſenſe with our common proverb, "No more haſte than good ſpeed." He was very ſevere in keeping the ſoldiers to their duty, not ſuffering, but with much difficulty, even his lieutenants to quit the camp, and return to Rome; and that only when the troops were in winter quarters. A Roman knight, having cut off the thumbs of two of his ſons to diſable them from ſerving, he condemned him to be ſold for a ſlave, and confiſcated his eſtate. He diſbanded the tenth legion only for betraying an unwillingneſs to obey his commands, and diſmiſſed others, without the rewards due to veterans for having demanded their diſcharge. If in an engagement any cohort or legion gave ground, or were

even put into confuſion, he ordered every tenth man by lot to be executed, and allowed the reſt nothing but barley. The centurions and tribunes likewiſe, abandoning their poſts, were immediately puniſhed with death. For ſmall offences he contented himſelf with condemning them to ſtand all day before his prætorium, ſometimes ungirt in their tunics only, and ſometimes with long poles in their hands. After the civil wars he never called thoſe who ſerved under him fellow-ſoldiers, but only ſoldiers, nor would he ſuffer his own or his wife's children to call them otherwiſe, thinking it inconſiſtent with military diſcipline, with the tranquillity of thoſe times, and the grandeur of his family, to treat them with familiarity.

He was no leſs careful in adminiſtering juſtice, than ſevere in exacting military diſcipline: for he not only appointed ſuch judges as were men of known integrity, but was himſelf very aſſiduous in hearing cauſes, often ſitting up with great patience the beſt part of the night: when he was by any indiſpoſition confined to his palace, he uſed then to hear cauſes in his own room lying upon a couch, thinking the adminiſtration of juſtice the chief and indeſpenſable duty of a prince. Notwithſtanding his aſſiduity in hearing cauſes, and continual application, he was at all hours ready to give audience even to the meaneſt of the people, to hear their complaints, and receive their petitions; and becauſe one preſented him his requeſt ſomewhat timorouſly, he pleaſantly rebuked him, ſaying, "That he had delivered "his petition to him, as if he had been preſenting ſomething to "an elephant." To encourage perſons of all ranks to recur freely to him, he carefully avoided all outward appearance of grandeur; hence he very ſeldom entered, or left any city, but in the night-time, to avoid all formalities, and the attendance of the inhabitants. He never went to the ſenate without ſaluting all the ſenators, in the order they ſat, each of them by his own name; and at his departure took his leave of them in the ſame manner. He aſſiſted in perſon at all public and private feaſts and entertainments till he began to be in years, and could no longer bear the inconveniencies of a croud. He had had ſo great an averſion to the title of dominus or lord, that he looked upon it as a reproach, and even publiſhed an edict, forbidding any one, his own children and grandchildren not excepted, to give him that title. In the aſſemblies held for the election of magiſtrates, he gave his vote in his own tribe, as if he had been one of the people; and in the courts of judicature, he not only ſuffered himſelf to be interrogated, but allowed the judges and advocates of the adverſe party to object againſt his depoſition.

have the world believe that it was done by the command of Auguſtus

fition. How great and powerful ſoever his favourites were in Rome, he would not allow them any exemption from the judiciary laws, nor even recommend them to the judges. Of all the criminals and accuſed perſons in his time, he ſaved but one, by whoſe means he had diſcovered a conſpiracy formed againſt him, and him he preſerved by prevailing with his entreaties upon his accuſer to withdraw his accuſation. The antients give us ſeveral inſtances even of his clemency, after his authority was thoroughly eſtabliſhed. One Junius Novatus publiſhed a letter full of bitter invectives againſt him in the name of young Agrippa, for which offence Auguſtus only laid a ſmall fine upon him. One Caſſius Patavinus declared boldly at a public entertainment, that "he neither wanted will nor cou-"rage to rid Rome of her new monarch;" and Auguſtus contented himſelf only with ordering him to depart Rome. Æmilius Ælianus being accuſed among other things of ſpeaking of him with great contempt, the emperor turning to the informer, and pretending to be in a great rage, "I wiſh with "all my heart you could prove it," ſaid he: "if you did, I "would make Ælianus know, that I have a tongue as well as "he, and can ſay twice as much of him;" and reſented it no further. Tiberius likewiſe complaining in a letter to him of the inſolence of Ælianus, he returned him this anſwer; "Do "not, my dear Tiberius, indulge too much in this caſe your "paſſion; let us deſpiſe words, and think ourſelves happy if "they can do us no greater harm."

As for his liberality, it knew no bounds; he conſtantly ſupplied with corn above an hundred thouſand families, which he cauſed to be diſtributed monthly among them: he frequently preſented the people with large ſums, giving them ſometimes two, ſometimes three, and ſometimes four hundred ſeſterces a head, not excluding even the children. He was always ready to lend without intereſt, any ſum to ſuch perſons as were able to ſecure him his principal by double the value. When he publiſhed the law excluding from the ſenate ſuch as were not worth twelve hundred thouſand ſeſterces, out of compaſſion for many noble families, he made up that ſum with his own money. He exhibited at an immenſe charge twenty-four ſhows in his own name, and twenty-three for other magiſtrates, who were either abſent, or not able to bear the expence attending them.

Thus far of Auguſtus as a public magiſtrate: as to his domeſtic and private life, Suetonius repreſents him as a tender and careful parent, a conſtant friend, and both a ſevere and gentle maſter.

Auguſtus, as if he had tranſmitted orders to the tribune who guarded Agrippa Poſthumus murdered.

maſter. He brought up his daughter and her children with the utmoſt care, not allowing any but perſons of unblemiſhed characters to have acceſs to them: his grandchildren he taught himſelf the rudiments of learning, promiſing himſelf great happineſs from his iſſue, and the care he took of their education; but he was therein, to his inexpreſſible grief, greatly diſappointed, as we have related in the hiſtory of his reign. His friendſhip, when once acquired, was firm and conſtant: he not only rewarded his friends ſervices, but patiently bore with their faults. Of all of them none ever received any ill treatment at his hands, except Salvidienus Rufus, and the famous poet Cornelius Gallus, who well deſerved it, as we have related above. The reſt of his favourites flouriſhed in honour and riches to the end of their lives. As to his domeſtics, he conferred honourable employments, and heaped riches upon ſuch of them as behaved well; but Proculus, a freedman, and one of his chief favourites, he cauſed to be put to death, for carrying on intreagues with married women. Thallus, another freedman, and his amanuenſis, having betrayed ſome ſecrets for five hundred denarii, had his legs broke by his order. Several of his grandſon Caius's attendants he ordered to be thrown headlong into a river, and drowned, for levying money in their maſter's province without his knowledge. He choſe rather to turn into mirth the timorouſneſs of Diomedes, another of his freedmen, than to impute it to any malicious deſign, when walking with him alone, a wild boar coming ſuddenly upon them, Diomedes, to ſecure himſelf, made bold to thruſt his maſter to the boar.

He applied himſelf from his youth to the ſtudy of eloquence, and other liberal arts. During the war of Modena he is ſaid not to have paſſed a day in the midſt of his moſt important affairs without reading, writing, and delaiming. He wrote ſeveral books upon different ſubjects; viz. "An anſwer to Bru-
" tus's Cato; exhortations to the ſtudy of philoſophy; the " hiſtory of his life to the Cantabrian war in thirteen books, " an epic poem intitled Sicilia, and a book of epigrams, which
" he compoſed for the moſt part in his baths:" he began a tragedy in a lofty ſtyle, but finding he could not hold out at that rate, he expunged what he had wrote, and being aſked by his friends what was become of Ajax, who was the ſubject of the performance, he anſwered, "Ajax has diſpatched himſelf
" with a ſponge." Though he was well acquainted with the Greek tongue, yet he neither ſpoke it readily, nor ever ventured to compoſe any thing in it; when he was obliged to uſe

that

that language, he firſt wrote down in Latin what he had a mind to ſay, and then gave it to another to tranſlate into Greek. In peruſing the authors of both languages, his chief obſervation was what precepts and examples he might collect for the public or private inſtruction of his ſubjects and friends; when he thought any of them proper, he copied them word for word, and ſent them to his domeſtics, the governors of the provinces, or the magiſtrates of the city, as any of them wanted admonition; nay, ſometimes he read whole books to the ſenate, and recommended them afterwards to the people by proclamation. His generoſity to men of learning knew no bounds, and hence ſo many famous writers flouriſhed in his time, that the age of Auguſtus will ever be looked upon as the age of elegancy and politeneſs, and every admirer of the poets and hiſtorians, who flouriſhed in thoſe days, will be an admirer of Auguſtus, who was ſo generous to them, and is the chief ſubject of their panegyrics.

But his virtues were not without the allay of ſome vices highly unbecoming a perſon in his ſtation. He abandoned himſelf to all manner of lewdneſs, without renouncing even in his old age the vices of his youth: his ſevere laws againſt adultery were no check upon him, no more than the ſacred ties of friendſhip; for he did not ſpare the wife even of his own favourite, and faithful counſellor Mecænas. It was not extreme prudence in ſo great a politician to be daily violating his own laws, eſpecially after he had, by ſentencing thoſe to death, who were guilty of adultery, declared how heinous and unpardonable a crime he thought it. Marc Antony in one of his letters to him before they quarrelled, rallies him upon his intrigues with ſeveral married women of great diſtinction, whom he names. His friends to excuſe theſe ſcandalous practices, which were too notorious to be denied, pretended, that he courted the favour of the wives to diſcover by their means the plots and deſigns of their huſbands. He is ſaid to have divorced Scribonia for reſenting the authority of one of his concubines: as for Livia, ſhe out of policy indulged his vicious inclinations ſo far, as to make it her buſineſs to bring him acquainted with ſuch women as ſhe thought he might like: he employed many of his friends in the ſame vile miniſtry, which gave occaſion to ſeveral lampoons, and ſharp ſatires. Marc Antony reproached him with having gained the favour of his great uncle Julius Cæſar at the expence of his modeſty, and his brother Lucius Antonius charged him with abandoning himſelf, while he was in Spain, to the will of A. Hirtius, who was afterwards conſul, for three hundred thou-

ligence of his death. The better to ſupport this ſtory, when the tribune, according to the cuſtom of the army, acquainted Tiberius, that his commands were executed, he anſwered, that he had given no ſuch commands, and that he ſhould be anſwerable to the ſenate for what he had ſand ſeſterces; hence the people at a comedy not only interpreted to his diſhonour, but applauded the following expreſſion ſpoke of a prieſt of Cybele, playing upon his timbrel, as if it had been ſpoken of him, "Videſne ut cinædus orbem digito temperet? "Don't you ſee how the catamite governs the world with "one finger?" Some writers have alſo repreſented him as covetous of rich furniture, eſpecially of Corinthian veſſels; and tell us, that in the time of the proſcription the following paſquinade was writ under his ſtatue, "Pater argentarius, ego "Corinthiarius," that is, "My father dealt in money, and I "in Corinthian veſſels;" for it was ſuppoſed, that ſeveral perſons had been proſcribed for their plate, and that his father had been a banker, which laſt ſuppoſition was entirely groundleſs, for his father was raiſed very early to the higheſt honours in the republic. As for his immoderate deſire of rich furniture, Suetonius clears him from this imputation, by telling us, that the goods and furniture of his houſe, which were ſtill to be ſeen in his time, were not rich enough for a private perſon of any taſte, and adding, that at the taking of Alexandia, of all the queen's rich furniture, he reſerved for himſelf only a porcelain cup. He was given to gaming, and took great pleaſure in playing at dice, which gave occaſion to the following diſtich, which was made during the war in Sicily;

"Poſtquam bis claſſe victus naves perdidit,
"Aliquando ut vincat, ludit aſſidue aleam."

That is, "having loſt his fleet twice at ſea, he plays daily, that "he may at laſt win." But Suetonius tells us, that he played only for his diverſion, and not out of a deſire of winning his friends money; to this purpoſe he quotes one of his letters to Tiberius, wherein he tells him, that he had paſſed the feaſt of Minerva merrily, and played every day at dice; "Your brother," ſays he to Tiberius, "was at firſt a great loſer, but in the end "came off pretty well, having recovered himſelf beyond expecta"tion: I loſt twenty thouſand ſeſterces; but had I exacted what "was owing to me, or kept what I gave away, I ſhould have won a"bove fifty thouſand." He was naturally very ſuperſtitious, a great obſerver of dreams, and looked upon the flight or chattering of birds as infallible preſages. If in the morning his ſhoes were

had done. This alarmed Criſpus Salluſtius (G), who was privy to all the ſecret counſels of Tiberius, and had ſent the tribune the warrant: he knew it was equally dangerous to confeſs the truth, and charge the emperor, or to clear the emperor, and accuſe himſelf. In this perplexity he had recourſe to Livia, adviſing her "by no means to divulge the "ſecrets were given him wrong, or the right foot ſhoe preſented him for left, he counted it ominous. If it rained when he was ſetting out on a journey, he reckoned it a ſign of a ſpeedy and happy return: he would never begin a journey the day after the nundinæ, nor undertake any buſineſs of conſequence upon the nones; he was ſo afraid of thunder and lightning, that he carried a ſeal's ſkin always about him, imagining as was then generally believed, that it had we know not what ſecret virtue againſt thunder; but nevertheleſs, for his greater ſecurity, upon the leaſt apprehenſion of an extraordinary ſtorm, he uſed to ſeek for ſhelter in a vault or cellar under-ground.

Such were the virtues, ſuch the vices of the famous Auguſtus, As for his conduct during the civil war, it was ſuch as brought, we may ſay, diſgrace upon uſurpation itſelf. He ſtuck at no crime, however heinous; but after he had either by public proſcriptions, or private aſſaſſinations, cut off all thoſe who gave him umbrage, he reigned with moderation over the reſt. He reigned long, and eſtabliſhed a laſting peace, a great relief after ſo long and deſtructive a war. In this long tranquillity, the calamities which had been occaſioned by the war were forgot, and Auguſtus cried up as the author of the bleſſings they enjoyed in a profound peace at home. Beſides, the badneſs of his ſucceſſors was a ſignal advantage to his name and memory; for in proportion as they were deteſted, he was regretted.

(G) Criſpus Salluſtius was born of an equeſtrian family, great-nephew by a ſiſter to the famous hiſtorian Caius Salluſtius, and by him adopted; he might have riſen to the greateſt honours in the ſtate, but in imitation of Mecænas, whom he propoſed to himſelf for his pattern, he contented himſelf with the title of a Roman knight, though he excelled in power many, who had been diſtinguiſhed with conſulſhips and triumphs. In Mecænas's life-time he was next in favour with Auguſtus, and upon the death of that faithful counſellor, he became the chief confident, firſt of Auguſtus, and afterwards of Tiberius, who repoſed an entire confidence in him: he was extreme nice in his dreſs, expenſive in his manner of living, and no ways inferior in luxury and magnificence to Mecænas himſelf; but could, upon any exigency, exert a vigour equal to the greateſt affairs, which he concealed under the appearance of indolence and ſloth (62).

" ſecrets of the palace, the counſels of the miniſters, or the " ſervices of the ſoldiery, adding, that Tiberius ſhould be- " ware of weakening the ſovereign authority by referring all " things to the ſenate, the nature of abſolute power being " ſuch as could not be preſerved entire but in one perſon [s]."

Livia followed the advice of Salluſtius, and no farther mention was made of the murder of the young prince (H).

As ſoon as the death of Auguſtus was known at Rome, the conſuls, ſenators, and knights, ran headlong into ſlavery, as Tacitus expreſſes it. With ſervile flattery they took care to frame their faces ſo as to reconcile falſe joy for the acceſſion of Tiberius with feigned grief for the loſs of Auguſtus. The two conſuls Sextus Pompeius and Sextus Apuleius took firſt the oath of fidelity to Tiberius, and then adminiſtered it to the ſenate, the people and the ſoldiery; for Tiberius affected to derive all his authority from the conſuls and ſenate, as if the antient republic ſtill ſubſiſted, and he were yet in ſuſpenſe about accepting or rejecting the ſovereign power: he even owned in his edict for ſummoning the ſenate, that he iſſued it in virtue of the tribunitial power granted him under Auguſtus, and that he claimed no other authority, no other title for having a ſhare in the public adminiſtration. But notwithſtanding

Tiberius affects modeſty.

(H) Suetonius tells us, that Agrippa was killed by a military tribune, in whoſe cuſtody he was at that time, after he had read the warrant for his execution to him; which warrant, adds that writer, whether left by Auguſtus when he died, to prevent any troubles which might happen upon his death, or contrived by Livia in Auguſtus's name, with or without the privity of Tiberius, is a thing uncertain to this day (63). But Tacitus tells us in expreſs terms, that Auguſtus never dipt his hands in his own blood; neither does he think it credible, that he would barbarouſly ſacrifice the life of his grandſon to the ſecurity of his ſtep-ſon. It is therefore more probable, ſays that author, that this haſty murder was purely the work of Tiberius and Livia, and that the young prince fell thus untimely to ſatiate the hatred which Livia bore him, and to deliver Tiberius from a troubleſome rival. Though the aſſaſſin, who was charged with the execution of this cruel order, was a bold and reſolute centurion or tribune, as Suetonius calls him, and found young Agrippa unarmed, and little apprehending ſuch a deſtiny, yet it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he diſpatched him. In him ended the family of Auguſtus.

withſtanding this pretended modeſty, from the moment Auguſtus expired, he aſſumed all the prerogatives of an abſolute prince, gave the word to the prætorian cohorts, placed guards about his perſon, went guarded in the ſtreets, and to the ſenate, and writ letters to the ſeveral armies in the undiſguiſed ſtyle of one who was already maſter of the Roman empire, and had under his command all its forces. This he did to prevent the armies in diſtant provinces from declaring for Germanicus, who was then in Germany at the head of eight legions, and a great body of allies. But with the ſenate he proceeded in a quite different manner: when the conſcript fathers offered him the government, he pretended to refuſe it, though he had already ſecured it to himſelf, and with a great deal of artifice began to diſcourſe of the greatneſs of the Roman empire, and in modeſt terms of his own inſufficiency; telling them, "That the divine genius of Auguſtus alone "was equal to ſo great a charge; that as for himſelf, he "knew by experience, having borne part of Auguſtus's cares, "how many difficulties, contingencies and dangers are inſe-

"parably annexed to rule and ſovereignity; that ſince the "city was ſo happily repleniſhed with great numbers of il-"luſtrious patriots, they ought not to lay the whole burden "of the adminiſtration upon one perſon, but divide it among "many, &c." When he had ended his ſpeech, the ſenators, who dreaded nothing ſo much as to ſeem to underſtand him, burſt into tears, and throwing themſelves at his feet, embraced his knees, begging him in the moſt low and ſervile manner imaginable not to abandon them, but to take upon him a charge, to which none but himſelf was equal. Then Tiberius, pretending to yield to their importunity, "I am," ſaid he, "unequal to the weight of the whole government; "but if you think fit to intruſt me with any particular part, "whatever it be, I am ready to undertake it." Hereupon Aſinius Gallus (I) riſing up, "I beg to know, Cæſar," ſaid he,

(I) Aſinius Gallus was the ſon of the famous Aſinius Pollio, the favourite of Auguſtus, and great patron of learning, and men of latters. He had been conſul eleven years before, with Caius Marcius Cenſorinus, and had alſo borne the office of "triumvir "monetalis, or overſeer of the coinage," as appears from one of Auguſtus's medals with his legend on the reverſe, C. Aſinius Gallus III. vir. A. A. A. F. F. that is, "triumvir, auro, argento, "ære, flando, feriundo." At firſt the conſuls took upon themſelves the care of the mint, and joined two ſenators with them in this office; but afterwards the heads of the republic were eaſed of this

This unexpected demand startled Tiberius, who for a while stood mute; but recovering himself, answered, that "it ill "became his modesty to chuse or reject any particular branch "of the administration, when he desired to be excused from "the whole." Gallus, perceiving him offended, as readily replied, that he did not offer that question, as if he designed to divide what was in itself indivisible, but to convince him by his own confession, that the commonwealth was but one body, and consequently could not be governed but by the wisdom of one person: then continuing his speech, he made a long descant upon the great merits and accomplishments of Tiberius, of his many victories and conquests, of the civil employments he had long borne with great credit and reputation, &c. but this did not assuage the wrath of Tiberius, who had long hated Gallus for having married Vipsania Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, whom Tiberius had been obliged by Augustus to divorce, to make room for his daughter Julia. He suspected that Asinius Gallus by this match designed to raise himself above the rank of a subject, and therefore upon this new provokation resolved to seize the first opportunity of delivering himself from his fears by the death of his supposed rival. Lucius Arruntius (K), Quintus Haterius, and this trouble, and sometimes two, sometimes three, sometimes four persons were appointed to direct and inspect the coinage, and were called, according to their number, "duumviri, triumviri, "quatuorviri monetales, æris, argenti, auri flatores, (64). These magistrates are sometimes described on medals which were probably the current coin of the Romans, thus; "Cur. X. Fl." that is, "Curatores denariorum flandorum," and they were so called till the triumviri monetales were created. But to return to Asinius Gallus, Suetonius ascribes to him a small performance, containing a parallel or comparison of Cicero and his father Asinius Pollio, in which he gave the preference to the latter; in answer to this work, the emperor Claudius published a book, which he entited, "A defence of Cicero against the writings of Gallus."

(K) A. Lucius Arruntius was descended of an antient and noble family, endowed with extraordinary talents, possessed of great wealth, and in high favour with the people. Augustus was well acquainted with his abilities, and not long before his death, in a familiar conversation with his friends, declared his opinion of him; for the discourse turning upon the great men in Rome, who were equal and Mamercus Scaurus, incurred likewiſe on this occaſion the diſpleaſure of Tiberius; Arruntius by a ſpeech not much unlike that of Gallus; Hirtius, by aſking him, "How long, "Cæſar, will you ſuffer the commonwealth to remain deſti- "tute of a head?" and Scaurus for ſaying by way of raille- ry, "There is room to hope, that Tiberius will at length "yield to the entreaties and prayers of the ſenate, ſince he "has not oppoſed, as he might, in virtue of his tribunitial "power, the motion of the conſuls in his behalf." The ill-timed pleaſure, which theſe illuſtrious citizens took in ſhew- ing themſelves well appriſed of Tiberius's real intentions, coſt them dear; for he afterwards ſacrificed them all, under va- rious pretences, to his jealouſy and ſuſpicions. Some other ſenators ſpoke ſtill more boldly; and yet we do not find that Tiberius ever reſented the liberty they had taken; they were not in all likelihood, ſo conſiderable, either for their birth or talents, as to give him any umbrage. Of theſe one, no long- er able to bear the ambiguity of his anſwers, with which he held the ſenate in ſuſpence, who were all the while at his feet, cried out, "Let Tiberius either accept of the empire, "or declare in plain terms that he rejects it." Another boldly addreſſing him, "Other men," ſaid he, "perform "ſlowly what they readily promiſe; but you promiſe ſlowly "what you have already performed [t]." And indeed he reigned already, having, from the moment Auguſtus expired, aſſumed all the prerogatives of a ſovereign; but in this my- ſterious way of dealing with the ſenate, he had two things in view equal to the ſupreme power, and ſome naming Marcus Lepidus, others Aſinius Gallus, and ſome Lucius Arruntius; "Marcus Le- "pidus," replied Auguſtus, "is indeed capable of the ſupreme "power, but will not, in my opinion, accept of it; Aſinius Gal- "lus will aſpire at it, but is not qualified for it; As for Lucius "Arruntius, he is both equal to ſo great a charge and will not fail, "upon a proper occaſion, to ſeize it (65)." That he ſpoke thus of Lepidus and Aſinius is agreed on all hands, but ſome writers, quoted by Tacitus, inſtead of Arruntius name Cneius Piſo, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the courſe of this reign. All theſe great men, except Lepidus, were ſoon cut off by Tiberius's orders, being charged with various crimes feign- ed by him on purpoſe to get rid of all competitors to the ſove- reign power (66).

view; the first was to make the world believe that he had been by the commonwealth chosen, and called to the empire, which was more glorious for him than to owe it to the intrigues of a woman, or to the adoption of a superannuated prince; the second thing he had in view was to discover the designs and intentions of the great men, and by that means be able to distinguish his friends from his foes [u]. At length pretending to be overcome by the importunities of the conscript fathers, and complaining of the heavy burden they laid upon him, he began to yield by degrees to their request, and in the end accepted the government, but so as to give them hopes that he would one day resign it; his words were, "I accept the empire, and will hold it till such time as you, conscript fathers, in your great prudence shall think fit to give repose to my old age." Thus was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero (L), in the fifty-sixth year of his age, raised to the

(L) The Claudian family, of which Tiberius was descended, was one of the most illustrious families of Rome. They were originally of Regillum, a city of the Sabines, whence, according to some writers, they removed to Rome, in the time of Romulus, being invited thither by Titus Tatius, who reigned jointly with him, according to others, whom we have followed (67), in the fourth consulship of Poplicola, when they were brought to Rome by Actius Clausus, chief of the family, and received into the number of the patricians by the senate, who assigned them a certain portion of land beyond the Anio, and a burying place under the capitol. Actius Clausus, on his arrival at Rome, whither he came with five thousand families of his friends and dependents, changed his name to Appius Claudius, and was immediately admitted into the senate. In process of time the Claudian family was honoured with twenty-eight consulships, five dictatorships, seven censorships, six triumphs, and two ovations. They were distinguished among themselves by several names and surnames, but they agreed absolutely to renounce the name of Lucius, which was common in their family, two of that name having been condemned and executed, and to take the name of Nero in its stead, which in the Sabine languge signifies "strong" and "valiant." Of this family were the famous Appius Cæcus, Appius Claudius Caudex, Appius Claudius Nero, Appius Claudius, us, the decemvir, Appius Claudius Druſus, Appius Claudius Pulcher, of whom we have ſpoken at length in different places of this work. Of the ſame family were the two celebrated Claudiæ, one of whom diſengaged the veſſel, which was ſtranded at the mouth of the Tiber, and laden with the ſacred image and the utenſils of the great mother of the gods; the other was arraigned of high treaſon before the people, which had never happened before to any woman, for ſaying as ſh epaſſed in her chariot through the ſtreets which were much crowded, "I wiſh my brother Pulcher "were alive, that by loſing another ſea-fight, he might clear the "ſtreets of that throng, and make more room for my chariot:" for Claudius Pulcher, as we have related elſewhere (68), having engaged the Carthaginians at ſea contrary to the opinion of all his officers, was by them entirely defeated with the loſs of ninety galleys, and twenty-eight thouſand men, killed, drowned, or taken priſoners. P. Claudius, the declared enemy of Cicero, was likewiſe of this family; but in order to obtain the tribuneſhip, and by the power annexed to that office enable himſelf effectually to deſtroy the Roman orator, he renounced his nobility, and got himſelf adopted by a mean plebeian into a very low family. The reſt were all patricians, and had ever been the principal aſſertors of the power and dignity of that order. Tiberius was of the patrician family of the Claudii both by the father's ſide, who was deſcended from Tiberius Nero, the ſon of Appius Cæcus, and by the mother's, who was the daughter of Appius Pulcher, brother to the ſaid Tiberius Nero. He was alſo allied to the family of the Livii by the adoption of his mother's grandfather. The Livian family was indeed plebeian, but nevertheleſs honoured with eight conſulſhips, two cenſorſhips, one dictatorſhip, and three triumphs. To this family Rome was indebted for many citizens of great proweſs and renown, among whom we may well reckon Livius Salinator, and Livius Druſus; of Livius Salinator we have ſpoke elſewhere (69); as to Livius Druſus, he is ſaid to have killed in a ſingle combat a general of the enemy named Drauſus, and to have in memory of that exploit aſſumed and tranſmitted to his poſterity the name of Druſus. In his prætorſhip he recovered, according to ſome writers, and brought back the gold which had been given to the Senones, when they beſieged the capitol. The father of Tiberius, was quæſtor to Julius Cæſar, and commanded his fleet in the Alexandrian war; after which he was by the dictator rewarded for his eminent ſervices, and appointed firſt pontifex

TIBERIUS had no sooner accepted the empire, than the senators, to curry favour with their new sovereign, were for heaping extraordinary honours on his mother: some proposed decreeing her the general title of "mother," others that of "mother of her country," and almost all moved, that to the name of Tiberius should be added, "the "son of Livia." But Tiberius, jealous of his mother's glory, answered, that public honours ought to be conferred upon women warily, and with a sparing hand, adding, that he would use the same moderation in receiving the honours which should be offered to himself. He could not be prevailed upon to suffer so much as a lictor to be decreed her, tho' every vestal enjoyed that mark of distinction; nay, he prohibited the raising her an altar in memory of her late adoption into the Julian family, or paying her any honours of the like nature. Thus from the very beginning tifex in the room of Publius Scipio, and afterwards honoured with the command of the colonies which were sent into Gaul. However, when the dictator was slain, and most of the senators, apprehensive of new troubles, were for passing an act of oblivion, Tiberius, not thinking that enough, moved, that rewards might be bestowed on the tyrannicides. In the Perusian war he sided with Lucius Antonius against Octavianus, and though the rest abandoned Lucius, yet he could never be prevailed upon to forsake him; so that he was the only person who continued with him to the last. When the city of Perusia surrendered, he found means to make his escape first to Prænestе, and from thence into Campania, where he armed the slaves with a design to make a stand against Octavianus; but his undisciplined troops betaking themselves to flight at the approach of Octavianus's victorious legions, he was forced to shelter himself in Sicily, where he staid a very short time, being disgusted with Pompey, who neither deigned to admit him into his presence, nor would allow him to have the fasces carried before him, though the time of his prætorship was not yet expired. From Sicily he retired into Greece, where he was kindly received by Marc Antony, and entertained by him in a manner suitable to his rank, till a peace being concluded between Antony, Octavianus, and Pompey, and a general amnesty granted, he returned to Rome with the rest of the exiles; where Augustus, falling in love with his wife Livia Drusilla, obliged him to yield her to him, though she had already brought him children, among the rest Tiberius, and was then big with child. He died soon after, leaving behind him two sons, Tiberius and Drusus, surnamed Nero's, as we have related above.

of his reign, he requited with the utmoſt ingratitude the infinite obligations he owed to his mother, being aſhamed, as

Some authors have written, that Tiberius was born at Fundi, a city of the Auſones between Terracina and Formia; but the moſt credible writers aſſure us, that he was born at Rome on mount Palatine, the ſixteenth day before the calends of December, M. Æmilius Lepidus being conſul the ſecond time with L. Munatius Plancus. In his infancy he ſuffered great hardſhips, and was expoſed to frequent dangers, his parents having taken him along with them in their flight and exile; nay, his mother Livia, in their painful journeys round Sicily and Greece, is ſaid to have carried him great part of the way in her arms, her huſband being abandoned by all his friends, and even his domeſtics, on account of his ſteady adherence to the republican party. Some time after his return to Rome one M. Gallius, a ſenator, adopted him by his laſt will, and appointed him his heir: Tiberius accepted of the eſtate, but declined aſſuming the name of his benefactor, becauſe he had been formerly a zealous ſtickler for the republican party. He made a funeral oration for his father, when he was but nine years old, which was received with great applauſe. In Auguſtus's triumph for his victory over Antony at Actium, he attended him on horſe-back with Marcellus the ſon of Octavia. He afterwards commanded the young noblemen in the Trojan ſolemnities, or turnament called Troy, which were celebrated in the circus, preſided in the Actiac games, inſtituted in memory of Auguſtus's victory at Actium, and exhibited ſeveral combats of gladiators in honour of his father Tiberius, and grandfather Druſus, in one of which he engaged with three hundred thouſand ſeſterces, ſome of the rudiarii,, or gladiators who had been diſcharged and exempted from fighting, to return to the arena. He entertained the people with ſeveral other magnificent ſhews, partly at the expence of his mother, and partly of his father-in-law. His firſt wife was Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, and grand-daughter of the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, by whom he had his ſon Druſus; but though ſhe was with child again, he was obliged much againſt his will to divorce her, and marry Julia, the daughter of Auguſtus, by whom he had one ſon, who died while he was yet an infant. Julia had, in her firſt huſband's life-time, expreſſed a great paſſion for Tiberius; but after their marriage ſhe deſpiſed him, and was, as it is commonly believed, with her ſcandalous and lewd life, the chief cauſe of his ſudden retreat to Rhodes.

He firſt ſerved under Auguſtus in quality of military tribune in the Cantabrian war; ſome time after he was appointed commander as was commonly believed, to acknowledge himself indebted for the empire to the intrigues of a woman [w]. He proved a no less cruel husband, than an undutiful son. Julia had been long since banished by her father into the island of Pandataria on account of her scandalous lewdness, and from thence some years after removed to the city of Rhegium on the streights of Sicily, where she suffered a less painful exile. Tiberius in Augustus's life-time had shewn great tenderness and compassion for his unhappy wife, and often solicited the prince to recall her, and reinstate her in his favour. But he was no sooner declared emperor, than he stopt the small pension which her father paid her yearly for her support; so that the unfortunate princess, after a long series of miseries, died of want in the fifteenth year of her banishment [x] (M). mander in chief of the army which was sent into Armenia to place Tigranes on that throne. On his return from that expedition Augustus raised him to the prætorship, and took him with him into Gaul, whence he sent him against the Rhœtians and Vindelicians, whom he conquered, reducing their country to a Roman province, as we have related above. He was no less successful in his expeditions against the Pannonians and Germans, whom he obliged to sue for peace. Augustus rewarded his victories with a triumph, which he obtained in his second consulship. But in the height of his glory he left Rome, and retired to Rhodes, whence after seven years banishment, as we may call it, he was allowed to return to Rome, reinstated in the favour of Augustus by the interest of his mother Livia, appointed to command the armies in Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Illyricum, made in some degree partner of the empire with Augustus, and in his last will named his chief heir (70).

(M) Augustus had confined her only to the city of Rhegium, but Tiberius would not allow her the liberty of going out of the house in which she lodged, nor suffer any of the inhabitants to converse with her, or come near her. He deprived her, according to Suetonius (71), of the small pension which chus, one of her chief favourites, was by Tiberius's orders put to death in the iſland of Cercina, to which he had been confined by Auguſtus. He was deſcended of one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, had a lively wit, great eloquence, and an engaging addreſs and behaviour. With theſe parts he had captivated the heart of Julia, and debauched her while ſhe was yet Agrippa's wife; neither did he break off his intrigues with her, after ſhe was married to Tiberius; nay, he is ſuppoſed to have inſpired her with contempt and averſion for her new huſband, and to have dictated the letters, which ſhe wrote to her father, full of bitterneſs againſt Tiberius, and painting him in the moſt odious colours. He had therefore been baniſhed by Auguſtus to the iſland of Cercina, where he had ſuffered great miſeries for fourteen years. But Tiberius, not judging baniſhment an adequate puniſhment for the injuries Sempronius had done him, ſent, or ordered Lucius Aſprenas, proconſul of Africa, to ſend, a band of aſſaſſins to diſpatch him. Theſe upon their landing found the unhappy exile on the ſhore, who, without betraying any fear or ſurprize, went to meet them, and entreat them, being well appriſed of their deſign, to ſuſpend the execution of Cæſar's orders, till he wrote a letter to his wife Alliaria, to acquaint her with his laſt will; which he had no ſooner done, than he offered his neck to the ſword of the aſſaſſins with a conſtancy and intrepidity worthy of the Sempronian name, though he had in his lifetime ſhamefully degenerated from the glory of his anceſtors. Some authors have written, that the aſſaſſins were not ſent directly from Rome, but from Africa, the crafty tyrant having committed the execution of his orders to Lucius Aſprenas, governor of that province, in order to ſcreen himſelf by that means from the imputation of putting to death an which Auguſtus had allowed her for her maintenance, under pretence of an exact and religious obſervance of the laſt will of her father, in which no mention was made of her. But Dion Caſſius tells us (72), that he left her a ſmall legacy, though he ordained, that neither ſhe nor her daughter ſhould be laid in his mauſoleum; and Tacitus ſays, that he cauſed her to periſh with want, ſuppoſing that her tragical death, as ſhe was at a good diſtance from Rome, would remain concealed (73).

an illuſtrious citizen of Rome, whom his father Auguſtus had only condemned to baniſhment, and caſt the odium of ſuch an action on Aſprenas [y]. But Tiberius's principal care in the beginning of his reign was to engage in his intereſt his nephew Germanicus, who, on account of his extraordinary parts, and ſweet temper, was equally adored by the people and ſoldiery. In order to this, though he hated Germanicus in his heart, yet pretending a tender affection for him, after he had forbid the ſenate to confer any particular honours on Livia, he recommended to them his nephew, and even aſked for him the proconſular power; which being granted, he immediately diſpatched into Germany perſons of the firſt rank to acquaint him therewith, and condole with him in his name for the death of Auguſtus [z] (N). He then named twelve candidates for the prætorſhip, among whom were Velleius Paterculus the hiſtorian, and his brother; the ſenate deſired him to appoint more, but as that number had been ſettled by Auguſtus, he not only refuſed to comply with their requeſt, but bound himſelf by an oath never to depart from the regulations of his predeceſſor. The people had hitherto enjoyed the privilege of creating magiſtrates, or at leaſt ſhared it with the emperor, one half of the magiſtrates being named by him, and the other by the tribes, aſſembled in the field of Mars (O); but Tiberius in the firſt elections, deprived them of their antient rights, and transferred them to the ſenate: the people complained of this innovation, but no diſturbances enſued, the ſenate being well pleaſed with the change, ſince by it they were delivered

(N) Germanicus had been inveſted with the proconſular power three years before by Auguſtus, as Dion informs us; the power therefore, which was now conferred upon him at the requeſt of Tiberius, was, no doubt, a confirmation of the proconſular authority for his life, ſuch as had been formerly granted to Auguſtus. In virtue of this new dignity, Germanicus had an almoſt abſolute authority over all the Roman forces both in the provinces and the city, and was every-where to be acknowledged as commander in chief, and under Tiberius generaliſſimo of the empire.

(O) Suetonius tells us that "Julius Cæſar ſhared the power of "creating magiſtrates with the people, except in the election "of conſuls," one half of the magiſtrates being declared by them

The army in Pannonia mutinies.

TIBERIUS had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the ſovereign power, or, as we may well call it, the throne, when news was brought him, that the armies in Pannonia and Germany had mutinied. In Pannonia three legions, viz. the eighth, the ninth, and the thirteenth, being allowed by their general Julius Bloeſus a relaxation for ſome days from their uſual duties, either to mourn, according to the Roman cuſtom, for the death of Auguſtus, or to rejoice for the acceſſion of Tiberius, they grew wanton, quarrelſome and turbulent, began to hearken to ſeditious diſcourſes, to be fond of an eaſy and idle life, and to have an utter averſion to the toils and diſcipline of the camp. They were headed and inflamed by one Percennius, a common ſoldier, who, before he

them, and the other by himſelf, which he ſignified by billets ſent to the tribes in theſe words; "I recommend ſuch or ſuch "a perſon to you, that by your ſuffrage he may be admitted "into ſuch or ſuch an office (74)." The ſame writer in the life of Auguſtus informs us, that he reſtored to the aſſemblies of the people the antient rights, having firſt enacted ſevere laws againſt all ſorts of bribery, and corrupt acquiſition of offices. But whether Suetonius by antient rights meant thoſe which the people enjoyed in the times of liberty, or only the privilege of chuſing one half of the migiſtrates, which they were allowed in the dictatorſhip of Cæſar, and afterwards deprived of during the triumvirate, is matter of diſpute among the learned (75). As to the conſuls, they were both named by Cæſar the dictator, and afterwards by Auguſtus, at leaſt in the firſt years of his reign. Dion ſeems to inſinuate, that Tiberius named the conſuls himſelf, but allowed the ſenate to chuſe the other magiſtrates, reſerving to himſelf the recommendation of ſome who were to be elected without oppoſition: on the other hand, Tacitus tells us, that as to the conſular elections, he can ſcarce affirm any thing, there being in this particular a great diſagreement among the hiſtorians of thoſe times, and a ſeeming contradiction in the ſpeeches of Tiberius himſelf, always reſerved, always myſterious (76).

he ſerved in the army, had made it his whole buſineſs to raiſe diſturbances, and form parties in the theatres and playhouſes to hiſs or applaud ſuch players as he diſliked or favoured (P). As he had by this practice acquired a notable talent in ſpeaking to a crowd, and inflaming the mob, in the duſk of the evening, when thoſe whom he diſtruſted were withdrawn to their tents, he uſed to aſſemble the moſt turbulent, ſtir them up to mutiny, inflame them againſt their officers, and encourage them to lay hold of the preſent occaſion, while the emperor's authority was yet wavering, to prevail upon him either by force or entreaties to redreſs their grievances. " How long," ſaid he, " ſhall we obey, " like ſlaves, a few centurions and tribunes? When ſhall " we have courage enough to demand a redreſs of our " grievances, if we let ſlip the preſent opportunity? What " hinders us from laying our complaints before the new " emperor, and obliging him either by our prayers or " menaces to liſten to them? Are we doomed to be for " ever miſerable? Percennius inflames them.

(P) In the circus and theatres there were in the Roman times parties and factions, ſome favouring one actor, and ſome another: the oppoſite parties often came to blows; nay, much blood was ſometimes ſhed in thoſe frays. Suetonius tells us, that the emperor Nero took great pleaſure in theſe theatrical battles; and that being conveyed in his litter into the theatre, he not only beheld from the upper part of the proſcenium the oppoſite parties quarrelling about the players, but ſet them together by the ears; and when they were engaged, took great delight in throwing ſtones, and pieces of broken benches, among the crowd, with which he once wounded a prætor in the head (77).

(Q) In the times of the republic thoſe were called veterans, who had ſerved twenty years, after which they were diſcharged, and allowed to retire, if they pleaſed, as Suidas informs us; this diſcharge was called Miſſio. But under the emperors the veterans, that is, thoſe who had ſerved twenty years, were ſtill kept in the camp till they received the rewards which were due to them

Under the name of lands we ſhall be doomed " to drain bogs and marſhes, or to till barren mountains " in countries far remote from our native ſoil. Could " our pay afford us a comfortable ſubſiſtence, we ſhould " not have ſo much reaſon to complain of the poorneſs of " our rewards. But our perſons and lives are valued on- " ly at ten aſſes a day, and out of this we muſt buy " cloaths, tents, and arms; out of this we muſt bribe our " cruel centurions, and redeem ourſelves from their blows: " for ſo poor a price we muſt patiently ſuffer ſtripes, " wounds, hard winters, laborious ſummers, bloody wars, " or a barren peace. them on account of their paſt ſervices, and in the mean time were exempted from all manner of drudgery, and only obliged to fight. This diſcharge or exemption from military toils was called by the antients exauctoratio, which we muſt carefully diſtinguiſh from what they called Miſſio; for after the former they often continued many years under their colours, whereas the latter was an abſolute diſcharge granted to them after they had received their rewards. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius very rarely diſcharged his veterans, that he might be a gainer by their death (78); for the rewards due to them were not paid to their heirs. The ſame writer informs us, that Caligula in reviewing his army diſcharged ſeveral centurions, who had very near ſerved their time, under pretence that they were too old, and unfit for the ſervice (79). Thus ſome of the emperors declined diſcharging their ſoldiers after they had ſerved their time, and others diſcharged them before; all with the ſame view, to defraud them of their rewards.

(R) The Roman denarius was a piece of ſilver firſt coined in the year of Rome 484, Q. Ogulnius Gallus and Q. Fabius Pictor being conſuls. It was at firſt worth ten aſſes, and therefore marked with the numeral letter X. It underwent in proceſs of time many changes and reductions; but in the age we are now writing of, it was valued at ſixteen aſſes, and hence the mutineers

" ſixteen years be the utmoſt term of ſerving; that when " this time is expired, we be no longer kept under the " colours, but have our rewards paid us in ready money " in the camp where we earned it. Do the prætorian " cohorts, who receive two denarii a day, and are diſ- " charged after ſixteen years ſervice, undergo greater " dangers than we? I do not mean to detract from the " merit of the city guards, but only ſay, that we are " placed in the midſt of barbarous nations, and cannot " look out of our camp without ſeeing the enemy." This harangue was received with great applauſe by the enraged multitude: ſome of them immediately propoſed the incorporating of the three legions into one; but every one claiming for his own legion the prerogative of denominating the other two, this project was defeated; however, they agreed to place the three eagles of the legions with the ſtandards of the cohorts all together, and to raiſe with turf a tribunal, according to the Roman cuſtom (S), for the new neers demanded, that their pay might be raiſed from ten aſſes to a denarius. Lipſius in his notes upon Tacitus pretends, that the denarius at this time was worth twelve aſſes only; but that he was therein miſtaken, is manifeſt from Gronovius's learned obſervations on the money of the antients (100). The ſoldiers pay was at firſt five aſſes a day; but it was afterwards, at what time preciſely we know not, raiſed to ten. Out of theſe ten aſſes they were to buy cloaths, tents and arms, as is manifeſt from this paſſage of Tacitus, contrary to the law publiſhed by Gracchus, enacting, that the ſoldiers ſhould be ſupplied with arms, cloaths, tents, &c. at the public expence. This law was probably revoked, when their pay was encreaſed; but nevertheleſs, ſome of the ſucceeding emperors cloathed their ſoldiers at the expence of the public, namely Alexander Severus, who, as Ælius Lampridius tells us in the life of that emperor, " gave his ſoldiers ſhoes, boots, breeches, coats and cloaks."

(S) The tribunal, from whence the emperors uſed to harangue their troops, was ſtill, nay, and many ages after, raiſed with turf. Flavius Vopiſcus, ſpeaking of the elevation of the emperor Probus, " The whole army," ſays he, " cried out unanimouſly, Probus! we ſalute Probus our ſovereign. The " gods ſave you! Then they erected a tribunal of turf, and pro- " claimed

new general they deſigned to chuſe. While they were thus buſy, Bloeſus arrived; and having ſeverely rebuked ſome, and threatened others, "Dip your hands rather in "my blood" he cried with a loud voice to all; "for to "murder your general will be a leſs crime than to revolt "from your prince; for I am determined, if I fall not by "your hands, to keep you in your obedience; if you "think fit to murder me, I hope at the ſight of my "blood you will repent of your crime, and return to your "duty." This diſcourſe did not affect the mutinous ſoldiery, who continued their work, till it was breaſt-high, when at length, being overcome by the conſtancy and intrepidity of their general, they forbore. When their fury was ſomewhat aſſuaged, Bloeſus, who was an able ſpeaker, remonſtrated to them, that ſedition and mutiny were not the proper means of conveying their claims to the emperor, that their demands were new and extraordinary, ſuch as no armies had in former times made to their generals, nor they themſelves to the deified Auguſtus; beſides, that they were ill-timed, ſince princes in the beginning of their government are taken up and embaraſſed with various cares. However, if they expected to gain in peace what the conquerors, even after the civil wars, had never had the confidence to demand, why ſhould they uſe violence, and trample upon the rules of military diſcipline? that they might appoint deputies, and in his preſence give them their inſtructions. At theſe words they all cried out with one voice, that they were willing to ſend deputies; and that the ſon of Bloeſus, who was a tribune, ſhould be immediately diſpatched to the emperor to demand in their name, that they might be abſolutely diſcharged after ſixteen years ſervice; they added, that when he had obtained this, they would truſt him with their further pretenſions.

This cuſtom obtained likewiſe among foreign nations, eſpecially in Britain, as Xiphilinus informs us, who, in ſpeaking of the famous queen Boadicia, ſays, that "ſhe aſcended a tribunal reared with turf after the Roman "manner." Frequent mention is made of theſe tribunals by the antient poets (1).

In the mean time, ſome manipuli or companies, which had been ſent, before the ſedition, to Nauportum (T), to mend the roads, being informed of the tumult in the camp, plucked up their ſtandards, and falling upon the neighbouring villages, plundered them, and Nauportum itſelf. The centurions endeavoured to reſtrain their violence, but the mutineers, inſtead of liſtening to their remonſtrances, or betraying any fear at their menaces, firſt derided them, afterwards abuſed them with moſt outrageous language, and at length came to blows. They were chiefly incenſed againſt Aufidienus Rufus, who, as he had been long a common ſoldier, and had raiſed himſelf by his courage and bravery to the poſt of præfectus caſtrorum (U), was a ſevere

(T) Nauportum was a city of Upper Pannonia, and is placed by Strabo, who calls it Naupontus, in the country of the Tauriſci, three hundred and fifty furlongs from Aquileia. It was ſo called from the river Nauportus, on which it ſtood (2). Cluverius is of opinion, that Nauportum ſtood on the ſpot where the preſent city of Oberlauback in Carniola was afterwards built.

(U) This was, without all doubt, a new office, inſtituted probably by Auguſtus; for no mention is made of the præfectus caſtrorum by any author, who wrote in the times of the republic. It was his province to pitch upon the ground for encamping, and lay it out, to diſtribute the quarters and pavilions, and to direct the workmen in raiſing the ramparts, digging the ditches, &c. He had alſo under his care all the military engines, carriages, and iron tools belonging to the army (3). Each legion had a præfectus caſtrorum, at leaſt when they encamped ſeparately; for Tacitus, ſpeaking of one Pœnius Poſthumius, calls him "præfectus caſtrorum ſecundæ legionis (4)." The ſame writer ſeems to place them in rank above the tribunes; for in deſcribing Vitellius's entry into Rome, he tells us, that before their ſeveral eagles marched firſt, the præfecti caſtrorum, next to them the tribunes, and after the tribunes the chief centurions (5). Veſpaſius Pollio, the grand-father of the emperor Veſpaſian, was præfectus caſtrorum. But we muſt not on that account confound, as a modern writer has done whom Lipſius confutes, the præfectus caſtrorum with the præfectus prætorii, an officer of a much ſuperior rank.

ſevere obſerver of the primitive diſcipline, which he exacted from others with the more rigor, as he had himſelf borne with patience the hardſhips attending it. Upon him the furious multitude firſt vented their rage; they dragged him from his chariot, loaded him with baggage, and driving him before the firſt ranks, aſked him by way of inſult, how he liked ſuch burdens? how ſuch marches? Upon the arrival of theſe mutinous companies in the camp, the ſedition broke out anew with more fury than ever; the ſeditious, caſting off all obedience, roved about the country without controul, ravaging it on all ſides. Upon their return, Blœſus, who was ſtill obeyed by the centurions, and the legionaries of any reputation, cauſed thoſe, who were moſt loaded with plunder, to be beaten with rods, and caſt into priſon (W). But the furious multitude, flying to the relief of the criminals, reſcued them out of the hands of the lictors, and, breaking open the priſon, ſet all the priſoners at liberty. After ſo bold an attempt the mutineers grew more outragous, and the mutiny more general. One Vibulenus, a common ſoldier, being raiſed on the ſhoulders of his comrades, before the tribunal of Blœſus, addreſſed thoſe who had delivered the priſoners, thus:

The mutineers fall upon Rufus.

They are ſtirred up by Vibulenus.

"I cannot ſufficiently commend the zeal you have "ſhewn for theſe innocent and unhappy ſufferers: you have "reſtored to them their liberty: but who will reſtore life "to my brother? who my brother to me? (W) From this paſſage it is manifeſt, that the Romans built priſons in their camp, and alſo from the following lines of Juvenal:

"Inde fides arti, ſonuit ſi dextera ferro
"Lævaque, ſi longe caſtrorum in carcere manſit (6).

" tertains and arms for our deſtruction." Then turning to Blœſus, " Tell me, Blœſus," ſaid he, " where have you " thrown his mangled body? Even the moſt cruel enemies " do not deny burial to the ſlain. When I ſhall have " ſatisfied my grief with a thouſand kiſſes, and a flood of " tears, command me alſo to be maſſacred, that our " fellow-ſoldiers may bury my brother and me together, " both inhumanly murdered for conſulting the common " good of the legions." When Vibulenus had ended his ſpeech, he threw himſelf at the feet of his companions, and beating his breaſt, tearing his face, and ſhewing all the ſymptoms of the deepeſt ſorrow, he endeavoured to raiſe at the ſame time pity and fury in the minds of the multitude, and indeed with good ſucceſs; for they fell immediately upon Blœſus's gladiators and domeſtics, and having bound them, diſperſed themſelves about the camp and the neighbouring fields in queſt of the ſuppoſed corſe, which if they had found, Blœſus himſelf would have been in great danger; but as they could find no corſe, and it manifeſtly appeared from the depoſitions of Blœſus's ſlaves upon the rack, and of other credible witneſſes, that the whole was a calumny maliciouſly invented, and that Vibulenus never had any brother, they ſpared their general; but nevertheleſs in the height of their rage, fell upon the præfectus caſtrorum, and the tribunes, drove them out of the camp, and plundered their baggage: they put to death the centurion Lucilius, whom they hated above all the reſt on account of his ſeverity, and had by way of ſarcaſm nicknamed " Cedo alteram, Reach me another," becauſe when he had broke one rod, or vine-twig, which was made uſe of on ſuch occaſions, upon the back of a ſoldier, he was wont to call for another, and then a third (Y). The other charge for the public ſhews. We muſt not therefore imagine, that the gladiators mentioned in this place were liſted in the legions: they belonged to the general, and not to the army.

(Y) We have another inſtance of a nick-name made up of different words in the life of the emperor Aurelian wrote by Flavius Vopiſcus, who tells us, that there being two Aurelians in the army, and both tribunes at the ſame time, the ſoldiers uſed by way of diſtinction to call the Aurelian who was afterwards emperor, " Aurelianus Manu ad ferrum," becauſe he was on all occaſions ready to draw his ſword.

other centurions withdrew, and abſconded, all except Julius Clemens, whom, as he was a man of parts, the mutineers detained with a deſign to commit the management of their affairs to him. Another centurion, nicknamed Sirpicus (Z), had like to have occaſioned a bloody quarrel between the eighth and fifteenth legion, the former inſiſting upon his being put to death, and the latter protecting him; but the ninth legion, what with entreaties, what with menaces, compoſed the difference [b].

Druſus ſent to quell the tumult.

TIBERIUS no ſooner received intelligence of this mutiny, than he diſpatched his ſon Druſus to the rebellious legions at the head of two prætorian cohorts, the prætorian horſe, and the main body of the German horſe, at this time the emperor's guards (A). The prætorian cohorts were on this occaſion reinforced with an extraordinary addition of choſen men. Among the perſons of diſtinction who were ordered to attend and aſſiſt Druſus in bringing back the revolted legions to their duty, were Cneius Lentulus, an officer of great fame and experience, and Ælius Sejanus, who had been lately joined with his father Strabo in the commiſſion of præfectus prætorii, that is, in the command of the prætorian guards (B). Sejanus was appointed

[b] Tacit. annal. l. i. c. 16----30.

(Z) The word Sirpicus may be derived from the antient verb Sirpare, which ſignifies "to blind," and is uſed in that ſignification by Varro (7). The centurion was perhaps called Sirpicus, becauſe he had frequently in his mouth that obſolete verb: perhaps becauſe he kept the ſoldiers to their duty with great ſeverity, and cauſed them to be bound and caſt into priſon for the leaſt breach of military diſcipline.

(A) Suetonius tells us, that Auguſtus, after the defeat of Varus, who was cut off with three legions in Germany, diſbanded all his German guards (8). But Tiberius, it ſeems, ſet that corps on foot again, in the very beginning of his reign.

(B) The præfectus prætorii was the chief commander of the emperor's guards called Prætorians from the Latin word Prætorium, which at firſt ſignified the general's quarters in the camp, the

ed governor to the young prince; and as his credit with the emperor was known to be great, it was hoped he might either with promiſes or entreaties bring the ſeditious to a ſenſe of their duty. When news was brought to the camp that Druſus approached, the legions in token of reſpect marched out to meet him, not with their uſual gaiety and ſhouts of joy, but in ſullen ſilence, diſplaying in their countenances marks of ſadneſs mixed with fierceneſs and rage. As ſoon as Druſus entered the camp, he placed guards at all the gates and parties under arms in ſeveral quarters to be ready againſt any ſurprize. Druſus immediately aſcended the tribunal, and having made a ſign with his hand to the crowds that ſurrounded it to be ſilent, he read to them his father's letter; the ſubſtance of which was, that he would take a particular care of the brave legions with whom he had ſucceſsfully carried on ſo many wars; that as ſoon as his grief was allayed, he would treat with the ſenate about their demands; that, in the mean time, he had ſent them his ſon, and impowered him to make them forthwith ſuch conceſſions as could be made without further conſultation; but as to other demands, they were to be referred to the ſenate, whom he would not by any means deprive of the right of diſtributing rewards and puniſhments. When Druſus had read his father's letter, the aſſembly appointed the centurion Julius Clemens to be their ſpeaker; who accordingly began with propoſing to Druſus their demands, which were, that they ſhould be diſcharged after ſixteen years ſervice; that they ſhould upon that diſcharge receive the rewards which they claimed; that their pay ſhould be the word prætor being in the firſt ages of the republic common to all magiſtrates, whether civil or military. In the times of the emperors, by prætorium was meant the emperor's quarters in the camp, and his houſe in the city: hence in prætorium accipi, is to be liſted among the prætorium ſoldiers, or the emperor's guards (9). Auguſtus was the firſt, as Dion informs us (10), who gave the title of præfectus prætorii to the chief officer of his guards. The præfecti prætorii under Conſtantine the Great, and his ſucceſſors, were the firſt officers of the empire, and had quite different functions from thoſe of the præfecti prætorii appointed by Auguſtus.

be encreaſed to a Roman denarius, and that the veterans ſhould be no longer detained under their enſigns. To theſe demands Druſus anſwered, that they exceeded his power, and therefore ought to be laid before the ſenate and his father. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when the multitude cried out with one voice, "To what end then are you come, ſince "you can neither encreaſe our pay, nor redreſs our griev-"ances? Every officer is allowed to puniſh us with blows, "and even death; and the ſon of the emperor has not pow-"er to relieve us by one beneficent action! Druſus, we find, "has already attained to a great perfection in the arts and "policy of his father, who to fruſtrate the requeſts of the "ſoldiers, uſed to refer all to Auguſtus. It is ſurpriſing, "that the emperor ſhould take upon himſelf the command "and whole direction of the army, and at the ſame time "refer the ſoldiery to the ſenate for their rewards! Why "ſhould he not in like manner conſult the ſenate, when a "battle is to be fought, or a ſoldier to be puniſhed? Are "puniſhments to be inflicted without any controul or reſtraint, "and rewards not beſtowed without the conſent and appro-"bation of many?" Having thus ſpoke, they left the tribunal, threatening and inſulting all thoſe they met belonging to Druſus, either as friends or guards, in order to pick a quarrel with them and have ſome pretence to fall upon them ſword in hand. They were chiefly enraged againſt Cneius Lentulus, who, they ſuſpected, had hardened the young prince againſt their complaints, and encouraged him to deſpiſe the menaces of the ſoldiery. Of this Lentulus was well appriſed, and therefore reſolved, before their fury broke out, to quit the camp, and return to his winter quarters. But as he was departing, the mutineers ſurrounding him, aſked, whither he went? to the emperor or ſenate, to oppoſe their advantages with them as he had done in the camp with Druſus? Theſe words were followed with a ſhower of ſtones, and he had been ſoon diſpatched, had not the troops that attended Druſus, who was with him, reſcued him already covered with wounds and blood. As the enraged multitude ſeemed now determined to keep no meaſures, Druſus was under dreadful apprehenſions of the following night, which every one believed would prove fatal to many, perhaps to Druſus himſelf. But it happened quite otherwiſe. Ignorance and ſuperſtition that very night put an end to the revolt, reſtored calm to the alarmed camp, and quieted the minds of the ſoldiery, diery, after they had ſo long continued deaf to reaſon, and trampled upon all the laws of military diſcipline. The moon all on a ſudden began to darken in the midſt of a clear ſky, till ſhe was by degrees totally eclipſed (C). The ſoldiery, ignorant of the natural cauſes of this phænomenon, and imagining that the gods were angry with them on account of their revolt, and the crimes attending it, began to ſhew ſome ſigns of repentance. Druſus did not fail to improve this their diſpoſition; he immediately ſent the centurion Julius Clemens, and other officers and ſoldiers, in whom he could confide, to mix with the mutineers, and try whether they could, while they were thus alarmed, inſpire them with a love of their duty. Theſe, purſuant to the prince's orders, going round from tent to tent, and inſinuating themſelves everywhere, firſt prevailed upon the legionaries to abandon the veterans, and the three legions to ſeparate. After this the love of duty and obedience returning by degrees, thoſe who guarded the gates to keep Druſus, as it were, beſieged, retired from their poſts: the eagles and other enſigns, which, in the beginning of the tumult, had been thrown together, were carried back each to it's proper place; and, after ſo dreadful a ſtorm, calm and tranquillity reſtored to every quarter of the camp.

They are frightened by an eclipſe of the moon, and return to their duty.

EARLY next morning, Druſus, having ſummoned an aſſembly, aſcended the tribunal, and though unſkilled in ſpeaking, yet with an haughtineſs natural to the Claudian family, inveighed againſt their paſt, and commended their preſent, behaviour. After this great debates aroſe in his council, ſome adviſing him to ſuſpend all proceedings till the return of the deputies, whom he had allowed them to ſend with their petitions to Tiberius, while others were for immediately condemning and executing the ring-leaders of the ſedition. Druſus, as he was naturally inclined to ſeverity, followed the advice of the latter; and having ſummoned Vibulenus and Percennius before his tribunal, he condemned them, and cauſed them immediately to be executed. Some writers ſay, that they were privately executed, and buried in Druſus's tent; others, that their bodies were ignominiouſly thrown over the entrenchments to ſtrike terror into the reſt. The other ring-leaders of the ſedition were diſcovered ſculking about the camp, and either ſlain by the centurions and prætorian rian guards, or delivered up to Druſus by their comrades as a proof of their ſincere repentance. After this they were terrified anew with dreadful ſtorms, and ſuch violent rains, that they could not ſtir out of their tents; which they looking upon as ſent by the angry gods, reſolved to abandon a camp, which they had polluted with ſo many crimes, and return to their ſeveral garriſons. Accordingly the eighth legion departed firſt, and then the fifteenth, though earneſtly preſſed by the ninth to wait till the return of their deputies; at length the ninth likewiſe, their courage failing them after they were deſerted by the other two, abandoned the camp, and quietly followed them. Druſus, ſeeing tranquillity thus reſtored, returned to Rome to acquaint Tiberius with the ſucceſs of his negotiations, which indeed was more owing to chance than his addreſs [c].

The legions in Germany revolt.

ALMOST at the ſame time, and for the ſame cauſes, the legions in Germany revolted with far greater fury, as they were far more numerous. On the Rhine were quartered two armies, the one called the "Upper," commanded by Caius Silius, the other the "Lower," by Aulus Cæcina; but the chief command of both was veſted in Germanicus, who was then buſy in collecting the tribute in Gaul. The legions under Silius, however diſcontented, waited for the ſucceſs of the revolt, which the "Lower" army had begun. The latter, conſiſting of four legions, viz. the firſt, the fifth, the twentieth, and the one and twentieth, were encamped on the borders of the Ubii (D); where they no ſooner received

[c] Idem ibid.

(D) The Ubii in Cæſar's time dwelt on the other ſide of the Rhine, as is manifeſt from his commentaries, where he ſpeaks of them thus: "The country of the Suevi is bounded on the other "ſide by that of the Ubii, who poſſeſs a large and flouriſhing "city, and are a people far more polite than the other Germans, "becauſe lying nearer the Rhine, they have more commerce "with merchants, and converſation with the Gauls; with theſe "the Suevi had many diputes; and tho' the Ubii were ſo experi-"enced ſoldiers, ſo powerful and ſo numerous a people, that they "could not expel them the country, yet they made them their "tributaries, and reduced them to a very low condition (11)." And elſewhere, "The Ubii", ſays he, "the only people on the "other ſide of the Rhine, who had ſent embaſſadors to Cæſar, "had ceived the news of Auguſtus's death, than the recruits lately raiſed in Rome, men accuſtomed to the ſoftneſs and gaieties of the city, and impatient of military labour and diſcipline, began to ſtir up the reſt with ſeditious harangues, inſinuating, that a favourable opportunity offered at length for the veterans to demand an abſolute diſcharge, for the ſoldiers who had not ſerved out their time, to inſiſt upon larger pay, and for all to obtain by ſome means or other a mitigation of their miſeries. We could not have wiſhed for a more favourable conjuncture, ſaid they, to be revenged on centurions for their cruelties: the fate of Rome depends upon us: Their demands.

" had entered into an alliance with him, and delivered hoſtages, " earneſtly deſired him to aſſiſt them againſt the oppreſſions of the " Suevi; if the ſtate of affairs did not permit him to go in per- " ſon, they begged, that he would only ſend his army into Ger- " many; for ſo great was the reputation which the Romans had " acquired by defeating Arioviſtus, that if they appeared in de- " fence of the Ubii, if they owned them for their allies, their " name alone would be ſufficient to defend them from the inſults " of the remoteſt Germans (12)." For their ſake chiefly, Cæſar reſolved to croſs the Rhine, and not thinking it either ſafe to tranſport his army in boats, or ſuitable to his character, and the dignity of the Roman name, he built the famous bridge, which he minutely deſcribes in his commentaries. As the Ubii continued faithful to Rome, and were on that account greatly haraſſed by their German neighbours, they were allowed by the Romans to ſettle on the oppoſite bank of the Rhine. This migration happened, according to Strabo, in the reign of Auguſtus; for that writer, ſpeaking of the Treviri, adds, " next to them dwell the " Ubii, whom Agrippa, agreeably to their inclination, placed " on this ſide of the Rhine (13)." Dion Caſſius mentions two expeditions of Agrippa into Gaul, the firſt in his firſt conſulſhip, the ſecond eighteen years after in the conſulſhip of C. Sentius and Q. Lucretius (14). It is moſt likely, that the migration of the Ubii happened in the firſt expedition; for then he built, as Dion informs us, a bridge croſs the Rhine. Tacitus, ſpeaking of the Ubii, ſays, that they came from beyond the Rine, and that for the many proofs of their fidelity, they were ſettled upon the bank of that river, not to be there guarded, but to guard and defend that boundary againſt the reſt of the Germans. The country allotted to them comprehended the greater part of the preſent duchy of Juliers, and almoſt the whole archbiſhoprick of Cologne.

us: we have enlarged the empire with our victories: to us the Cæſars are indebted for the glorious ſurname of Germanicus. As Cæcina, inſtead of exerting his authority, betrayed fear, and gave way to their fury, they fell at once upon the centurions, the chief objects of their reſentment, and, dragging them to the ground, diſcharged upon each of them ſixty blows, that is, as many as there were centurions in a legion (E). Then, thus bruiſed and near expiring, they drove them ignominiouſly out of the camp, nay, ſome they threw into the Rhine. One Septimius fled for refuge to the tribunal of Cæcina; but the general was forced to deliver him up to the incenſed multitude. Caſſius Chærea, another centurion, afterwards famous for the murder of the emperor Caligula, boldly opened himſelf a way, ſword in hand, through the crowd. After this the mutineers, deſpiſing the authority of their tribunes and their præfecti caſtorum, ſet and relieved the centries themſelves, appointed the guard, and gave ſuch orders as they judged proper in the preſent conjuncture.

Germanicus endeavours to appeaſe them.

In the mean time, Germanicus, who, as we have hinted above, was collecting the tribute in Gaul, no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he flew to the camp. The legions, as he drew near, marched out to meet their general, expreſſing their diſſatisfaction with hideous clamours; nay ſome, taking him by the hand, as if they deſigned to kiſs it, thruſt his fingers into their mouths, to ſhew him they had with age loſt all their teeth; others deſired him to behold their hoary heads, the wounds they had received, &c. Germanicus, inſtead of returning any anſwer to particulars, as ſoon as he had entered the entrenchments, ordered them to range themſelves into manipuli, and place before them their ſeveral enſigns, as was cuſtomary when the general aſſembled and harangued his troops. They obeyed ſlowly and with reluctance; then Germanicus beginning his ſpeech with an encomium

(E) There were in a complete legion thirty manipuli or companies: each company conſiſted of an hundred and twenty men, and was divided into two bands, or as the antients ſtyle them "orders;" each order conſiſted of ſixty men, and had it's peculiar centurion; ſo that there were in a complete legion ſixty centurions, and each centurion had ſixty men under his command (15).

encomium upon Auguſtus, proceeded to the many victories of Tiberius, enlarging on the glorious exploits he had atchieved in Germany with thoſe very legions; he then acquainted them, that all Italy, both the Gauls, and every province of the empire had received and acknowledged Tiberius for emperor, without betraying the leaſt diſaffection. Thus far they liſtened to him with attention; but when he began to expoſtulate with them about their ſeditious behaviour, the ſcene changed; Germanicus was interrupted with loud clamours and a general uproar: ſome ſtripping themſelves ſhewed him the ſcars of the many wounds they had received; others the marks of the ſtripes inflicted on them by the mercileſs centurions; they urged their ſcanty pay, their great labours, the hardſhips attending a military life, &c. Above all, from the veterans aroſe a dreadful cry; they enumerated thirty years of ſervice and upwards, and begged, that to men quite ſpent and worn out he would at length grant ſome reſpite, that he would not ſuffer them to be indebted to death for their relief, but diſcharge them forthwith, and allow them a comfortable maintenance. Some demanded the money which had been bequeathed to them by Auguſtus, mixing with their demands zealous vows and omens of happineſs for Germanicus; nay, ſome went ſo far as openly to declare, that they would ſtand by him to the laſt, if he would himſelf aſſume the empire. At theſe words Germanicus, ſtruck with horror, leaped from the tribunal, and attempted to make his eſcape, leaſt he ſhould be ſtained with their treaſon: but the ſeditious legionaries, drawing their ſwords, ſtopt him, and even threatened to kill him, if he offered to withdraw. Then the generous Germanicus, proteſting, that he would rather die than betray the truſt repoſed in him, drew his ſword, and would have ſacrificed his life to his fidelity, had not thoſe who ſtood next to him ſeized his hand, and reſtrained him by force. There were not, however, ſome wanting in the aſſembly, who cried out to him "to ſtrike" and not ſpare himſelf; nay, one Caluſidius, a common ſoldier, offered him his naked ſword, ſaying, "Take this, Germanicus, it is perhaps ſharper than your "own;" a behaviour which was highly condemned by the reſt as ſavage and barbarous. In the mean time, the friends of Germanicus had time to convey him out of the crowd to his tent, and there to conſult about the moſt proper meaſures in ſo critical a juncture. For Germanicus was informed, that the ring-leaders of the ſedition were preparing to diſpatch meſſengers to the Upper army, in order to draw them too in the revolt; that they designed to plunder the city of the Ubii (F); and that the Germans, already acquainted with the sedition in the Roman army, were ready to invade Gaul, as soon as the banks of the Rhine were left unguarded. In the council, which Germanicus held in his own tent, various measures were proposed, and at last the following resolution unanimously agreed to, viz. that letters should be feigned from Tiberius, with directions, that those who had served twenty years should be finally discharged; that such as had served sixteen should be deemed veterans; and that the legacy, which they demanded, should not only be paid, but doubled. But the mutineers, suspecting these concessions to be forged purely to gain time, insisted on their being forthwith executed. The tribunes therefore were obliged to discharge immediately the veterans; but as to the payment of the legacy, Germanicus would have fain put it off, till they were retired to their winter-quarters; and indeed the first legion and the twentieth trusted him upon his word, but the fifth and the one-and-twentieth refused to stir from the camp, till they were satisfied; so that he was obliged to raise the sum out of the money which he and his friends had brought with them, to defray the expences of their journey, which they no sooner received, than they retired quietly to their winter-quarters. Germanicus then hastened to the upper army under the command of Silius, and easily prevailed upon the second, the thirteenth, and the sixteenth, to swear allegiance to Tiberius; the fourteenth shewed some hesitation, but Germanicus discharging forthwith the veterans, and paying

(F) By "the city of the Ubii" Tacitus means Colonia Agrippinensis, which he calls "the city of the Ubii," either because it was their metropolis, or because they had not yet built any other. They probably laid the foundations of this city upon their first settling on this side of the Rhine. It was afterwards made a Roman colony, and peopled by veterans in the consulship of C. Antistius and M. Suilius, at the request of Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus and wife of the emperor Claudius, who was born there. From her it was called Colonia Agrippinensis, and in after-ages Agrippina; which has made some writers doubt, whether it borrowed its name from Agrippina, or from her grandfather Agrippa, who brought the Ubii over the Rhine. But to Lipsius this doubt seems quite groundless, since the colony, had he been the founder of it, would have been called Colonia Agrippensis, and not Agrippinensis. What name it bore before it was made a Roman colony we find no where mentioned; for Tacitus calls it constantly "the "city of the Ubii."

paying the reſt the money bequeathed them by Auguſtus, cut off all occaſion of complaints.

BUT a party of veterans (G) belonging to the mutinous legions, and then in garriſon in the country of the Chauci (H), began a ſedition there, which was at firſt quelled by Memmius, præfect of the camp, who, though not veſted with any ſuch power, (I), put inſtantly two of the ring-leaders of the ſedition to death. But the tumult breaking out afterwards with freſh fury, Memmius was obliged to withdraw himſelf from their rage and lie concealed: the mutineers diſcovered him,

Some veterans in the country of the Chauci revolt, but are quelled by Memmius.

(G) The veterans formed a corps apart, and had their peculiar ſtandard called "Vexillum", whence they are commonly ſtyled by the antients "Vexillarii" and alſo "Emeriti", from their being exempted from all manner of drudgery, and only obliged to fight the enemy. In this condition they continued till they received the rewards due for their ſervice; and their final diſcharge, which the emperors uſed, under various pretences, to put off for many years, in order to defraud them of the promiſed lands or money.

(H) The Chauci inhabited Eaſt-Frieſland, the counties of Hoy and Oldenburg, the duchy of Bremen, and part of Lavenburg. Tacitus deſcribes the ſituation of their country and the manners of the people, thus: Germany extends northward a great way; firſt of all occurs the nation of the Chauci, who, though they begin immediately at the confines of the Friſians, and poſſeſs part of the ſhore, extend ſo far as to border upon the ſeveral people, of whom I have already ſpoken, till they reach quite to the borders of the Catti; ſo vaſt a country the Chauci not only poſſeſs, but fill. They are the moſt noble people of Germany, and chuſe rather to maintain their grandeur by juſtice than violence: they live quietly, free from the ambition of poſſeſſing more, and of domineering over others. They give no occaſion to wars, they ravage no countries: without wronging or oppreſſing others, they are come to be ſuperior to all (16). However, they drove out the Anſibarii, and ſeized on their country, and made incurſions into Lower Germany, as Tacitus himſelf informs us elſewhere (17).

(I) The power of life and death was at firſt lodged only in the commander in chief of the whole army, but afterwards extended by Auguſtus to his lieutenants, and by the other emperors to the proconſuls, proprætors, and all the governors of provinces: but no ſuch power was ever granted to the prefects of the camp, to the tribunes, or other inferior officers.

him, and then Memmius declaring that theſe outrages were not offered to him, but to Germanicus and Tiberius, who would not fail to reſent them, he ſnatched the colours, faced about towards the Rhine, and boldly threatening thoſe, who ſhould daſe to abandon their ranks, with the puniſhments due to deſerters, he led them back to their winter-quarters. In the mean time deputies ſent either by Tiberius or the ſenate, probably to quell the ſedition, meeting Germanicus near the altar of the Ubii (K), gave occaſion to new diſturbances.

The diſturbances revived.

The firſt and the twentieth legions, who were encamped there with thoſe legionaries, who had been lately placed under the ſtandard of the veterans, apprehending that theſe deputies were come to revoke the conceſſions, which they had extorted by their ſedition, and imputing the imaginary decree to Munatius Plancus, who had been conſul the year before and was at the head of this deputation, they reſolved to vent their rage chiefly upon him; which he being aware of, fled for refuge to the quarters of the firſt legion, and there embracing the eagle and other enſigns, hoped the veneration, which the ſoldiers paid them, would reſtrain their fury. But had not Calpurnius the eagle-bearer, with great bravery and reſolution, repulſed the audacious multitude, the Roman camp had been ſtained with the blood of an embaſſador of the Roman people. This diſorder happened in the night, and early next morning Germanicus entering the camp, aſcended the tribunal, and placing Plancus by himſelf on the tribunal, inveighed againſt the horrible diſorders of the preceding night, acquainted the ſoldiery with the true purpoſes of that embaſſy, complained in an affecting manner of the unheard-of outrages offered to Plancus without any provocation, aggravated the diſgrace which the violating of the ſacred perſon of an embaſſador brought upon the legions, &c. But as the aſſembly ſhewed no great tokens of repentance, he firſt diſmiſſed the deputies under a ſtrong guard of auxiliary horſe, and then, at the motion of his friends, ſolicited his wife Agrippina, who had attended him with her ſon Caius, at that time an infant, into Germany, and was big with child, to withdraw out of the camp, and

(K) This altar was probably raiſed in honour of Auguſtus, and ſeems to have been at a ſmall diſtance from Cologne: Cluverius is of opinion, that the city of Bon, called by the antients Bonna, was built in the place where this altar ſtood; but he is therein contradicted by Lipſius and others, who from ſeveral paſſages out of Tacitus ſhew pretty plainly, that the altar of the Ubii ſtood in the neighbourhood of their city, that is, of Cologne, whereas Bonna was twelve miles diſtant from it.

and not expoſe herſelf to the fury of an outrageous multitude. Agrippina was unwilling to leave him, urging, that it was below her, who was the grand-daughter of Auguſtus, to betray any fear, or abandon her huſband in time of danger. But Germanicus, tenderly embracing her and their little ſon, prevailed upon her at length by his tears and entreaties to depart. As ſhe was attended by many women of diſtinction, wives of the chief officers in the camp, who it ſeems in thoſe days accompanied their huſbands in all their military expeditions, their tears, cries, and lamentations, in parting with their huſbands, occaſioned a great uproar in the camp, and drew together the ſoldiers from all quarters. This was ſo melting a ſcene, that the moſt obſtinate among the rebellious legionaries were touched with it. They could not behold, without being at the ſame time ſeized with ſhame and compaſſion, ſo many women of rank travelling thus forlorn without a centurion to attend them, or a ſoldier to guard them, and their general's wife among them, carrying in her arms her little child, and repairing, like an exile, for ſhelter againſt the fury of the Roman legions to Treves, as if ſhe repoſed greater confidence in foreigners, than in her own countrymen. This made ſo deep an impreſſion on their minds, that ſome ran to ſtop her, while the reſt recurring to Germanicus, earneſtly conjured him to recall her, that it might not be ſaid, to their eternal ſhame and diſgrace, that the daughter of Agrippa, the grand-daughter of Auguſtus, the daughter-in-law of Druſus whoſe memory they adored, had been frightened from the Roman camp, and obliged to ſeek ſanctuary among foreigners. Germanicus, obſerving both their ſentiments and countenances changed, reſolved to improve their preſent diſpoſition; and accordingly in a long and affecting harangue, which in the height of his grief he uttered with great vehemence, he painted to them the blackneſs of their guilt in ſuch lively colours, that they not only confeſſed, that all his reproaches were true, but, their minds being quite changed, they earneſtly beſought him to puniſh the authors of the late ſedition, by whom they had been miſled, and offered to march forthwith againſt the enemy, provided he would recall his wife and his ſon. Germanicus, finding them entirely reclaimed, anſwered, that his ſon ſhould return, but againſt the recalling of Agrippina he alledged the ſeaſon already far advanced, and her approaching delivery; and as to the puniſhing the authors of the ſedition, he told them, that he left that to them. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when the legionaries ran to ſeize the chief authors of the ſedition, and dragged them in chains to Caius Cetronius, commander of the

the firſt legion, who judged and puniſhed them in the following manner: The legions with their drawn ſwords ſurrounded the tribunal, from whence the priſoner was expoſed to their view; if they pronounced him guilty, he was immediately thrown down headlong, and cut in pieces by his comrades. As Germanicus did not order, but only permitted, this new method of condemning and executing, he did not forfeit by it the reputation he had acquired of an humane and good-natured commander. The veterans followed the example of the legionaries, puniſhing the moſt ſeditious of their corps in the ſame manner. But, notwithſtanding theſe ſigns of remorſe and pledges of fidelity, Germanicus, glad to get rid of them, ordered them into Rhœtia to defend that province againſt the Suevi, who were ſaid to be in motion. After this he made a ſtrict enquiry into the conduct and characters of the centurions, who were all cited before him to give each an account of his country, rank, the years of his ſervice, his exploits in war, military preſents, &c. If the tribunes or his legion were ſatisfied with his conduct he kept his poſt, if they charged him with cruelty or avarice, he was immediately diſcharged. Thus were the firſt and the twentieth legion entirely reclaimed, and brought back to a ſenſe of their duty. But the fifth and twenty-firſt, who were in winter-quarters ſixty miles off in a place called Vetera, that is, "the old camp (L)", continued obſtinate in their revolt, nor was there any wickedneſs which they did not commit. Againſt them therefore Germanicus reſolved to lead the legions that had returned to their duty, and give them battle, if he could not reclaim them by fair means. With this view he prepared veſſels and arms, and drew together his troops; but before he put them on board the veſſels which were to convey them down the Rhine, judging it proper

Germanicus propoſes to march againſt them.

(L) This place began, no doubt, to be ſtyled "the old camp," after the Romans had formed a new camp in the country of the Ubii, or their neighbours the Vangiones. Tacitus often mentions this camp in his hiſtory (18); whence Cluverius concludes, that it was not a naked camp, but a conſiderable town, built on occaſion of the ſtay the Romans made there. As it was diſtant ſixty miles from the camp between Cologn and Bon, the abovementioned writer thinks that the preſent city of Santen ſtands on the ſame ſpot of ground; in which opinion he is confirmed by the deſcription Tacitus gives us of "the old camp" (19), which, he ſays, perfectly agrees with the ſituation of Santen.

per to allow the mutineers time to return to themſelves, he wrote a letter to Cæcina who commanded them, acquainting him, that he approached with a powerful army, reſolved to put them all to the ſword without diſtinction, if they did not prevent him by taking vengeance themſelves on the guilty. This letter Cæcina communicated only to the chief officers, and ſuch of the ſoldiers as had all along diſapproved of the revolt, exhorting them at the ſame time to enter into an aſſociation againſt the ſeditious, and redeem themſelves from death and ignominy, by putting thoſe to the ſword who had brought them into the preſent danger. The officers approved of the propoſal, and having, by ſounding the legionaries and veterans, found, that the majority diſapproved of the conduct of their comrades, they privately acquainted them with the contents of Germanicus's letter, and eaſily prevailed upon them to concur with their commanders, in ſacrificing to their own ſafety the chief authors of the ſedition. The time therefore was ſettled for falling ſword in hand upon the moſt notoriouſly guilty and turbulent; and when it came, upon a ſignal agreed on before-hand, the faithful legionaries, ruſhing into the tents of the moſt ſeditious, maſſacred them without mercy, before they were aware of their danger: nothing was to be heard but dreadful outcries and groans in all the quarters of the camp; nothing to be ſeen but ſtreams of blood and heaps of dead bodies. Neither Cæcina, nor any of the tribunes, offered to ſtop the fury of the enraged ſoldiery; ſo that the ſlaughter was general, and the camp in an inſtant turned into a ſhambles: comrades were butchered by comrades, and friends by friends, in the ſame tents where they uſed to eat and ſleep together. The maſſacre was ſcarce ended, when Germanicus arrived, who, as he was naturally inclined to pity and mercy, could not behold the camp ſtreaming with blood and filled with carcaſſes, without burſting into tears, and crying out, "This is "not a remedy; but ſlaughter and deſolation." After he had with a flood of tears given vent to his grief, he cauſed the bodies of the ſlain to be burnt, and celebrated their obſequies with the uſual pomp[d]. Thus was this dangerous ſedition entirely quelled, diſcipline re-eſtabliſhed, the rebellious legions thoroughly reclaimed, and the ſupreme power ſecured to Tiberius, by the addreſs and intrepidity of the brave Germanicus; who, had his unbounded greatneſs of mind and unſhaken loyalty ſuffered him to ſecond the ardent wiſhes of the ſoldiery, might have eaſily ſeized it for himſelf; for he was the darling of the ſoldiers, ſoldiers, and adored by the people, both on account of his own merit, and that of his father Druſus, whoſe memory was dear to every true Roman, no-body doubting, but he would have reſtored the republic to her former ſtate, had he ſucceeded to the empire; nay, the letter he wrote to his brother Tiberius about compelling Auguſtus to reſtore the public liberty, was commonly believed to have been the occaſion of his death as we have obſerved above. Of Germanicus they entertained the ſame hopes, and thence their zeal for his ſafety and advancement: but the noble youth himſelf was the only perſon who defeated all their meaſures, and reſolutely oppoſed his own promotion. We ſhall ſoon ſee what return Tiberius made him for his unalterable attachment to his perſon and intereſt (M).

But they prevent him by puniſhing the ſeditious themſelves.

In

(M) Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius was highly blamed at Rome for not going in perſon to quell the ſedition of the mutinous legions. "The rebellion, ſaid they, ſpeaking both of the Pannonian "and German legions, has gathered too much ſtrength to be ſup-"preſſed by two young princes, whoſe authority the ſoldiery de-"ſpiſes. Why does he not go himſelf to awe the mutineers with "his uncontrouled power? They would, no doubt, return to their "duty at the bare ſight of their emperor, a man of great experi-"ence in war, and in whoſe power alone it is to puniſh with ſeve-"rity, and liberally to reward, every one according to his deſerts. "How many journeys did Auguſtus take into Germany, even in "his old age? And ſhall Tiberius, in the vigor of his, continue "unactive and idle in the city, without any other employment, "but to cavil at the ſpeeches of the ſenators?" Tiberius, tho' not ignorant of theſe complaints, was determined not to leave Rome, judging his preſence more neceſſary in the capital, where all affairs were tranſacted, than in the camp. Beſides, he was at a loſs to which army he ſhould repair firſt, and at the ſame time afraid, leſt the laſt he viſited ſhould think themſelves affronted, and thence become outrageous. To treat them therefore both equally, and maintain the majeſty of an emperor, which is ever moſt reverenced at a diſtance, he thought it ſafeſt to viſit neither, but to ſend to the one his natural, to the other his adopted, ſon. Moreover he conſidered, that the two young princes might well refer many things to him, which would be gaining time; and that if the mutineers deſpiſed them, his own authority ſtill remained to awe them into obedience; whereas if they contemned, in the firſt tranſports of their rage, the emperor himſelf, no authority was left to controul them. However, to obviate the complaints and clamours of the people, he gave out, that he deſigned to viſit the rebellious armies; and even choſe his attendants, provided

In the mean time, ſuch of the veterans and legionaries as had been no-ways concerned in the late ſedition, in order to give Germanicus new proofs of their fidelity, begged him to lead them againſt the enemy, who had enjoyed ſome reſpite, firſt by the death of Auguſtus, and afterwards by the inteſtine tumult in the camp. Germanicus complied with their requeſt, and laying a bridge croſs the Rhine, marched over twelve thouſand legionaries, twenty ſix cohorts of the allies, and eight alæ (N) of horſe. With theſe he traverſed the Cæſian foreſt (O), and other woods lying between him and the enemy; and being informed on his march, that the Germans were celebrating that night a feſtival with great mirth and revelling, he advanced with ſuch expedition, having ſent Cæcina before with ſome light-armed cohorts, to clear a paſſage through the foreſt, that he reached the villages of the Marſi, before the inhabitants had recovered themſelves from their debauch. Here he divided his army into four bodies, and giving them full liberty to make what havock they pleaſed, ſent them into different quarters of the unhappy canton, that no part of it might be exempt from ravage and devaſtation. We may well imagine what ſlaughter they made of thoſe unfortunate wretches, whom they found ſcattered here and there and aſleep, ſome in their beds, others lying by their tables; no ſex or age was ſpared; places ſacred and prophane were equally plundered and laid in aſhes, and among them the temple of Tanfana (P), the tutelar

(O) The Cæſian foreſt was part of the Hercynian, and is placed by Cluverius partly in the duchy of Cleves, partly in Weſtphalia between Weſel and Koefeld. Some modern critics think, that it was called by the antient Germans, not the Cæſian, (for this, ſay they, is a Roman name) but the Heſian foreſt, from Heſius, the god of war amongſt the antient Germans and Gauls.

(P) Gronovius derives the name of this German deity from the words "tan" or "than," ſignifying in the German language "a fir tree," and "fachna" or "fan," which in the antient tutelar god of the German nation. In ſhort, the country was waſted with fire and ſword fifty miles round, without the loſs, nay, without the wound, of a ſingle man on the ſide of the Romans[e]. This general maſſacre rouſed the Bructeri (Q), the tient Gotho-Teutonic tougue ſignifies "Lord" or "God"; ſo that the import of Tanfana is "the lord" or "the god, of fir-trees". That author concludes, that the Tanfana of the Germans was the ſame as the Sylvanus of the Romans, and called the god "Tanfana," or "the god of firs," becauſe his chief temple was in a foreſt of fir-trees (20), as Jupiter was ſtiled by the Romans, Fagutalis, from a grove of beeches conſecrated to him, the word "fagus" ſignifying in Latin "a beech" (21). Lipſius derives the name of Tanfana from the Flemiſh word "taenfanct", ſignifying "the principal" or "firſt cauſe of things;" ſo that the Germans, under the name of Tanfana, adored, according to him, the ſupreme being.

(Q) The Bructeri are placed by moſt geographers next to the Friſii, between the Amiſia, now the Ems, and the lake Flevus, now the Suyderſee. Tacitus ſpeaks of them thus. "Next to the "Tencteri dwelt the Bructeri, in whoſe room the Chamavi and "Angrivarii are ſaid to have ſettled, after having driven out and "utterly extirpated the Bructeri, with the concurrence of the "neighbouring nations, either in deteſtation of their pride, or en-"ticed by the love of booty, or through the ſpecial favour of "the gods towards the Romans. They were even pleaſed to in-"dulge us the pleaſure of ſeeing the battle, in which there fell "above ſixty thouſand men, without a blow ſtruck by the Ro-"mans, &c. May the gods continue and perpetuate among theſe "nations, if not any love for us, yet by all means their animoſi-"ty and hatred to each other, ſince fortune cannot more ſignally "befriend us, than in ſowing diviſions amongſt our enemies." As to the time of this general ſlaughter of the Bructeri mentioned here by Tacitus, we are quite in the dark; for this nation was ſtill in being in Tiberius's reign, nay, and many years after Tacitus's time, but probably at a greater diſtance from the Rhine; for they are mentioned by Eumenius and Nazarius in their panegyrics upon Conſtantine, and alſo by the poet Claudian (22), The ſlaughter therefore was not ſo general as is by Tacitus ſuppoſed (23).

he Tubantes (R), and the Uſipetes (S), who beſetting the paſſes of the foreſt through which the Roman army was to return, fell upon their rear, and put the light-armed cohorts into diſorder; but Germanicus, riding up to the twentieth legion, and crying out, That the time was come for them to redeem their reputation, and cancel the memory of their late ſedition, by falling upon the enemy, they attacked them ſo briſkly, that the Germans were broke at the firſt onſet, and driven out of the wood into the neighbouring plain, where great numbers of them were cut in pieces. In the mean time, the van-guard, paſſing the foreſt, had time to form a camp, whither the reſt of the army retired to reſt themſelves after ſo fatiguing a march. The next day they purſued their rout uninterrupted, and arrived, loaded with booty, at the place appointed for their winter-quarters[f]. The fame of theſe exploits ſoon reached Rome, and filled the city with joy. As for Tiberius, he was highly pleaſed to hear, that the ſedition was ſuppreſſed, and the beginning of his reign ſignalized by ſo remarkable a victory. But his joy was not without allay: Germanicus, by finally diſcharging the veterans, by ſhortening the term of ſervice for the reſt, and by liberally diſtributing money among them, had gained the affections of the army, and beſides, great glory by his late expedition. This gave the jealous and ſuſpicious emperor great uneaſineſs, which, however, he artfully diſguiſed, giving the ſenate a pompous account of the exploits of his nephew, and beſtowing upon him the higheſt encomiums. He commended at the ſame time the addreſs of his ſon Druſus in quelling the ſedition of the Pannonian legions in few words, but which ſeemed

Tiberius jealous of Germanicus's glory.

[f] Idem ibid. c. 52, 53.

(R) The Tubantes poſſeſſed great part of Weſtphalia. Cluverius places the antient city of Teclia mentioned by Ptolemy, now Teklenburg, on the borders of the Tubantes and Chamavi.

(S) The Uſipites, Uſipii, or Uſipetæ, are placed by Rhenanus between the Rhine and the mountains of Heſſe. In Cæſar's time they bordered upon the countries of the Sicambri and Tencteri, of whom we have ſpoken above. Dion Caſſius ſeems to place them between the Rhine and the Lupias, now the Lippe, and the Sicambri beyond the latter of theſe rivers; for, in deſcribing Druſus's expedition into Germany, he tells us, that he paſſed the Rhine, and having ſubdued the Uſipetes, laid a bridge over the Lupias, and entered the country of the Sicambri (24).

ſeemed dictated by his heart and more ſincere.[g] In ſhort, he ſpoke of Germanicus like an orator, but of Druſus like a father. However, he approved whatever Germanicus had done, and, to gain the affections of the Pannonian legions, extended to them all the privileges which Germanicus had granted to his own.

Tiberius's excellent behaviour in the beginning of his reign.

THESE diſorders in Germany and Pannonia, and the great veneration which the ſoldiery, as well as the people, had for Germanicus, were a great reſtraint upon Tiberius, who now with wonderful art diſguiſed thoſe vices, which afterwards diſplayed themſelves ſo openly. He acted in moſt things like a truly generous, good-natured, and clement prince. Of the many and extraordinary honours that were offered him, he accepted but few, and thoſe of the meaneſt ſort. He forbad any prieſts or temples to be decreed for him, or ſtatues erected but by his own permiſſion, which he granted ſometimes, upon condition that they ſhould be placed, not among the images of the gods, but the ornaments of their houſes. He refuſed the title of "father of his country," and never took upon him the name of Auguſtus, though it was hereditary, but in his letters to foreign potentates. For flattery he had an utter averſion. If, in private converſation or public ſpeeches, any thing was ſaid to his praiſe, he immediately not only interrupted, but rebuked, the ſpeaker. One calling him Dominus, or Lord, he deſired him not to mention him any more in deriſion. Another calling his employments ſacred, he entreated him to change his epithet, and to ſtile them troubleſome. He would not permit the ſenate to ſwear to the obſervation of his acts, urging againſt it the inſtability of all mortal things, and that the higher he was raiſed, the more he was expoſed to danger.

His extraordinary patience.

All ſlanderous reports, libels, and lampoons upon him and his adminiſtration he bore with extraordinary patience, ſaying, "That in a free city, the thoughts and tongues of every man "ought to be free;" and when the ſenate would have proceeded againſt ſome, who had publiſhed libels againſt him, he would not conſent to it, ſaying, "We have not time enough "to attend ſuch trifles: if you once open a door to ſuch in-"formations, you will be able to do nothing elſe; for, under "that pretence, every man will revenge himſelf upon his e-"nemies by accuſing them to you." Being informed that one had ſpoke very detractingly of him; "If he ſpeaks ill "of me," ſaid he, "I will give him as good an account "of

" of my words and actions as I can; and, if that is not suf" ficient, I will satisfy myself with having as bad an opinion " of him as he has of me." His carriage toward the senate was very respectful; nothing of moment was transacted without their advice and approbation. To them were referred the collecting of the taxes and tributes, the building and repairing of all public edifices, the raising or disbanding of forces, the mustering of the legions and auxiliaries, the prolonging or granting of commissions upon any extraordinary war, the returning of answers to the letters of kings, &c. He never entered into the senate with any attendants but once, when he was brought in, on account of an indisposition, in a litter; and then he immediately ordered his company to withdraw. In the senate he allowed every one to speak his mind with great freedom. Having one day dissented in his opinion from Q. Haterius; " Pardon me, I beseech you" said he, " if as a senator
" I speak against you with more freedom than ordinary." Then turning to the whole assembly, he addressed them thus; " Most venerable fathers, what I say now I have often " said before; a good and prudent prince, to whom you " have given so great and absolute a power, ought to be " serviceable, not only to the senate and the body of the ci" ty, but to every particular citizen: nor do I repent of any " thing I have said of this nature, having always account" ed you, as I still do, my good, just, and most gracious " lords." If in the senate any thing was decreed against his judgment, he did not complain, nor seem the least displeased. He allowed the consuls so much power, that certain embassadors from Africa had recourse to them, desiring they would return them a speedy answer, since Cæsar, to whom they had been sent, put them off from day to day. When the consuls came into the senate, the theatre, or any other place where he was, he always rose up to them, and turned out of the way, if he met them in the streets. He often assisted at the trials in the courts of justice, especially if any criminal was reported to be like to escape by favour or connivance; he then appeared unexpectedly, and with a grave air put the judges in mind of the laws and the crimes before them. He applied himself with great care to the reformation of manners, and made many excellent regulations, by which he restrained the immoderate expences of plays and public shews, retrenched the salaries of the players, and reduced the gladiators to a fixt number. The prices of Corinthian vessels growing extravagant, and the luxury of entertainments to ſuch an exceſs, that thirty thouſand ſeſterces were paid for three mullets, he complained of theſe diſorders to the ſenate, and got a law paſſed, ſetting bounds to the expences in furniture, and ordaining, that the prices of proviſions in the markets ſhould be annually regulated by the ſenate. As to the eating-houſes and taverns, which at this time were very numerous in Rome, they were all, by Tiberius's orders, utterly ſuppreſſed; and that he might, by his own example, countenance frugality and parſimony in others, he had, at his public and moſt ſolemn entertainments, meat ſerved up, which had been dreſſed and cut up the day before, contrary to the cuſtom which then obtained, ſaying, that "every part had the ſame taſte as the whole." To check the progreſs of vice, he drove out of Rome a great number of young noblemen, and alſo ſome women of diſtinction, who were noted for their debaucheries; and at the ſame time revived an antient law, impowering all parents to puniſh their daughters, even after they were married, if, by their debauched lives, they brought diſgrace upon their families. In this particular he was ſo ſtrict, that by proclamation he prohibited the kiſſes that were, according to cuſtom, given by way of ſalutation. He ſeemed entirely averſe from loading his people with any new taxes; and when ſome governors of provinces adviſed him to raiſe their taxes, he anſwered, that "it was the "duty of a good ſhepherd to ſhear, not to flay, his flock," and was ſo far from hearkening to the remonſtrances of his preſidents and governors, that, inſtead of raiſing, he leſſened the tributes that were annually remitted to Rome from the provinces [h]. Such was the deportment of Tiberius, while his authority was yet wavering; but we ſhall ſoon ſee him pull off the maſk, and abandon himſelf without controul to thoſe vices, which he now ſo artfully diſguiſes with the oppoſite virtues. But to return to the brave Germanicus:

His frugality.

Leſſens the taxes.

THE following year, Druſus Cæſar and Caius Norbanus being conſuls, Germanicus made vaſt preparations, with a deſign to purſue the war againſt the Germans, and revenge the death of Varus and the ſlaughter of his legions. He had indeed no thoughts of attempting any thing till the ſummer; but being informed, that violent diſſenſions reigned among the enemy, he reſolved early in the ſpring to

to make an irruption into the country of the Catti (T). These

(T) The Catti or Chatti poſſeſſed, as we have hinted above, part of the duchy of Brunſwick, of the biſhopric of Hildeſheim, of Thuringen, Heſſe, and the territories of Fulda, with the counties of Schauvemberg, Waldeck, and Mansfeld; Tacitus ſpeaks of them thus: "The territories of the Catti begin at "the Hercynian foreſt, and conſiſt not of ſuch wide aud marſhy plains as thoſe of the other communities contained within "the vaſt compaſs of Germany; but of hills, which, for a "long tract, run high and contiguous, then by degrees ſink. "Moreover, the Hercynian foreſt attends for a while its native "Catti, and then forſakes them. They are diſtinguiſhed with "more hard and robuſt bodies, compact limbs, ſtern countenances, and a more ſprightly vigor of mind. For Germans, "they are men of much ſenſe and addreſs. They commit the "government to choſen men, and liſten to them when ſet over "them. They know how to maintain their ranks, to diſcern "occaſions, to reſtrain their own ardour, how to employ the "day, how to entrench themſelves by night. They reckon "fortune among uncertain things, and valour among ſuch as are "ſecure; and, what is very rare, and never learnt but by men "inured to diſcipline, they repoſe more confidence in the conduct of the general, than in the ſtrength of the army. Their "whole ſtrength conſiſts in foot, who, beſides their arms, carry "iron tools and their proviſions. Other Germans take the field "equipped for a battle; but the Catti equipped for a war. "They ſeldom make excurſions, or expoſe themſelves to the "dangers of caſual encounters. It is peculiar to cavalry ſuddenly to conquer, or ſuddenly to fly. Such haſte and expedition borders upon fear: warineſs and deliberation are more "a-kin to intrepidity." Tacitus adds, that a cuſtom, practiſed only by ſome particular perſons of other German nations, univerſally obtained among the Catti; which is, to let their hair and beards grow till they have ſlain an enemy, being perſuaded, that only by the death of a foe they can acquit themſelves of the debt and duty contracted by their birth, and render themſelves worthy of their country and parents; ſo that the cowardly and unwarlike among them were eaſily diſtinguiſhed by their long hair and beards. The moſt brave likewiſe wear an iron ring, which is a mark of great diſhonour in that nation, as a chain or badge of ſlavery, till they ſet themſelves, as it were, at liberty, by killing an enemy (25). However, as Germanicus came

(25) Tacit. de mor. Ger. 30, 31.

Theſe inteſtine broils, of which Germanicus reſolved to take advantage, were occaſioned by the oppoſite parties of Arminius and Segeſtes, the former the incendiary of Germany, and chief author of the inſurrection in which Varus periſhed with his legions; the latter a ſincere and faithful friend to the Romans; nay, he had even given Varus notice of the intended revolt, and adviſed him to ſecure himſelf, Arminius and the other chiefs, aſſuring him, that, without their leaders, the multitude would not dare to attempt any thing. But the Roman general deſpiſed his advice, which coſt him dear, as we have related above. Segeſtes, tho' forced to join his countrymen in that general revolt, yet remained at conſtant variance with Arminius; and at this time their animoſities were heightened by a domeſtic quarrel, Arminius having carried away by force the daughter of Segeſtes, named Thuſneldes, and married her, though already betrothed to another. This attempt gave riſe to an open rupture between the two chiefs, of which Germanicus no ſooner had intelligence, than he put four legions, five thouſand auxiliaries, and ſome German troops drawn ſuddenly together, under the command of Cæcina, ordering him to ſcour the country, while he himſelf, at the head of as many legions and double the number of allies, advanced with incredible expedition into the country of the Catti; and falling upon the enemy before they were appriſed of his march, put vaſt numbers of them to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age. Moſt of their youth eſcaped by ſwimming over the Adrana (U), and attempted to prevent the Romans from laying a bridge over that river; but their efforts proving unſucceſsful, ſome of them ſubmitted to Germanicus; but the greater part, abandoning their villages, took refuge in the woods; ſo that the Romans, without oppoſition, laid waſte all the open country, ſet fire to their dwellings, laid Mattium came upon them unawares, they were forced either to ſubmit, or ſhelter themſelves in the woods, that is, in the Hercynian foreſt, which, as Tacitus has told us, began in their country.

tium (W) their capital in aſhes, and then began their march back to the Rhine. The Cheruſci alone made ſome motions, as if they deſigned to aſſiſt the Catti and fall upon the Romans in their retreat, but were reſtrained by Cæcina, who, with his army of obſervation, moved about from place to place, and had even defeated the Marſi (X), who had dared to engage him [i].

GERMANICUS had ſcarce reached his camp, when deputies arrived from Segeſtes, praying relief for that faithful friend to the Romans againſt his and their declared enemy Arminius, who had beſieged him in his camp. At the head of this embaſſy was Segimundus, the ſon of Segeſtes, whom, though he had formerly revolted from the Romans, Germanicus received with great kindneſs; but ſent him, as he

[i] Idem ibid. c. 56.

(W) Tacitus in this place ſtyles Mattium the capital of the Catti; but elſewhere (26) diſtinguiſhes the Mattiaci from the Catti: "The army," ſays he, "was compoſed of Catti, Uſipii, "and Mattiaci." Their country, according to the accounts of the antient geographers, was incloſed on all ſides by the territories of the Catti; whence they are often confounded with them. Cluverius and Cellarius think, that the ſituation of Mattium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Mattiacum, agrees with that of the preſent city of Marpurg; for it ſtands on the road leading from mount Taunus, now known to the natives by the names of Der Heyrick aud Die Hohe, over-againſt Mentz, to the Adrana or the Eder, which was the rout Germanicus took in this irruption, as Tacitus informs us. Pliny mentions the hot baths of Mattium (27), which all modern geographers take for the hot waters of Wiſbaden over-againſt Mentz or Moguntiacum, as it was called by the antients; ſo that the territories of the Mattiaci extended at leaſt from the Rhine to the Eder. Whether they reached beyond that river, and how far, we know not. Tacitus tells us, that the Mattiaci in his time were friends to the Romans. The Roman people, ſays he, have carried the awe and eſteem of their empire beyond the Rhine and the antient boundaries. Thus the Mattiaci, living on the oppoſite bank, enjoy a ſettlement of their own; but by inclination are Romans (28).

(X) Part of Weſtphalia and of the biſhoprick of Paderborn were, according to moſt of our modern geographers, the antient habitation of the Marſi.

could no longer depend upon his fidelity, under a ſtrong guard to the frontiers of Gaul (Y). As to his requeſt, he readily complied with it, led back his army without loſs of time to the relief of Segeſtes, engaged the beſiegers, put them to flight, and reſcued that faithful friend of the Romans out of the hands of his moſt inveterate enemy. On this occaſion the Romans took a great many priſoners, among whom was Thuſneldis, the wife of Arminius and daughter of Segeſtes, who had been the chief occaſion of the preſent rupture between the two illuſtrious families (Z). She was then big with child, and ſeemed to be concerned only

(Y) Segimundus had been greatly favoured by the Romans, and by them appointed prieſt of the altar of the Ubii, of which we have ſpoken above; but when his countrymen revolted, he rent the ſacerdotal tiara and fled to the revolters. Hence, when his father declared to him his intention of putting him at the head of the embaſſy which he was ſending to Germanicus, he deſired at firſt to be excuſed; but afterwards truſting to the clemency of the Roman general he undertook the execution of his father's orders, and was favourably received by Germanicus, but not ſuffered to return among his countrymen. What became of him afterwards, Tacitus does not tell us; but Strabo names him among the illuſtrious captives, who marched before the chariot of Germanicus, when he entered Rome in triumph (29). If he did not join the rebels a ſecond time, Germanicus acted contrary to the law of nations in thus ſeizing the perſon of an embaſſador, and treating him as if he had been taken in war.

(Z) Tacitus tells us, that the Germans carried about with them in all their wars their wives and children, whom they placed near the field of battle, that, by the tears of their wives and the cries of their tender infants, they might be the more encouraged to exert themſelves in the defence of thoſe intereſting pledges of nature. Their armies, when yielding and ready to fly, have been often prevailed upon to maintain their ground and ſtand the ſhock of the enemy, by the importunity and entreaties of their women, preſenting their breaſts, and putting them in mind of their impending captivity; an evil which they far more dreaded in their women than in themſelves. When any of them happened to be ſo wounded in battle, that they could not continue the fight, they retired to their mothers or wives, who, without being ſhocked, ſucked their bleeding wounds. only for the fate of her unhappy babe deſtined to be born in ſlavery. As for her own captivity, ſhe bore it with the intrepidity of a true heroine, without ſhedding a tear, or uttering a word in the ſtyle of a ſuppliant. Among the booty were found Roman ſpoils taken from Varus and his ſlaughtered legions, and divided among thoſe who were now priſoners. Arminius being now put to flight, Segeſtes thought it his duty to wait upon his deliverer; and accordingly, from a confidence in his ſincere attachment to the Roman intereſt, he appeared before Germanicus, without betraying the leaſt fear, and, addreſſing him with a majeſtic air, enumerated, with great modeſty, the ſervices he had rendered the republic, which had drawn upon him the hatred of Arminius; offered his mediation for the German nation, if they perhaps would rather chuſe to repent than be deſtroyed; and earneſtly recommended to his known clemency his ſon and daughter, entreating him to forgive the former the error he had been guilty of in his youth, more out of imprudence than malice, and to conſider the latter rather as the daughter of Segeſtes than the wife of Arminius. Germanicus anſwered with his uſual good-nature and humanity, promiſing to take his ſon, daughter, and all his relations under his protection, aſſigned to him a ſafe retreat in one of the neighbouring provinces long ſince ſubject to Rome, and then returned with the army to his former camp, where the wife of Arminius was delivered of a male child [k] (A).

among them brought no dowry to the huſband, but the huſband to the wife, viz. a couple of oxen yoked together, an horſe accoutred, a ſhield, a javelin, and a ſword. The woman on her part too made her huſband a preſent of ſome arms. By the mutual approbation and acceptance of theſe gifts, in the preſence of their parents and relations, they were married. The oxen joined in the ſame yoke, the horſe ready equipped, and the preſent of arms, ſerved to put the woman in mind, that ſhe came to her huſband as a partner of his hazards and dangers in war as well as in peace, and that ſhe was not exempt from fighting and exerting her courage in battle for the defence of her huſband or country (30).

In the mean time, Arminius, more enraged than ever for the loſs of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, and the fate of his child doomed to be born in captivity, flew about the country of the Cheruſci, inflaming that warlike nation againſt Segeſtes and Germanicus, and encouraging them to let Arminius rather lead them to liberty and glory, than the wicked and treacherous Segeſtes to infamy and bondage. His credit, and the bitter invectives he was conſtantly uttering againſt the Romans, rouſed not only the Cheruſci, but all the neighbouring nations; nay, Inguiomerus, one of the chief lords of the country, and hitherto a friend to the Romans and in high credit with them, though uncle to Arminius by the father's ſide, was drawn into the confederacy, and prevailed upon to declare for his nephew, and join him with all his friends and dependents. Germanicus, upon intelligence of ſo powerful a confederacy, that he might not be obliged to engage ſuch numerous forces united, reſolved to make a diverſion; and with this view detached Cæcina at the head of forty Roman cohorts to the river Amiſia, now the Ems, through the territories of the Bructeri. The cavalry took another rout, under the conduct of Pedo (B), who fortunes which befel him. The fathers Catrou and Rouille, in their Roman hiſtory, make the ſame promiſe. If Tacitus performed his, it was in his books which have not reached our times. We ſhall therefore be the more obliged to thoſe learned writers for the performance of theirs; for we know nothing of this unhappy captive or his misfortunes.

(B) It is uncertain whether Pedo, mentioned here by Tacitus, was Pedo Albinovanus, or Pedo Pompeius. Seneca ſpeaks of the latter as a perſon of great merit (32), and Ovid commends the former as an excellent poet. Some fragments of his book entitled, "De navigatione Germanici," have reached our times (33). The elegy he wrote on the death of Druſus and inſcribed to Livia is a maſter-piece of the kind, and worthy of a heavenly poet, as Ovid ſtyles him (34). Joſeph Scaliger aſcribes to him the elegy on the death of Mecænas, wherein he diſagrees with moſt other critics. Voſſius ſuppoſes him to have written alſo epigrams, which he gathers from one of Martial's (35).

who led them by the confines of the Friſians (C). As for Germanicus himſelf, he embarqued the four remaining legions on a neighbouring lake, and tranſported them on rivers and canals to the place appointed for the general rendezvous on the banks of the Amiſia, where the three ſeparate bodies met. The Chauci, as the legions paſſed through their country, joined them: the Bructeri, upon the approach of Germanicus, attempted to ſet fire to their houſes and retire; but were reſtrained by Stertinius, who was detached againſt them. That commander had the good look to find in the country of the Bructeri the eagle of the ninteenth legion loſt in the overthrow of Varus. The army, now united, purſued their march to the fartheſt borders of the Bructeri, and laid waſte the whole country between the rivers Luppias and Amiſia, that is, the Lyppe aud the Ems. As the foreſt of Teutoburgium (D) was not far off, where the bodies of Varus and the three legions ſlaughtered with him were ſaid to lie ſtill unburied, Germanicus, touched with a tender compaſſion on their unhappy fate, reſolved to march thither and pay them the laſt offices. Accordingly Cæcina was ſent before to clear the way, to examine the avenues leading to the foreſt, and lay bridges over the marſhy places. The reſt of the army followed, and, marching in good order and with great caution, entered the gloomy foreſt, where they ſoon diſcovered, the ruins of two Roman camps, the one very ſpacious and capable of containing three legions, the other much leſs in circumference, which, they concluded, had ſerved for a place of retreat for the ſmall number of legionaries, who had eſcaped the firſt day's ſlaugher. The ramparts of both were half ruined, and the ditches near filled up. The open fields were covered with bleached bones, ſome ſeparate, ſome in heaps, as thoſe unhappy men had happened to fall flying

Germanicus and his army bury the remains of Varus and his legions.

(C) The country of the Friſii was divided into two, called the Greater and the Leſſer. The former lay between the mouths of the Rhine and the Weſer. The latter extended along the coaſt of the ocean on the oppoſite ſide of the Rhine; but how far we cannot determine.

(D) The foreſt of Teutoburgium, now Teuteberg, lay in Weſtphalia, between the Ems and the Lyppe. The preſent inhabitants pretend to ſhew the very ſpot where Varus with his legions were cut off. It is a plain in the neighbourhood of a ſmall town called Horn, and is known by the name of Winfeldt, which it took, they ſuppoſe, from the Germans winning the field.

flying ſingly, or reſiſting in bodies. In the adjacent groves were ſeen ſtill ſtanding the altars, where the barbarians had ſacrificed to their gods the tribunes and chief centurions, whom they had made priſoners. On the trees ſurrounding the altars were ſtuck the ſkulls of thoſe unhappy victims. In Germanicus's army there were ſome who had ſerved under Varus, and had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter; and theſe related the particulars of that tragical event to the reſt. Here, ſaid they, the commanders of our legions were ſlain; there our eagles were taken: here Varus received his firſt wound; there he fell by his own hand: in that place ſtood the tribunal, whence Arminius harangued his men; in this he cauſed gibbets to be erected for the execution of his captives, &c. So many doleful objects awakened in the hearts of the Romans and their commander a tender compaſſion for the fate of their countymen, friends, and comrades, and at the ſame time an eager deſire of appeaſing their manes, with the ſlaughter of an enemy ſo cruel and inhuman. With theſe ſentiments they firſt carefully gathered the bones ſcattered up and down the fields; and, having dug a deep trench, buried them there ſix years after the ſlaughter, Germanicus laying the firſt turf on the common tomb (E). Having thus paid the laſt offices to their friends,

(E) Tiberius did not approve of this pious office performed by Germanicus and his army. Whether it was, ſays Tacitus, that he put a bad conſtruction upon every action of Germanicus, or believed, that the ſight of ſo many Romans ſlain by the enemy, and left thus unburied, might ſink the courage of his men, and heighten their terror of ſo dreadful a foe. Beſides, Germanicus was a member of the college of the augurs, and of the prieſts ſacred to the deity of Auguſtus, and, as ſuch, ought not, according to the antient rites, to have been any ways concerned in the ceremonies and ſolemnities of the dead, ſince by them pontiffs, augurs, and prieſts of all denominations, were thought to be defiled. Hence Auguſtus, who was pontifex maximus, pronounced the funeral oration of Marcellus with a veil between him and the corſe, as Suetonius informs us, that he might not be polluted with the ſight of it. Plutarch tells us, that Sylla divorced his wife Metella a little before ſhe died, and cauſed her to be conveyed into another houſe, that his own, as he was then pontifex and augur, might not be defiled with funeral ceremonies (36). But we are apt to believe, that Tiberius did not, out friends, they abandoned that ſolitude diſmal to their ſight and memory, and, full of reſentment, advanced againſt the author of ſo many evils, who, underſtanding that he was purſued by Germanicus, retired, and encamped in an advantageous poſt cloſe to the woods. The Roman general followed him, and coming up with him, ordered his cavalry to advance and diſlodge him. Arminius, at the approach of the Roman horſe, pretended to fly; but wheeling ſuddenly about, and at the ſame time giving the ſignal to a body of troops, which he had concealed in the foreſt, to ruſh out, he fell upon the enemy with ſuch vigor, that the Roman cavalry, not able to ſtand the ſhock, began to give way. Germanicus immediately detached ſome cohorts to their relief; but they too were ſoon put in diſorder and broken, more by their own men who fled, than by the enemy. Arminius, taking advantage of the confuſion the Romans were in, doubled his efforts, and would have puſhed them into a moraſs, had not Germanicus advanced at the head of his legions in order of battle. Arminius, finding his men already tired, did not think it adviſeable to engage the freſh legions, and therefore retired in good order, leaving the Romans maſters of the field. Germanicus, not judging it ſafe to purſue the enemy through pathleſs woods and foreſts, contented himſelf with this ſmall advantage, and returned with the army to the river Amiſia. There he embarqued with four legions, ordered Cæcina to reconduct the other four by land, and ſent the cavalry to the ſea-ſide, with orders to march along the ſhore to the Rhine. Tho' Cæcina was to return through roads well known, yet Germanicus warned him to paſs with all poſſible ſpeed the cauſway called "the "long bridges (F). Cæcina made what haſte he could; but out of any principle of religion, find fault with Germanicus's conduct; for he little mattered the gods or their rites, being himſelf a fataliſt, and poſſeſſed with notions of aſtrology. What diſpleaſed him was, that Germanicus, by ſo popular an action, had gained the hearts of the ſoldiery and Roman people.

(F) Tacitus tells us, that this cauſway was made by Lucius Domitius, who, according to that writer, led an army over the Elbe, and advanced farther into Germany than any Roman before him, which procured him the enſigns of triumph. Whence we conclude him to be have been the grandfather of Nero; for Suetonius, in his life of that emperor, tells us, that Lucius Domitius his grandfather was no leſs famous for his dexterity in driving but nevertheless Arminius arrived there before him. This cauſway led croſs vaſt marſhes, ſurrounded on all ſides with woods and hills, which gently roſe from the plain. The woods Arminius had already filled with his men, who, as ſoon as Cæcina approached, ruſhing out fell upon him with ſuch fury, that the legions, not able to manage their arms in the deep waters and ſlippery ground, were already yielding, and would in all likelihood have been entirely defeated, had not night coming on ſoon put an end to the combat. The Germans, encouraged with their ſucceſs, inſtead of refreſhing themſelves with ſleep, employed the whole night in diverting the courſes of the ſprings riſing in the neighbouring mountains, and turning them into the plains; ſo that the camp, which the Romans had begun, was all on a ſudden laid under water, and their works overturned. We may well imagine what a melancholy night they paſſed under theſe circumſtances. We are told, that Cæcina himſelf was terrified with a frightful dream: he thought he ſaw Quintilius Varus riſing out of the marſh beſmeared with blood, ſtretching forth his hand, and calling upon him; but that he rejected the invitation, and puſhed him away. Cæcina had ſerved either as a common ſoldier, or as an officer, forty years, was well experienced in all the viciſſitudes of war, and thence undaunted even in the greateſt dangers. Having therefore calmly weighed with himſelf all proper expedients for the preſent conjuncture, he at length reſolved to attack the barbarians the next day, to drive them to their woods, and there keep them in a manner beſieged, till the baggage and the wounded men had paſſed the cauſway, and were out of the enemy's reach. With this view at break of day he drew up his legions, placing the fifth in the right wing, the one-and-twentieth in the left, the firſt in the van, and the twentieth in the rear. But the legions poſted on the wings, ſeized with a ſudden fear, as ſoon as day began to appear, driving chariots, than for the triumphal ornaments which he acquired by his conduct in the German war (37). This cauſway, according to Lipſius, led croſs the marſhes between Lingen, Wedden and Coeverden, where ſome remains of it are ſtill lying under water. Theſe marſhes are now known to the Dutch by the name of Bretanſcheheyde, that is, the marſhes of Bretan (38).

appear, deſerted their ſtations, and took poſſeſſion of a field beyond the marſhes. Cæcina thought it adviſeable to follow them; but the baggage ſticking in the mire, as he croſſed the marſhes, and the ſoldiers about it being embarraſſed and in great diſorder, Arminius laid hold of this opportunity to begin the attack; and crying out, "This is a ſecond "Varus; the ſame fate attends him and his legions," he ruſhes upon them at the head of a choſen body with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. As he had ordered his men to aim chiefly at the enemy's horſes, great numbers of them were killed, and the ground becoming ſlippery with their blood and the ſlime of the marſh, the reſt either fell, or caſting their riders and galloping among the ranks, put them into diſorder. Cæcina on this occaſion diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner; but his horſe being killed under him, he would have been taken priſoner, had not the firſt legion reſcued him. The greedineſs of the enemy was what ſaved Cæcina and his legions from utter deſtruction; for while they were already yielding and quite ſpent, the barbarians all on a ſudden abandoned them to ſeize the baggage. The Romans, during this reſpite, ſtruggled out of the marſh, and gaining the dry fields, tired as they were, formed with all poſſible ſpeed a camp there, and fortified it in the beſt manner they could.

The Romans ſaved by the greedineſs of the enemy.

And now the legionaries, quite ſpent and exhauſted, retired to repoſe themſelves a while after ſo fatiguing a combat. But their repoſe was ſoon interrupted by an accident, which, as it cauſed a general alarm in the camp, ſhews what fear and terror had ſeized them. An horſe having broken looſe and being frightened with the noiſe, as he ſtrayed about, ran over ſome who were in his way. As this happened when it was dark, it raiſed ſuch a conſternation among the legionaries, imagining that the Germans had broke into the camp, that they all ran to the gate Decumana, which was fartheſt from the enemy, in order to make their eſcape. Cæcina, having learned the true cauſe of this general uproar, endeavoured to ſtop the fugitives, aſſuring them, that their fear was quite groundleſs; but none of them hearkening to him, he flung himſelf at length croſs the gate. The awe and reſpect they had for their general reſtrained them from running over his body, and put a ſtop to their flight; and, in the mean time, the tribunes and centurions ſatisfied them, that it was a falſe alarm. Then Cæcina, calling them together, told them, that they muſt be indebted for their lives to their valour; but that their valour ought to be tempered with art; that they muſt keep cloſe within their camp till the Germans attempted to ſtorm it, and then make a ſudden ſally, break through the enemy, and purſue their march to the Rhine. This, he told them, was the only means of retrieving their glory, or ſaving their lives. In the mean time, it was reſolved in the German camp, purſuant to the advice of Inguiomerus, to attack the Roman entrenchments the next morning, no-body doubting, except Arminius, but they might be eaſily forced. That commander, no leſs prudent than brave, was for ſuffering the Romans quietly to depart, and falling upon them on their march, when embarraſſed again amongſt foreſts and marſhes. But the advice of Inguiomerus prevailing, as ſoon as it was light, the Germans beſet the camp, and, having filled the ditches, were already climbing up the ramparts, when Cæcina ordered the ſignal to be given to the cohorts, who, ſallying out with loud ſhouts, fell upon the aggreſſors, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of them, while they were buſy in ſcaling the entrenchments. The Germans, who imagined that few Romans were remaining, and had therefore promiſed themſelves an eaſy victory, were ſo ſurpriſed and frightened at this ſudden and altogether unexpected attack, that they immediately betook themſelves to a ſhameful flight. The Romans purſued them, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives. Arminius had the good luck to eſcape unhurt; but Inguiomerus was dangerouſly wounded. After this the Germans, as deſtitute of conduct in diſtreſs, as void of moderation in proſperity, appeared no more; ſo that Cæcina purſued his march unmoleſted to the Rhine [1].

The Germans put to flight.

In the mean time, a report being ſpread, that the Roman forces were cut in pieces, and a German army in full march to invade Gaul, ſome timorous partizans of Rome were for breaking down the bridge which the Romans had built over the Rhine near Treves; but Agrippina who ſtill continued in that city, not giving credit to the public report, oppoſed with a manly courage the execution of this deſign, and preſerved the bridge. She had ſoon after the ſatisfaction to ſee the legions under Cæcina, which were ſuppoſed to have met with the ſame fate as thoſe of Varus, arrive, ill-treated indeed and extremely fatigued, but victorious. As they drew near, this undaunted heroine went out with her ſon Caligula to receive them; and, ſtanding at the head of the the bridge, commended, as they paſſed, their gallant behaviour, and returned them thanks for it in a moſt obliging manner; nay, in the abſence of her huſband, ſhe diſcharged all the duties of a general, relieved the neceſſities of the ſoldiers, beſtowed medicines on the wounded, ſupplied ſome with cloaths, and to all extended the effects of her unbounded generoſity. This behaviour, however commendable, rouſed the jealouſy of Tiberius: It is not, ſaid he, againſt foreigners only that ſhe thus ſtudies to win the affections of the ſoldiery; ſhe has already given manifeſt proofs of her aſpiring views, in carrying her child, the general's ſon, about the camp in the habit of a common ſoldier, with the title of Cæſar Caligula. Sejanus, who was well acquainted with the diſtruſtful temper of Tiberius, and already entertained ambitious deſigns, which he could not compaſs without the deſtruction of Germanicus's family, with his groundleſs and ill-natured ſuggeſtions heightened the emperor's jealouſies, and ſowed in his mind the ſeeds of an irreconcileable hatred againſt Agrippina.

The jealouſy of Tiberius.

In the mean time, Germanicus, having conveyed the four legions he had with him down the Amiſia into the ocean, in order to return by ſea to the Rhine, and finding that his veſſels were overloaded, delivered the ſecond and fourteenth legions to Publius Vitellius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to reconduct them by land. But this march proved fatal to great numbers of them, either buried in the quick-ſands, or ſwallowed up by the billows and overflowing tide, to which they were utter ſtrangers. Thoſe who eſcaped loſt their arms, utenſils, and proviſions, and paſſed a melancholy night on an eminence, which they had gained wading up to the chin. The next morning, the land returning with the tide of ebb, Vitellius with an haſty march reached the river Uſingis, which ſome judicious critics take for the Hoerenſter, on which ſtands the preſent city of Groeningen. There Germanicus, who had reached that river with his fleet, took the two legions again on board, and conveyed them to the mouth of the Rhine, whence they all returned to the city of the Ubii, or Cologne, when fame had given them for loſt. Germanicus on his arrival found in that city Sigimerus, the brother of Segeſtes, with his ſon Seſithacus, who, having renounced the confederacy of their countrymen, were come to implore the clemency of the Romans, and enter into an alliance with them. The father, though one of the chief authors of the revolt, was kindly received by Germanicus; but it was with much ado that he prevailed upon himſelf to pardon the ſon, who was ſaid to have inſulted the dead body of the unfortunate Varus. In this expedition Germanicus gained no great advantages, and loſt a vaſt number of men. The greater part of thoſe, who had eſcaped ſo many dangers, returned without arms, horſes, utenſils, &c. half-naked, lamed, and unfit for the ſervice; but the fame of his name and amiable qualities having already filled both the Gauls, Spain, and Italy, the inhabitants of theſe countries ſtrove who ſhould be moſt forward in ſupplying him with arms, horſes, money, and whatever elſe was neceſſary for the proſecution of the war. Germanicus thanked them for their zeal; but accepted only the horſes and arms, defraying the other charges of the war with his own money. We ſhall ſoon ſee what ſucceſs attended him in this war: but let us return, in the mean time, to Tiberius.

THOUGH the jealous emperor repined at the glory of the brave Germanicus, yet, glad of his ſucceſs, he confirmed to him the title of imperator, which the legions had beſtowed on him, and decreed the triumphal ornaments to Aulus Cæcina, Lucius Apronius, and Caius Silius, three of his lieutenants, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the reſt. To gain to himſelf the affections of the people, which ſeemed to centre wholly in Germanicus, he affected popularity, rejecting the pompous titles offered him by the ſenate, relieving the diſtreſſed with great generoſity, and eaſing the inhabitants both of Rome and the provinces of ſeveral taxes, with which Auguſtus had burdened them. A ſenator, by name Pius Aurelius, his houſe falling, had recourſe to the ſenate for relief. The prætors of the treaſury oppoſed his ſuit; but nevertheleſs Tiberius, who, as Tacitus obſerves, was generous upon honeſt occaſions, even after he had renounced all other virtues, ordered him the price of his houſe. Propertius Celer, once prætor, deſiring to reſign the ſenatorial dignity, as too burdenſome to his ſmall eſtate, Tiberius, upon information that his misfortunes were owing to his father, and not to himſelf, preſented him with a thouſand great ſeſterces. The Tiber having overflowed the lower parts of the city, he cauſed the bed of that river to be cleanſed, and appointed according to Dion five, according to Tacitus only two, magiſtrates of the ſenatorial order, whoſe whole buſineſs was to watch the overflowing of the Tiber, and reſtrain it within its banks. Theſe magiſtrates were for diverting the chanels of the ſeveral rivers and lakes by which it was ſwelled; but this project met with great oppoſition in the ſenate, where it was reſolved, that nothing ſhould be altered, the direction of nature, which appointed to rivers their courſes and diſcharges, being, as it was ſuggeſted, beſt in all natural things. The provinces of Achaia and Macedon, begging to be eaſed of their public burdens, were this year taken from the ſenate and given to the emperor (G). Hence it is manifeſt, that the government of the proprætors, who commanded in the provinces immediately ſubject to the emperor, was leſs burdenſome than that of the proconſuls, who were ſent into the ſenatorial provinces; but in what the one was more chargeable than the other, we are no-where told. Thus Tiberius affected popularity; but nevertheleſs did not acquire the reputation of being truly popular, having this very year revived the law of "treaſon" or "majeſty" with relation to libels or words; a law above all others execrable to the people, ſince by it thoſe, who wrote or ſpoke any thing reflecting on the emperor, were deemed guilty of high treaſon. In the times of the republic, ſays Tacitus, actions were puniſhed, but words were free. Auguſtus was the firſt, as we have related above, who brought words under the penalties of this law; and Tiberius, exaſperated by ſatyrical verſes diſperſed about the city, expoſing his cruelty, his pride, and the miſunderſtanding which already began between him and his mother (H), thought it neceſſary to revive this dreadful law; a law

(G) Achaia and Macedon were afterwards reſtored by the emperor Caius to the ſenate (39). Hence we read in the Acts, that Gallio was proconſul of Achaia at the end of that prince's reign (40).

(H) The verſes were as follows:

which occaſioned under him and his ſucceſſors ſo much blood-ſhed in Rome and all the parts of the empire. He did it, however, with great addreſs, and freely forgave the firſt criminals; for, being aſked by Pompeius Macer the prætor, whether, in the execution of his office, he ſhould proceed againſt the authors of libels as guilty of treaſon, he anſwered, "The "laws muſt be executed." Tiberius's anſwer was no ſooner known, than ſeveral perſons were proſecuted upon this law, the emperor having as he was naturally ſuſpicious and diſtruſtful, his ſpies and emiſſaries diſperſed all over the city. Some of theſe accuſed Falanius, a Roman knight, of having admitted into his houſe, where he had erected an altar in honour of Auguſtus, among the other adorers of the deified emperor, one Caſſius a pantomime, infamous for his debaucheries. To this charge they added another, viz. that having ſold his gardens, he had ſold with them the ſtatue of Auguſtus. Rubrius, another Roman knight, was charged with ſwearing falſly by the divinity of Auguſtus. Tiberius, well ſatisfied with having reſtored this law to its former vigor, and by that means checked the freedom of ſpeech and the licentiouſneſs of libellers, would not allow any puniſhment to be inflicted on the pretended criminals; but wrote to the conſuls, that the ſenate, in beſtowing divine honours on his father, did not intend thereby to lay a ſnare for the people; that his mother Livia had never excluded Caſſius, nor others of his profeſſion, from the ſcenic ſports, which ſhe conſecrated to the memory of Auguſtus; that it did not affect religion to comprehend his ſtatue, as well as the images of other gods, in the ſale of houſes and gardens; that as to the ſwearing falſly by his name, it was a crime of the ſame nature, as if Rubrius had profaned the name of Jupiter: but that it belonged to the gods to puniſh affronts offered to the gods. By theſe anſwers, judicious in themſelves and in appearance full of clemency and moderation, Tiberius hoped to decline the odium, which the revival of ſuch a dangerous and enſnaring law carried along with it. But notwithſtanding all his art, it was not long ere he betrayed his real intention, and plainly ſhewed, that he deſigned to make more account of ſuch informations informations than he would then have believed; for ſoon after Granius Marcellus, prætor, or rather proprætor, of Bithynia, being charged with high treaſon of this nature by his own queſtor Cæpio Criſpinus, Tiberius, in a manner forgetting himſelf, flew into a violent paſſion, and in that ſudden tranſport was for condemning without further enquiry the pretended criminal. Marcellus was accuſed of having ſpoke with diſreſpect of the emperor; and the accuſer, to render his accuſation more credible, collecting whatever was moſt deteſtable in the prince's character, alledged it as the expreſſions of the accuſed. To this he added, that Marcellus had placed his own ſtatue higher than thoſe of the Cæſars; and that having taken the head from off the ſtatue of Auguſtus, he had placed the head of Tiberius in its room. This enraged him to ſuch a degree, that, no longer able to diſſemble his reſentment, he cried out, That he would himſelf in this cauſe give his vote openly and upon his oath. Hereupon Cneius Piſo aſked him, "In what place, Cæſar, will you "chuſe to give your opinion? If firſt, I ſhall have your "example to follow; if laſt, I am afraid I may diſagree "with you." Theſe words touched Tiberius to the quick; nevertheleſs he bore them patiently, being aſhamed of his tranſport, and ſuffered Marcellus to be acquitted of high treaſon [m] (H). It was not out of any principle of religion, nor from any regard to Auguſtus, that Tiberius was for puniſhing the ſuppoſed crimes againſt his godhead, but becauſe he apprehended the ſame affronts might be one day offered to himſelf. We ſhall ſee in the couſe of this hiſtory with what

(H) Suetonius tells us, that he was condemned. His words are: "About the ſame time the prætor having aſked him, Whether he would have the judges to hear and determine matters "of high treaſon, he replied, The laws muſt take their courſe; "and he was as good as his word, for from that time they "were executed with the utmoſt ſeverity. Diſſentions of the theatre.

THE diſſenſions of the theatre, which had begun the year before, broke out now with great violence, and rent almoſt the whole city into factions and parties, ſome protecting one player, and ſome another; nay, the oppoſite parties often came to blows, and turned the play-houſe into a field of battle. In one of theſe frays, ſeveral, not of the people only, were killed, but of the ſoldiers who attended in the play-houſe and at the gate to prevent diſturbances, and among them a centurion; even the tribune of a prætorian cohort was wounded, while he was endeavouring to ſecure the magiſtrates from inſults, and to quell the licentious rabble. The ſenate took this affair into conſideration, and ſeveral expedients were propoſed for the preventing of ſuch riots. The majority were for impowering the prætors to whip the players, who, as was ſuppoſed, were the chief authors of theſe tumults. But Haterius Agrippa, tribune of the people, oppoſed this motion, alledging, that Auguſtus, upon a certain occaſion had declared, that players ſhould not be whipt; and indeed that emperor, who took great delight in ſuch diverſions, had, as Suetonius informs us [n], and we have hinted above, reſtrained the power of puniſhing the players, which, by an antient law, the magiſtrates had till that time exerciſed over them in all places and ages. Aſinius Gallus with great ſharpneſs reprimanded the tribune for his oppoſition; which, however, prevailed out of reſpect to Auguſtus, whoſe laws were to be inviolably obſerved.

Laws for the curbing of the inſolence of players.

In order therefore to curb the inſolence of the players, their wages were, by a decree of the ſenate, curtailed; and it was moreover enacted, that no ſenator ſhould viſit a player, that no Roman knight ſhould attend them abroad, and that they ſhould act no-where but in the theatre or public play-houſe. What gave occaſion to this decree was, the great court which the nobility paid them; for not only the people, but knights and ſenators, as Pliny informs us [o], attended their levees, and waited upon them when they went abroad. Hence Seneca called the nobility of his time "the ſlaves of the pantomimes [p]." They acted not only in the public theatre, but in private houſes, gardens &c. drawing after them vaſt crowds, and by that means heaping up immenſe wealth. The above-mentioned decrees of

of the ſenate were therefore well calculated to humble their pride, and check that inſolence which naturally ariſes, eſpecially in perſons of a mean condition, from wealth and honours. As to the ſpectators, the prætors were impowered to puniſh with baniſhment ſuch of them as ſhould raiſe the leaſt diſturbance in the theatre [q]. Thus was an end put for a while to theſe riots and tumults. This year Tiberius diſcharged the legacies which Auguſtus had left to the people; but ſullied the glory naturally accruing from ſo plauſible and popular an action, by another equally baſe and cruel, for as he ſeemed not to be in haſte to ſatisfy the people, a merry jeſter ſeeing a dead body carried by to the grave, accoſting the bier, and pretending to whiſper in the ear of the deceaſed, ſaid aloud, "Remember to let Auguſtus know, that "the legacies which he left to the people, are not yet paid." This pleaſantry being related to Tiberius, he commanded the jeſter to be brought to him; and, having paid him his full due, cauſed him to be put to death immediately, telling him, That he ſhould go himſelf to Auguſtus, ſince he could give him freſher accounts than the deceaſed. However, a few days after, he paid the legacy [r]. This ſame year, the people entreating him to eaſe them of the tax of one per cent, eſtabliſhed at the end of the civil wars upon all vendible commodities, he declared by an edict, that the fund for maintaining the army (I) depended entirely upon this tax; and that even thus the republic would not be able to defray the vaſt charges attending the final diſmiſſion of veterans before the twentieth year of their ſervice. By this decree, the

(I) This fund is called by Suetonius, "ærarium militare," the "military treaſury:" "That the ſoldiers, ſays that writer, "ſpeaking of Auguſtus, when diſcharged, might not be tempted "to raiſe diſturbances by their age and poverty, he aſſigned to "each of them an allowance according to the time and quality "of their ſervice; and that the province allotted them might be "eaſy and perpetual, he eſtabliſhed a military treaſury, and im-"poſed new tributes for their maintenance (41)." The ſuperintendency of this fund was committed to three perſons, as Dio informs us (42), who had been prætors, choſen by lot, and continued in the office three years. They were ſtyled "prefects," or "ſuperintendants of the military treaſury," as we gather from the following inſcription on an antient marble found in Samnium: "L. Neratio C. F. Vol. Proculo, Præ. conceſſions made to the ſoldiery, during the late ſedition, were implicitly revoked, and they obliged to ſerve twenty years as before, inſtead of ſixteen [s]. Thus Tiberius, even while he was ſtudying to win the hearts of the people and ſoldiery, gave them juſt motives to complain of his preſent, and to dread his future, behaviour. Let us now leave Tiberius for a while, and return to Germanicus.

Revokes the conceſſions granted to the ſoldiery.

THAT brave prince ſpent the winter, when Siſenna Statilius and Lucius Scribonius Libo were conſuls, in vaſt preparations for another expedition into Germany, having his heart and mind wholly bent on the entire reduction of that vaſt continent. He weighed with himſelf the methods he had hitherto purſued in that war, the misfortunes and ſucceſſes which had attended him ſince he firſt undertook it; and finding that the Germans were chiefly indebted for their ſafety to their woods and marſhes, to their ſhort ſummers and early winters, and that his own men ſuffered more from their long and tedious marches than from the enemy, he reſolved to enter the country by ſea, hoping by that means to begin the campaign earlier and ſurpriſe the enemy. Having therefore built, with great diſpatch during the winter, a thouſand veſſels of different ſorts (K), early in the ſpring Germanicus ordered them to fall down the Rhine, appointing the iſland of the Batavians (L) for the (K) Some of theſe veſſels, ſays Tacitus, were ſhort, ſharp at both ends, and wide in the middle. Veſſels of this kind are ſtill in uſe among the Dutch. Some had flat bottoms, that they might run aground without danger. Several had rudders at each end, that the rowers might, only by turning their oars, work them either way. This kind of veſſels, now no longer in uſe, Tacitus deſcribes in his book of the "manners of the "Germans," and likewiſe in his hiſtory, where he ſtyles them "cameræ" (42).

(L) Tacitus deſcribes the iſland of the Batavians thus: The Rhine, ſays he, flowing in one chanel, or only broken by ſmall iſlands, is divided at its entering Batavia, as it were, into two rivers. One continues its courſe through Germany, retaining the ſame name and violent current, till it falls into the ocean. The other, waſhing the coaſt of Gaul with a broader and more gentle ſtream, is called by the inhabitants Vahales; which name it ſoon changes for that of the Moſa, by the immenſe mouth of which river it diſcharges itſelf into the ſame ocean; ſo that, as the place of the general rendezvous, as the moſt convenient for receiving the forces, and conveying them from thence to thoſe parts of Germany which he deſigned to invade. While the fleet ſailed, Germanicus detached Silius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to make a ſudden irruption into the country of the Catti, and in the mean time he himſelf, upon intelligence that a Roman fort upon the Luppia was beſieged by the enemy, haſtened with ſix legions to its relief. Silius was prevented by ſudden rains from doing more than taking ſome ſmall booty, with the wife and daughter of Arpus prince of the Catti; neither did thoſe who had inveſted the fort ſtay till Germanicus arrived, but, upon the news of his approach, breaking up the ſiege, fled and diſperſed. However, in their retreat, they threw down the monument lately raiſed in honour of Varus and his legions, and alſo an altar formerly erected to Druſus (M). The altar Germanicus reſtored, and performed with the legions the funeral ceremony of running round it to the honour of his father, according to the antient cuſtom (O); but not thinking fit to ſet up the momument again, he fortified with new works the whole ſpace between the fort, which the enemy had beſieged, according to Tacitus, the iſland of the Batavians was bounded by the ocean, the Rhine, and the Vahales, now the Wale. Cæſar extends it to the Moſa or Meuſe (43); but Pliny agrees with Tacitus (44). However, the iſland of the Batavians was of greater extent in Tacitus's time than in Cæſar's, Druſus, the father of Germanicus, having, by a new canal, conveyed the waters of the Rhine into the ocean a conſiderable way north of the former mouth of that river. By this means the antient chanel being dried and filled up, the iſland of the Batavians extended to the new canal (45).

(M) Dio and Suetonius tell us, that a monument was erected in honour of Druſus upon the banks of the Rhine. Some writers place the altar mentioned here cloſe to this monument, and both at Mentz; but it is manifeſt from this paſſage in Tacitus, that the altar ſtood not on the Rhine, but between that river and the Lyppe.

(O) The ceremony of celebrating the funerals of great men with races, was practiſed in Homer's time, and is deſcribed by moſt of the antient poets, among the reſt very minutely by Statius (46). Livy tells us, that this ceremony obtained even amongſt the Carthaginians (47).

ſieged, the Aliſo, now the Yſſel, and the Rhine (P). In the mean time, the fleet arriving at the iſland of the Batavians, the proviſions and warlike engines were put on board and ſent forward; ſhips were aſſigned to the legions and allies, and the whole army being embarqued, the fleet entered the canal formerly cut by Druſus, and from his name called "Foſſa Druſiana, or the canal of Druſus (Q)." Here

(P) Some commentators take Aliſo to be the name of the fort, and read Tacitus thus, "cuncta inter caſtellum Aliſonem, & "Rhenum, &c." but Vertranius, Freinſhemius, and Lipſius, "cuncta inter caſtellum, Aliſonem, & Rhenum," more agreeable perhaps to what we read in Dion Caſſius, who tells us, that Druſus built a fort at the conflux of the Lupias and the Aliſo (48). The latter river, now known by the name of Alme, runs at a ſmall diſtance from the city of Paderborne.

(Q) The Foſſa Druſiana was a canal cut by Druſus to convey the waters of the Rhine into the Sala, now the Sale, and from thence through the lake Flevus into the ocean. It extended eight miles, from the preſent village of Iſeloort to the town of Doeſburg, and was very convenient for the conveying of the Roman troops by water, to the countries of the Friſii and the Chauci. It was this convenience that put Druſus upon ſuch an undertaking. By means of this new canal the Rhine came to have three branches, and to diſcharge itſelf into the ocean by three ſeparate and diſtinct mouths, of which the northern was called Oſtium Flevum, the weſtern Oſtium Helium, and the middle Oſtium Medium or Oſtium Rheni. Cæſar, in deſcribing the courſe of the Rhine, ſays, that it diſcharges itſelf into the ocean by many months; but he was therein miſtaken, depending probably on the accounts of others, or taking the canals, which were cut for the draining of the neighbouring lands, for mouths of the Rhine. It was well known to the geographers of his time, that the Rhine emptied itſelf into the ocean by two mouths only; for Strabo, who maintains this opinion, confirms it with the authority of Aſinius Pollio, who was contemporary with Cæſar (49). Hence Virgil gives the Rhine the epithet of bicornis, or two-horned. By means of the canal cut by Druſus between the north branch of the Rhine and the Sala, theſe two rivers ran in one chanel to the lake Flevus, and from thence emptied themſelves into the ocean. This mouth was called Oſtium Flevum. Tacitus and Mela, who wrote after Druſus's time, mention only two months, viz. the Flevum and Helium, the middle one being very inconſiderable and almoſt quite choaked up, after the ſtream was by the Foſſa Druſiana conveyed into the Sala.

(48) Dio, l. liv. (49) Strabo, l. iv. p. 133.

Here the pious general did not forget to invoke the manes of his father, beſeeching him to encourage with his example, and inſpire with wholſome counſels, his ſon, who was following his footſteps. Hence he ſailed proſperouſly through lakes (R) and the ocean to the Amiſia or Ems, and having landed his troops at the mouth of that river (S), marched ſtrait to the Viſurgis or Weſer. While he was encamped on the banks of that river, news was brought him, that the Angrivarii (T) had revolted behind him. Hereupon he immediately diſpatched a body of horſe and light-armed foot againſt them, under the command of Stertinius, who with fire and ſword ſpread deſolation throughout their country. In the mean time, the famous Arminius, being informed of Germanicus's deſign, appeared on the oppoſite bank of the Viſurgis (U) at the head

Arrives at the Amiſia.

(R) From this and ſeveral other paſſages in Tacitus, it is manifeſt, that, in former times, there were ſeveral lakes in this country, though, at preſent, there is but one, called in the language of the country, the South Sea.

(S) In this place Tacitus charges Germanicus with two overſights. The firſt is, that he landed his troops too near the mouth of the river, by which means they ſuffered much upon the return of the tide, which reached and overflowed the plain where they landed. The other is, that he landed them on the wrong ſide of the river, ſo that many days were ſpent in making bridges. That Germanicus, not yet well acquainted with the flux and reflux of the ocean, was guilty of the firſt miſtake, is not unlikely; but that he ſhould land his men on the ſide of the river moſt remote from the enemy, and then conſume many days in making bridges to convey them over, is a blunder ſo palpable and notorious, that we could hardly charge with it the moſt unthinking man of his army, much leſs a perſon of his penetration and forecaſt. We ſhall therefore conclude, without entering into the long and tedious diſputes of the critics, that this paſſage is not genuine, but has been ſome way or other maimed and corrupted.

(T) The Angrivarii had often changed their habitation, as Tacitus informs us (48); but at this time dwelt, as is manifeſt from the paſſage before us, between the Amiſia and Viſurgis. Some modern geographers think, they poſſeſſed part of the preſent province of Overyſſel, of the country of Benthem, and of the dioceſe of Paderborne.

(U) The Viſurgis, as Lipſius obſerves in this place, is chiefly indebted to Tacitus for its fame, and Tacitus for his to the Viſurgis head of his Cheruſci, determined to diſpute with the Romans the paſſage of the river. However, before hoſtilities began on either ſide, he aſked, whether Germanicus was come; and being anſwered that he was, he begged leave to ſpeak with his brother, who, under the name of Flavius, had long ſerved in the Roman army, and had loſt an eye in fighting under Tiberius. His requeſt being granted, Flavius advanced; and Arminius, having firſt ſaluted him and ordered his own attendants to withdraw, deſired, that the Roman archers, who were drawn up cloſe to the bank of the river, might likewiſe retire. When they were removed, "How came you, brother, by this deformity in "your countenance?" ſaid Arminius. Flavius having told him in what place and battle he had loſt his eye; "And "what reward," aſked Arminius in the next place, "have "you received for ſo dangerous a warfare? Increaſe of pay," anſwered Flavius, "a crown, a chain, and other military "gifts;" which Arminius treating with deriſion and ſtyling the vile wages of ſlavery, a warm conteſt aroſe between the two brothers, the one extolling the greatneſs of the Romans, the power of the emperor, the unhappy condition of the conquered, the Roman clemency to ſuch as ſubmitted, the kind treatment of the wife and ſon of Arminius, not uſed like captives, &c. Arminius, on the other hand, alledged the rights of their common country, their antient liberty, the gods of their anceſtors, beſeeching him by their common mother not to prefer the name of a traitor, of a betrayer of his friends, relations, and country, to that of their general and commander. By degrees they came to reproaches, and, though parted by the river, would have come to blows, had not Stertinius laid hold of Flavius, and reſtrained him, calling for his horſe and armour. On the oppoſite bank, Arminius, ſwelled with rage, was heard to utter dreadful threats, and menace the Romans as he departed with an approaching battle; for with his native language he mingled many Latin words, which he had learnt while he ſerved as general of his countrymen in the Roman armies [t].

An interview between Arminius and his brother.

THE next day, the German army appeared on the oppoſite bank of the Viſurgis in order of battle. But Germanicus

nicus, not thinking it adviseable to attack them, ordered the horse to ford over under the conduct of Stertinius and Æmilius, who, to divide the enemy's forces, crossed the river in distant places. At the same time Cariovalda, leader of the Batavians, passed it where it was most rapid; but being drawn into an ambuscade by the enemy and surrounded on all sides, he fell under a shower of darts, while he was with incredible bravery attempting to break through the enemy's numerous battalions. Many of the Batavian nobility fell round him; the rest were saved either by their own bravery, or by the cavalry of Stertinius and Æmilius, who, upon the first notice of their danger, flew to the relief of their distressed allies. Germanicus having, during this skirmish, passed the Visurgis without molestation, was informed by a deserter, that Arminius, being joined by several German nations, had resolved to attack his camp by night. Hereupon the Roman general sent out scouts to reconnoitre, who, upon their return, reported, that they had heard a great noise of men and horses, and discerned the enemy's fires in a neighbouring wood. Then Germanicus, no longer doubting, but they designed to venture a decisive battle, in order to be informed in this critical conjuncture of the real inclinations of his soldiers, and not to depend on the reports of the tribunes and centurions, who were often apt to conceal the truth and relate only what was pleasing, in the beginning of the night, went out of the prætorium in disguise, only with one attendant; and listening from tent to tent to the discourses of the soldiery, while over their meals they frankly disclosed their hopes and fears, he had the satisfaction to hear his own praises in every one's mouth, and the soldiers encouraging each other to exert themselves in the approaching battle, out of gratitude to so deserving a general. While Germanicus was thus agreeably employed, one of the Germans, who spoke Latin, riding up to the Roman entrenchments, offered in the name of Arminius to every deserter, a wife, land, and an hundred sesterces a day, as long as the war lasted. This offer the legions looked upon as an affront; and, full of rage and resentment, "Let day come," said they, "we will "seize their lands; we will take, not receive, German "wives." About the third watch the enemy approached; but finding the Romans ready to receive them, they retired without discharging a single dart. Early next morning, Germanicus, having assembled his troops, acquainted them them with his deſign, which was to put an end to ſo tedious and fatiguing a war with a deciſive battle; made them ſenſible of their advantage over the enemy both as to their arms and manner of fighting; repreſented the Germans as men of a frightful aſpect and violent in the beginning of the battle; but diſheartened with wounds, unaffected with their own diſgrace, unconcerned for their general, cowards in diſtreſs, in proſperity deſpiſers of all divine and human laws. In the end of his ſpeech he exhorted his men to put an end to ſo great fatigues by ſea, to their tedious marches by land, by making him conquer in thoſe very countries, where his father and uncle had conquered. His harangue inſpired the whole army with great ardour, which was expreſſed with a general ſhout and loud acclamations. Neither did Arminius and the other German chiefs neglect to animate their reſpective corps, and encourage them, either to maintain by their bravery the liberty they had received from their anceſtors, or to prevent ſlavery by a glorious death. Having thus animated their men, they led them calling for battle into a plain called Indiſtaviſus (W), which was bounded on one ſide by the Viſurgis, and on the other by a ridge of hills. Behind this plain was a foreſt of tall trees, thick of branches above, but clear of buſhes below. The Germans were all drawn up on the plain and at the entrance of the foreſt, except the Cheruſci, who were poſted on the hills, and ordered to fall upon the Romans from thence in the heat of the fight. Germanicus had ſcarce entered the plain with his troops in battle array, when he obſerved the Cheruſci, impatient of delays, pouring down the hills. Hereupon he commanded a choſen body of horſe to charge them in flank, and at the ſame time detached Stertinius with the reſt of the cavalry, ordering him to wheel about and fall upon their rear (X). In the mean while, the Roman infantry advancing

He engages the enemy.

(W) Lipſius, who ſurveyed with great care, and no leſs pleaſure, the places here deſcribed by Tacitus, takes the plain called by him Indiſtaviſus to be that plain, which begins at a village called Vegeſack, about two German miles from the city of Breme, and extends a great way towards the ſea, between a ridge of hills and the Weſer.

(X) Tacitus tells us, that as the troops were marching towards the enemy, eight eagles were ſeen to fly towards the wood and enter it; which Germanicus looking upon as a preſage of victory, "Advance," he cried, "follow the Roman birds; follow the tutelar gods of the legions.

advancing attacked the enemy in front with ſuch vigor, that the Germans, not able to ſtand the ſhock, immediately gave ground. Thoſe who were poſted at the entrance of the foreſt fled to the plain, and thoſe in the plain to the foreſt. The Cheruſci alone maintained the fight, being encouraged by the example of the valiant Arminius, who, though wounded, would have broke through the Roman archers, had not the auxiliary cohorts of the Rhætians, Vindelicians, and Gauls haſtened to their relief. However, by his own valour and the ſwiftneſs of his horſe, he eſcaped the preſent danger, having firſt dyed his face with his own blood, to avoid being known. Some writers have related, that the Chauci, who ſerved in the Roman army, having known him, ſuffered him to retire unmoleſted. The ſame bravery or connivance procured Inguiomerus's eſcape; the reſt were either cut in pieces, or drowned in attempting to ſwim croſs the Viſurgis. The ſlaughter laſted from morning till night, and the country was covered ten miles round with arms and dead bodies. Among the ſpoils chains were found, which they had brought, not doubting of ſucceſs, to bind the Roman captives. The Romans were no ſooner returned from the purſuit, than Germanicus, aicribing the whole glory of ſo remarkable a victory to Tiberius, under whoſe auſpices he had fought, cauſed him to be proclaimed emperor on the field of battle, and raiſing a mount, placed upon it as trophies the arms of the enemy, and inſcribed underneath the names of the conquered nations [u].

The Germans defeated with great ſlaughter.

THE Germans, though vanquiſhed, and already determined to abandon their country and ſeek for ſhelter beyond the Albis or Elbe, were ſo enraged at the raiſing of this mount, which they looked upon as an affront not to be borne, that, forgetting their wounds and misfortunes, they ran to arms again, people, nobility, young and old, all in a confuſed body, ruſhed ſuddenly upon the Romans, like men in deſpair, and put them, as they were on their march and under no apprehenſion of an enemy, into ſome diſorder. Being repulſed, they encamped in a plain ſhut in between a river and a foreſt; the foreſt was ſurrounded by a deep marſh, except on one ſide, which was encloſed by a broad rampart raiſed formerly by the Angrivarii, as a barrier between them and their neighbours the Cheruſci. In this plain the enemy poſted their infantry, concealing their cavalry among the neighbouring groves, that they might fall fall upon the rear of the Roman army, as ſoon as they had entered the foreſt. Germanicus, being informed of their deſign and of every ſtep they took, ordered Seius Tubero, one of his lieutenants, to enter the plain at the head of the cavalry; his infantry he divided into two bodies, commanding the one to attack the enemy in the wood, and leading the other himſelf to force the rampart. The foot, that fought on even ground, broke eaſily in; but the attack of the rampart coſt Germanicus dear; the Germans defending it with great boldneſs and intrepidity. However, having at length, by ſhowers of darts poured upon the enemy from his engines, beat them off and taken the rampart, he entered the wood at the head of the prætorian cohorts, and there made a moſt dreadful havock of the enemy, who fought indeed with as much courage as the Romans, but could not, for want of room, manage their long ſpears. However, they made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance, and diſputed the ground inch by inch. Arminius did not on this occaſion exert his uſual activity, being diſabled and weakened by a wound he received; but Inguiomerus, with great intrepidity, flew about the ranks, animating his countrymen more by his example than by words. Germanicus, that he might be known, pulled off his helmet, and animated his men to purſue the ſlaughter: "No quarter," he cried; "we want "no captives, nothing but an utter deſtruction of theſe perfi- "dious nations will put an end to the war." However, as the day was already far ſpent, he detached a legion to form a camp for his weary troops; but the reſt continued the ſlaughter till night, when they retired glutted with the blood of the enemy. This ſecond victory was entirely owing to the foot, for the horſe fought with doubtful ſucceſs. Germanicus, having from his tribunal commended his victorious troops, of the arms taken from the enemy formed a monument with this inſcription: TO MARS, TO JUPITER, AND TO AUGUSTUS, THE ARMY OF TIBERIUS CÆSAR, HAVING ENTIRELY VANQUISHED THE NATIONS BETWEEN THE RHINE AND THE ALBIS, CONSECRATES THIS MONUMENT. He made no mention of himſelf, either to avoid giving umbrage to Tiberius, or becauſe he thought the recording of the fact a ſufficient teſtimony of his valour and conduct. After this he detached Stertinius againſt the Angrivarii, who by a ready ſubmiſſion prevented the calamities that threatened them. Germanicus, no leſs compaſſionate than brave, pardoned them without reſerve, and ſuffered them to live quietly according to their own laws under the protection of Rome [w].

[w] Idem ibid. c. 21, 22.

As the ſummer was already far ſpent, Germanicus with the reduction of the Angrivarii put an end to the campaign, ſending ſome of the legions back into winter-quarters by land, and embarquing himſelf with the others on the Amiſia in order to return by ſea. The ocean proved at firſt very calm and the wind favourable; but all on a ſudden a ſtorm ariſing, the fleet, conſiſting of a thouſand veſſels, was diſperſed; ſome of them were ſwallowed by the waves, others daſhed in pieces againſt the rocks, or driven upon remote and inhoſpitable iſlands, where the men either periſhed with famine, or lived upon the fleſh of the dead horſes, with which the ſhores appeared ſoon ſtrewed; for in order to lighten their veſſels and diſengage them from the ſhoals, they had been obliged to throw over-board their horſes and beaſts of burden, nay, even their arms and baggage. The galley of Germanicus alone landed on the coaſt of the Chauci, where the good-natured general, deeply affected with the misfortunes of his fellow-ſoldiers, wandered day and night about the rocks and promontories, keeping his eyes ſtedfaſt on the ſea, in hopes of deſcrying ſome of the diſperſed veſſels. As none of them appeared, he was heard accuſing himſelf as the author of this dreadful havock; nay, diſtracted with grief, he would have thrown himſelf head-long into the deep, had not his friends with much ado reſtrained him. At length to his infinite ſatisfaction he diſcovered part of the fleet returning, though in a very bad condition, ſome of the veſſels being without oars, others without ſails, uſing in their ſtead the ſoldiers cloaks; many were quite diſabled, and towed by ſuch as had ſuffered leſs. The latter he cauſed to be immediately repaired, and diſpatched them to the neighbouring iſlands in queſt of his diſperſed legionaries. By this means the greater part of them were at length brought back. The Angrivarii, who had lately ſubmitted, to give Germanicus on this occaſion an undoubted proof of their fidelity, redeemed many, who had been made captives by their neighbours, and reſtored them. Some, who had been driven into our iſland, were generouſly ſent back by the petty kings, who at that time reigned here[x] (Y).

UPON the news of this wreck, the Catti taking new courage, ran to arms; but Caius Silius, detached againſt them with thirty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, kept them in awe. As for Germanicus himſelf, at the head of a more numerous body, he made a ſudden irruption into the country of the Marſi (Z), where he was informed by one Malovendus, who had once commanded their troops but had lately taken party with the Romans, that the eagle of one of Varus's legions was concealed under-ground in a neighbouring grove, and guarded only by a ſmall body of troops. This intelligence filled Germanicus with joy: he immediately diſpatched two parties, the one to face the enemy and draw them from their poſt, the other to fall upon their rear and dig up the eagle. Succeſs attended both, and the Roman general, having ravaged and laid waſte the enemy's country, brought back the eagle in triumph; he then returned to the frontiers of Gaul, and there put his troops into winter-quarters, having by this glorious and ſucceſsful expedition, retrieved, in ſome degree, the glory of the Roman name, and balanced his late misfortune at ſea[y]. He hoped in one campaign more to complete the reduction of Germany, and, in order to keep up the ſpirit of the ſoldiery, and encourage them to purſue with alacrity that great work, he made good at his own expence all the loſſes they had ſuſtained in the late ſtorm, cauſing as much to be paid to each legionary as each declared he had loſt.

BUT, in the mean time, Tiberius, jealous of the great fame and reputation which his nephew acquired, by his repeated victories over the Germans and his popularity, reſolved to ſeparate him from his old and faithful legions. In order to this, he preſſed him by frequent letters to return to Rome, and there enjoy the triumph decreed him: he urged, that he had already undergone dangers enow; that though ſucceſs had attended him, yet he had ſuſtained great loſſes, which indeed were owing to no fault of his, but to the winds and waves; that he himſelf, having be a new ſpecies between men and beaſts. Travellers we find have been ever apt to magnify what they have ſeen, and relate what they have never ſeen.

(Z) Before the canal, of which we have ſpoken above, was cut by Druſus, the Marſi inhabited part of the territories of Velawe and Zutphen, where the preſent cities of Arnheim, Grolle, and Bredefort ſtand: but afterwards they ſettled between the Rhine and Iſala, and in proceſs of time changed the name of Marſi for that of Marſaci or Marſatti.

having been ſent ten times into Germany by Auguſtus, had more by policy than force of arms brought the Sicambri into ſubjection, and drawn the Suevi and Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni to conclude a peace with Rome: he added, that the Cheruſci and other barbarous nations, now the Romans had been fully revenged on them, might be left to purſue their domeſtic feuds and deſtroy one another. Germanicus, in anſwer to the emperor's letters, earneſtly entreated him to indulge him but one year more to complete his conqueſt, ſince the enemy were already concerting meaſures for obtaining peace. Tiberius was inflexible; in order therefore to entice him home, he offered him a ſecond conſulſhip, adding in his letter, that if the war was ſtill to be purſued, he ought to have ſome regard for his brother Druſus, and not ingroſs all the glory to himſelf; that Rome had at preſent no other enemies to wage war with but the Germans, and Druſus no other field of glory but Germany. Though Germanicus was well appriſed, that theſe were but ſpecious pretences, ſuggeſted by envy, to rob him of the glory he was likely to acquire by another campaign; however, finding it was in vain for him to perſiſt any longer, he complied at length, and, leaving Germany, ſet out for Rome with his wife and children. But, before we ſpeak of the reception he met with from Tiberius and the Roman people, we ſhall give a ſuccinct account of what paſſed in the metropolis, while he was ſignalizing himſelf in Germany.

Sets out for Rome.

TIBERIUS had the foregoing year revived, as we have related above, the law of majeſty, and upon this law was now arraigned Libo Druſus, tried, and condemned, and his eſtate divided among his accuſers, which was encouraging that baneful ſet of men, and ſounding the trumpet, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus Marcellinus, to informations and arraignments. Lucius Scribonius Libo Druſus was deſcended of the Scribonian family, one of the moſt illuſtrious in Rome, was the great grandſon of Pompey the great, nephew of Scribonia, once the wife of Auguſtus, nearly related to the Cæſars, and no ways inferior in nobility to the reigning houſe. His high quality rendered him obnoxious to Tiberius, which a ſenator, by name Firmius Catus, being well appriſed of, reſolved to gain the emperor's favour, by giving him a plauſible pretence to deliver himſelf from his fears. With this view, having inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the unwary youth, by flattering his hopes and ambition and conſtantly magnifying the nobility of his family, he prevailed upon him to conſult the Chaldeans and magicians, whether he ſhould not be one day veſted with the ſovereign power, to which he had as good a claim, ſaid

the treacherous Firmius, as the family of Tiberius who enjoyed it. This was ſufficient matter for a charge of high treaſon; and accordingly Firmius immediately acquainted the emperor, by means of Flaccus Veſcularius, a Roman knight, who had free acceſs to him, with the pretended crimes of the unhappy youth, whom he had baſely enſnared with ſpecious deluſions. Tiberius, though overjoyed at this information, refuſed the accuſer a private audience, ſending him word, that the communication might be ſtill carried on by the ſame Flaccus, and accordingly Firmius by his means informed the emperor of all Libo's ſteps and words; for the unwary youth, deluded by the predictions of the Chaldeans and aſtrologers, began now to entertain thoughts of ſoaring above the rank of a private citizen. In the mean time, Tiberius with the deepeſt diſſimulation preferred Libo to the prætorſhip, entertained him at his table, and familiarly converſed with him, without ever betraying the leaſt reſentment, either in his words or countenance. At length Libo, having recourſe to one Junius, who pretended, by charms and the ſuperſtitious rites of the magicians, to call up the infernal ſhades, and learn of them future events, the magician diſcovered this to one Fulcinius Trio, a famous informer, who immediately haſtening to the conſuls, imparted the whole to them, and demanded that the ſenate might meet forthwith to deliberate upon an affair of ſo much moment, and of ſuch dangerous conſequence to the ſtate. The fathers, not doubting but Tiberius was at the bottom of this proſecution, did not fail to aſſemble at the time appointed, when Libo appeared in the habit of a ſuppliant, and preſenting himſelf before Tiberius who was preſent, endeavoured by his tears and entreaties to ſoften him. The emperor heard him with a countenance quite unmoved, and, inſtead of returning him any anſwer, recited to the conſcript fathers the charge againſt him and the names of the accuſers, without betraying the leaſt emotion of anger or reſentment, or ſeeming either to leſſen or magnify the crimes laid to his charge. When the emperor had done, four accuſers appeared againſt the criminal, viz. Firmius Catus, Fulcinius Trio, Fonteius Agrippa, and Caius Vibius, and produced ſuch extravagant, fooliſh, and chimerical articles, as rather deſerved pity than puniſhment. One of theſe, from which we may judge of the others, was, that he had aſked the fortune-tellers, whether he ſhould not one day be poſſeſſed of riches ſufficient to cover with money the great Appian road from Rome to Brunduſium? Vibius produced a paper containing the names of the Cæſars, that is, of Tiberius, Druſus, and Germanicus, nicus, and thoſe of ſome ſenators, with myſterious characters and magical notes joined to them. Theſe the accuſer pretended were written with Libo's own hand, which he denying, it was moved, that his ſlaves ſhould be examined upon the rack; but becauſe by an old Roman law ſlaves could not be put to the torture in a trial touching the life of their maſters, the crafty Tiberius found a trick to evade that law without ſeeming to violate it: he ordered the ſlaves to be ſold to the public, that they might then be evidence againſt their late maſter: this poor evaſion was firſt contrived and practiſed by Auguſtus, as we have ſhewn above. The unhappy Libo, concluding from this ſtep, that Tiberius was reſolved upon his deſtruction, begged the conſcript fathers that they would put off till the next day the final deciſion of his cauſe. His requeſt being granted, he returned to his own houſe; whence ſoon after he ſent Publius Quirinius to ſpeak to the emperor in his behalf. Quirinius was nearly related to Libo and in great favour with Tiberius, having been formerly, as we have related above, inſtrumental in reconciling Caius Cæſar to him while he lived in the iſland of Rhodes, and by that means the chief cauſe of his returning into favour with Auguſtus. But, unmindful of antient obligations, he received Quirinius with great coldneſs, and returned him no other anſwer, but that he muſt apply to the ſenate. This anſwer threw Libo into a deep melancholy, which, however, he diſſembled, and ordered a great entertainment to be got ready, in order to paſs the laſt night of his life in the company of his friends and relations. But the banquet was ſcarce begun, when a band of ſoldiers, ſurrounding the houſe, with a ſtudied noiſe and dreadful cries, ſo terrified the gueſts, that many of them, riſing from table, endeavoured to make their eſcape. Libo, not doubting but they were ſent to diſpatch him, drawing his ſword, offered it to his ſlaves, begging them to put an end with it to his unhappy life: but they, trembling and ſhunning the ſad taſk, fled with ſuch hurry and confuſion, that they overturned all the lights, and then Libo in the dark gave himſelf two mortal wounds. As he fell and groaned, his freedmen ran in; and the ſoldiers ſeeing him dead retired; for they had been ſent on purpoſe to frighten him, ſo as to make him lay violent hands on himſelf, Tiberius hoping by that means to avoid the odium, which, he was well apprized, the execution of one of the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Rome would reflect upon his perſon and government. The charge, however, was carried on in the ſenate, as if he had been ſtill alive; but the deceitful Tiberius at the ſame time declared upon oath, that he would have interceded for his life, had he not prevented his clemency by laying violent hands on himſelf. The deceaſed was by the ſenate declared guilty of high treaſon, and his eſtate divided amongſt his accuſers: ſuch of the informers as were of the ſenatorial order (for the firſt lords of the ſenate were not aſhamed to debaſe themſelves to this vile office) were, without the regular method of election, named prætors for the enſuing year. This was the moſt effectual means imaginable of multiplying theſe peſts of the empire: they were raiſed to the higheſt offices in the ſtate, and the metropolis of the world often ſaw her public dignities beſtowed, as ſpoils, upon parricides, for ſpilling her beſt blood. We may well imagine, that the ſervile ſenate did not let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of gaining the emperor's favour, by branding the memory of the pretended criminal. Cotta Meſſalinus moved, that the image of Libo might not be carried at the funerals of his poſterity; Cneius Lentulus, that none of the Scribonian family ſhould thenceforth take the name of Druſus: at the motion of Pomponius Flaccus days of thankſgiving were appointed. Lucius Publius, Aſinius Gallus, Papius Mutilius and Lucius Apronius were of opinion, that gifts ſhould be preſented to Jupiter, to Mars, and to the goddeſs Concord; and that the Ides of September, the day on which Libo killed himſelf, ſhould be for ever obſerved as a feſtival[z]. So great was the debaſement of the once venerable Roman ſenate, even in the beginning of Tiberius's reign. It was not enough for the conſcript fathers to have condemned Libo; they iſſued a decree for driving aſtrologers, magicians, and the whole herd of fortune-tellers out of Italy, nay, Lucius Pituanus, one of them whom Libo had probably conſulted, was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock; and Publius Marcius, another of the ſame profeſſion, was by the conſuls ſentenced to death, and executed accordingly, without the Eſquiline gate.

Fortune-tellers driven out of Rome.

At the next meeting of the ſenate, Quintus Haterius, once conſul, and Octavius Fronto, formerly prætor, moved, that a ſtop might be put to the exceſſive luxury which prevailed in the city; and at their motion a law paſſed, forbidding all to uſe plate of maſſy gold, and men to debaſe themſelves with wearing ſilks, which were then thought peculiar to women. Fronto went farther, and propoſed, that the quantity of ſilver plate, the expence of furniture, and the number of ſlaves might be regulated. But he was oppoſed therein by Aſinius Gallus, who with plauſible arguments defended the

the prevailing luxury. Beſides, Tiberius himſelf did not approve of Fronto's motion; for after Gallus had done ſpeaking, he added, that it was not a ſeaſon for reformation, and that if there was any corruption of manners, there would not be wanting one to redreſs that evil, alluding thereby, no doubt, to himſelf and his office of perpetual cenſor. As it was common for the ſenators to depart from the preſent debate, and offer as their advice whatever they judged conducing to the public welfare, Lucius Piſo, who ſtill retained the antient Roman ſpirit and declared his ſentiments with great freedom, after having bitterly inveighed againſt the corruptions of the ſtate, particularly againſt the peſtilent purſuits of the informers, who were daily arraigning and circumventing all men, proteſted, that he was reſolved to leave Rome, and live in ſome quiet and diſtant corner of the country. With theſe words he went out of the ſenate; but Tiberius, though highly provoked, ſmothered his reſentment, and following Piſo, endeavoured to ſmooth him with kind entreaties, nay, he even condeſcended to ſolicit his relations to divert him with their prayers and authority from the reſolution he had taken; which they did accordingly. Piſo not long after gave another inſtance of a ſpirit truly Roman, in ſuing for a debt one Urgulania, a woman of diſtinction, and placed by the favour of Livia above the laws. Piſo ſummoned her to appear before the prætor; but ſhe, deſpiſing the ſummons, fled for refuge to the palace; whence Piſo would have carried her by force before the prætor, notwithſtanding the complaints of Livia, had not Tiberius, to prevent diſturbances, obliged her to comply with the ſummons, and at the ſame time propoſed, in civility to his mother, to attend the trial and aſſiſt her favourite. On the day appointed for the deciſion of the cauſe, the emperor left the palace, ordering his guards to follow him at a diſtance; but walked ſo ſlow, that before he reached the forum the trial was over, and Urgulania adjudged to pay the ſum claimed by Piſo. The money was immediately advanced by Livia, who, finding Piſo inflexible and the emperor no-ways inclined to oppoſe him, was glad to redeem her favourite from the trouble, which ſo bold and reſolute a creditor would not have failed to create her (A). The proceeding of Tiberius ont his occaſion was highly applauded by the Roman people, as was alſo his generoſity at this time towards ſome neceſſitous ſenators, whom with his gratuities he enabled to live ſuitable to their rank. However, he rejected with haughtineſs the petition of Marcus Hortalus, the grandſon of Hortenſius the famous orator, who, as we have related above, had been encouraged by Auguſtus with a bounty of a thouſand great ſeſterces, to marry, in order to prevent the extinction of his illuſtrious family. As he had now four children, he placed them before the door of the ſenate houſe, and ſhewing them to the conſcript fathers, in a moving ſpeech beſought both them and the emperor to defend from want the offspring of ſo many conſuls, the deſcendents of ſo many dictators, whom he had not brought into the world by his own choice, but in compliance with the deſire of the deified Auguſtus. The conſcript fathers, touched with compaſſion, were inclined to relieve him; but Tiberius oppoſed it, ſaying, that if they relieved all who were poor, and took upon them to maintain their children, the public would ſoon fail; that if the public treaſury came to be exhauſted by popular bounties, it muſt be ſupplied with rapine and oppreſſion; that by ſuch bounties induſtry would languiſh, and ſloth prevail, &c. The greater part of the fathers ſufficiently declared with their ſilence, that they did not like this ſpeech; which Tiberius perceiving, after having pauſed a little, to qualify what he had ſaid, added, that his anſwer was addreſſed in particular to Hortalus, but that if the ſenate thought fit, he was ready to give his ſons two hundred great ſeſterces each. The ſenators returned him thanks for his generous diſpoſition; but Hortalus himſelf was ſilent, affronted at the emperor's ſpeech, and even in poverty full of the antient grandeur of his family; which ſo eſtranged Tiberius from him, that he never after took any notice of him or his family, though reduced to extreme poverty [a].

THIS ſame year, a ſlave of Poſthumus Agrippa, by name Clemens, would have raiſed great diſturbances in the ſtate, and kindled a civil war in the bowels of Italy, had he not been prevented in good time. As he was much about the ſame age with his late maſter, and not unlike him in his perſon, he took upon him his name, and cauſed it to be reported ed in all parts by his emiſſaries and aſſociates, that Agrippa was ſtill alive. This raiſed great tumults in many cities of Italy, and brought over to the pretended Agrippa vaſt numbers of people, ſuch as are ever fond of public diſturbances and changes. The report was even credited at Rome, and his ſuppoſed arrival at Oſtia privately celebrated in the city by multitudes of people. Tiberius, informed by his emiſſaries of all that paſſed, was long in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould order his troops to march againſt the audacious ſlave; or ſuffer the impoſture to vaniſh of itſelf, which he was well apprized muſt ſoon happen. On one hand, he was aſhamed to betray any fear of a vile ſlave; and on the other he apprehended the danger which might ariſe from the credulity of the people, if they were not ſoon undeceived. In this perplexity he committed the whole affair to Salluſtius Criſpus, the ſame whom he had employed to diſpatch Agrippa. Criſpus choſe two of his clients, or, as ſome write, two ſoldiers, in whom he could confide, and ſent them to the ſuppoſed Agrippa with a conſiderable ſum, directing them to feign that they believed him to be the true grandſon of Auguſtus, to preſent him with the money, and to pretend a great zeal for his cauſe. They executed his orders with great addreſs, and finding that Clemens repoſed in them an entire confidence, they underhand got ready a proper band of men, ſeized and gagged him while his guards were aſleep, and carried him without noiſe to the palace. When he was brought before Tiberius, the emperor aſked him, "How he was became "Agrippa? Juſt as you became Cæſar," anſwered Clemens. Though Tiberius had him wholly in his power, yet ſo great was his fear or policy, that he did not execute him publicly, but ordered him to be diſpatched in a ſecret part of the palace, and his body to be privately conveyed away; and tho' many of the emperor's houſhold, many knights and ſenators were ſaid to have aſſiſted and ſupported him with their counſels and fortunes, yet no farther enquiry was made after his accomplices [b]. Towards the end of this year a triumphal arch was raiſed near the temple of Saturn as a monument for the recovery of the eagles of the Varian legions: a temple was dedicated to Valiant Fortune in the gardens which Julius Cæſar had bequeathed to the Roman people, and a chapel to the Julian family; ſtatues were alſo conſecrated to Auguſtus at Bovillæ in the neighbourhood of Rome.

Germanicus how received by Tiberius.

In the mean time, Germanicus arriving with his wife and children in the capital, was there received by Tiberius with all poſſible marks of a ſeeming friendſhip and affection; he congratulated him on his paſt dangers, ſeemed highly pleaſed with his conduct, extolled his mighty feats, and with the deepeſt diſſimulation commended him to the ſenate, as well deſerving the greateſt honours it was in their power to confer upon him. The triumph, which had been decreed him, was put off till the following year, when Caius Cælius, or, as ſome ſtyle him, Cæcilius Rufus, and Lucius Pomponius Flaccus were conſuls. During their adminiſtration, Germanicus triumphed on the twenty-ſixth day of May over the Catti, the Angrivarii, the Cheruſci, and all the German nations between the Rhine and the Albis or the Elbe. Germanicus had not indeed extended his conqueſts to the latter of theſe rivers; but the emperor, to make him amends for ſtopping him in the full career of his victories, counted thoſe conqueſts as complete, which he had prevented him from completing. The triumph, an honour now very uncommon, was performed with extraordinary magnificence. Before the triumphal chariot were carried repreſentations of mountains, rivers, and battles, and an incredible number of captives loaded with chains, among whom were many of the German chiefs, and the wife of Arminius, carrying in her arms her infant ſon. But what above all heightened the ſhew and the ſatisfaction of the beholders, was the extraordinary gracefulneſs of Germanicus's perſon, and his chariot filled with his five children, viz. Nero, Druſus, and Caius; and his two daughters, Agrippina and Druſilla. Tiberius, to render the ſolemnity more complete and the joy of the people more univerſal, diſtributed among them in the name of Germanicus a large ſum, three hundred ſeſterces a man, and named himſelf his collegue in the conſulſhip for the enſuing year. But, notwithſtanding all theſe demonſtrations of kindneſs and affection, the people ſtill ſuſpected his ſincerity; and their joy was greatly allayed by the melancholy reflections, that popular favour had proved fatal to his father Druſus; that his uncle Marcellus was ſnatched from the people, who adored him, in the flower of his youth, and that the favourites of the Roman people had ever been unfortunate and ſhort-lived. And truly, their fears were not ill grounded; for Tiberius, jealous of the glory of the young prince and the high favour he was in both with the people and ſoldiery, was already reſolved on his deſtruction, and meditating with himſelf how to compaſs his wicked deſign, and at the ſame time avoid the irreconcileable hatred, which, he well knew, would thence ariſe to him from all orders of men. While he was wholly taken up with theſe thoughts, a favourable opportunity offered, or rather, was craftily framed by Tiberius for removing from Rome the darling of the people. Archelaus (B) king of Cappadocia had many years before incurred his diſpleaſure, by neglecting to pay his court to him, during his retirement at Rhodes (C). This the revengeful emperor remembered, and therefore having enticed the king to Rome by means of letters from his mother Livia, promiſing him his pardon, provided he came in perſon to implore it, he not only received him with great haughtineſs, but cauſed him to be accuſed as a criminal in the ſenate. As the Archelaus king of Cappadocia called to Rome, where he dies.

(B) Torrentius, Riccioli, and Salian confound Archelaus king of Cappadocia with Archelaus, the ſon of Herod, king of Judæa. They were led into this miſtake by a paſſage in Suetonius, who, in the life of Tiberius, tells us, that he pleaded the cauſe of Archelaus, which was his firſt eſſay in eloquence. This cauſe the abovementioned writers take to be that which Archelaus the ſon of Herod maintained at Rome againſt his brothers about his father's laſt will, as we have related in our hiſtory of the Jews (49). But it is evident both from Joſephus and Dion Caſſius, that Tiberius at the time of this trial was not at Rome, but lived in retirement at Rhodes; nay, the latter writer tells us in expreſs terms, that Tiberius undertook the defence of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, againſt his own ſubjects; and that the Cappadocian prince incurred his diſpleaſure by ſeeming to neglect him in his diſgrace, notwithſtanding the kindneſs he had ſhewn him on that occaſion (50). He was the great grandſon of the famous Archelaus, who commanded the troops of Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, againſt Sylla, and afterwards, abandoning his own prince, ſided with Lucullus. His daughter Glaphyra was firſt married to Alexander, and afterwards to his brother Archelaus, both ſons to Herod, as we have related elſewhere (51). It is ſurprizing the abovementioned writers ſhould be guilty of ſo groſs a miſtake.

(C) It was not out of ingratitude or contempt, as Tacitus informs us, that Archelaus declined attending upon Tiberius, while he reſided at Rhodes, but becauſe he had been warned by his friends at the court of Auguſtus to take no notice of him, leſt he ſhould incur the diſpleaſure of the emperor.

the crimes laid to his charge evidently appeared to be mere fictions, he was by the conſcript fathers declared innocent; but the unhappy prince, not able to brook ſuch treatment, ſoon after either died of grief, or laid violent hands on himſelf, after having reigned fifty years [c]. Some time after Cappadocia was reduced to a Roman province, which enabled Tiberius to abate the tax of one in the hundred upon all vendible goods, and reduce it to one in the two hundred; which relief, however, the people did not long enjoy [d]. At the ſame time, died Antiochus king of Comagene and Philopator, king of Cilicia, which occaſioned great diſturbances in thoſe countries, ſome being for the Roman government, and others for a king of their own. The provinces too of Syria and Judæa being overloaded with taxes, applyed to the emperor and ſenate for relief [e]. Neither was Parthia without troubles; that warlike nation having driven out Vonones, whom they had demanded of Auguſtus for their king, placed in his room on the throne Artabanes, a prince of the family of the Arſacidæ, but at that time, according to Joſephus, king of the Medes [f]. Theſe diſturbances and commotions in the eaſt proved very favourable to the wicked deſigns of Tiberius, who repreſented to the ſenate, that they could not be well compoſed but by the wiſdom and abilities of Germanicus; as for himſelf, he was, he ſaid, in the decline of his age, and that of his ſon Druſus was not yet ripe. Hereupon all the provinces of the eaſt were readily decreed to Germanicus, and a greater power conferred on him, than had been given to any governor ſince the time of Pompey the Great. But to balance and reſtrain the extraordinary authority with which he was veſted, Tiberius had already removed from the government of Syria Creticus Silanus, whoſe daughter was betrothed to Nero, the eldeſt ſon of Germanicus, and placed in his room Cneius Piſo (D), a man

(D) Cneius Piſo was the ſon of Cneius Calpurnius Piſo, who as we have related above, maintained with great intrepidity the republican party againſt Julius Cæſar in Africa. Afterwards he joined Brutus and Caſſius, but, after the battle of Philippi was man of a moſt violent and untractable temper, and to ſuch a degree elated with the nobility and wealth of his wife Plancina (E), that he ſcarce yielded to Tiberius, and deſpiſed his ſons, viz. Druſus and Germanicus, as perſons beneath his rank: in ſhort, he was in every reſpect the moſt proper perſon in Rome to execute thoſe fatal purpoſes for which he was chiefly choſen. His wife Plancina, who was ſtill of a more haughty temper than her huſband, had ſecret inſtructions from Livia to exert her ſpirit, and by all manner of indignities proſecute and inſult Agrippina (F). was allowed to return to Rome, where he ſcorned to ſue for any public offices, chuſing to live in retirement, till Auguſtus prevailed upon him to accept the conſulſhip. Feſtus tells us, that the Calpurnian family pretended to derive their origin from one Calpus or Calphus, the ſon of Numa Pompilius (52). However that be, it is certain, that the Calpurnian family was one of the moſt antient and illuſtrious in Rome, and no ways inferior to the Claudian, of which Tiberius was deſcended.

(E) Plancina was either the daughter or the niece of the famous Munatius Plancus, of whom we have ſpoken in ſeveral parts of this work. Dion Caſſius calls her Munatia Plancina, and ſo ſhe is ſtyled in an inſcription, which is ſtill to be ſeen at Rome, in the palace which at preſent belongs to the family of the Chigi.

(F) Tacitus tells us, that the whole court was rent into parties, ſome favouring Druſus, and others Germanicus. Tiberius was partial to Druſus, as his ſon by nature, whereas Germanicus was his ſon only by adoption; but the greater part favoured Germanicus for two reaſons, ſays Tacitus; firſt, becauſe they knew he was hated by the emperor; and ſecondly, becauſe he was by his mother of a more illuſtrious deſcent. Germanicus and Druſus were the ſons of two brothers, and conſequently by their fathers of the ſame family. But on the mother's ſide Germanicus had the advantage, he being the ſon of Antonia Minor, the daughter of Marc Antony the triumvir by Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus; ſo that Marc Antony was his grandfather, and Auguſtus his great uncle. On the other ſide, a private Roman knight was the great grandfather of Druſus; for his mother Vipſania was the grand-daughter of the famous Pomponius Atticus. Beſides, Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus, far excelled Livia the wife of Druſus in virtue, and all the accompliſhments peculiar to her ſex. However, the two brothers

Maroboduus was overcome in a great battle, and obliged, moſt of his men abandoning him, to retire into the country of the Marcomanians, whence he ſent embaſſadors to Tiberius imploring his aſſiſtance. The emperor anſwered, that it was very ſurprizing he ſhould recur to the Romans, and beg their aſſiſtance againſt the Cheruſcans, ſince he had ſent none to them, while they were waging war with the ſame enemy. However, he laid hold of this opportunity to remove from Rome his ſon Druſus, who ſeemed over fond of the gaieties of the city, to inure him to the toils of the camp, and procure him the affections of the ſoldiery. What ſucceſs attended him in this expedition, we ſhall relate anon.

Druſus ſent into Illyricum.

A dreadful earthquake in Aſia.

THIS year was remarkable for one of the moſt dreadful earthquakes recorded in hiſtory: twelve famous cities of Aſia were overturned by it, viz. Sardis, Magneſia, at the foot of mount Sipylus, Moſcene, Ægæ, Hierocæſarea, Philadelphia, Tmolus, Temnus, Cyme or Cumæ, Myrina, Apollonia, Hyrcania. To theſe mentioned by Tacitus, Euſebius adds Epheſus [g]. Pliny [h] and Strabo [i] make particular mention of this event, calling it the moſt dreadful concuſſion that had ever been felt (G). It happened in the night, brothers lived in perfect concord and friendſhip, no ways diſturbed or interrupted by the contention and emulation that reigned among their relations and adherents (53).

(G) Oroſius takes this to be the earthquake mentioned by the evangeliſts as happening at the death of our Saviour; a notorious miſtake! which, if admitted, would overſet every ſyſtem of chronology, it being paſt all doubt, that the earthquake, which overturned the twelve cities of Aſia, happened in the fourth year of Tiberius's reign, and conſequently was at leaſt fourteen years prior to the other. According to Euſebius our Saviour was crucified the fourth year of the two hundred and ſecond olympiad; and the earthquake, which proved ſo fatal to Aſia, happened, according to the ſame writer, the ſecond year of the hundred and ninety-ninth olympiad. Oroſius would fain corroborate night, and proved the more dreadful, as it was leſs expected. Moſt of the inhabitants were cruſhed under the ruins of their houſes, and thoſe who fled to the fields, ſwallowed up by the opening of the earth. It is reported, ſays Tacitus, that huge mountains ſunk into the earth, that plains were raiſed up into high hills, and that dreadful flaſhes and eruptions of fire were ſeen among the ruins. Phlegon of Tralles, who has wrote a very particular account of this terrible event and the evils which it occaſioned, ſays, that many cities of Pontus, of Sicily, and of Calabria in Italy were greatly damaged by it; and adds, that the earth opening in many places, bodies were diſcovered of a monſtrous ſize, from one of which a tooth was taken above a foot in length, and preſented to Tiberius, who would not ſuffer the whole body to be brought to him, ſaying, that he deemed it a great crime to diſturb the dead. However, to ſatisfy his curioſity, he cauſed a head to be engraved proportionable to the tooth which had been brought him, and which he immediately after ordered to be reſtored to the place, whence it had been taken [k]. Tiberius, to do him juſtice, ſhewed, on occaſion of this great calamity, a ſpirit truly generous and worthy of a perſon in his ſtation: for he not only remitted the inhabitants of the ruined cities their taxes for five years, but preſented them with large ſums to rebuild their habitations. To the Sardians, who had ſuffered moſt, he ſent an hundred thouſand great ſeſterces, and to the reſt relief proportionable to their loſſes; nay, he immediately diſpatched into Aſia Marcius Aletus, a ſenator, who had been prætor, to view the deſolations on the ſpot, and make good the loſſes of every particular; for he was fond of being liberal, as Tacitus obſerves, on honeſt occaſions, a virtue which he long retained, after he had utterly abandoned all other virtues. The inhabitants of the cities thus rebuilt, and by the liberalities of Tiberius reſtored to their former ſplendor, erected to their common benefactor a coloſſus in the Roman forum, ſurrounded with the ſtatues of their twelve cities, as a laſting monument of the prince's generoſity, and their gratitude [l].

Tiberius's generoſity on this occaſion.

borate the accounts of the ſacred penmen with the teſtimonies of the Greek and Roman hiſtorians, and this is what led him into the abovementioned miſtake.

His private liberalities.

THE reputation which Tiberius gained by this noble bounty to the public, was greatly heightened by his private liberalities. For the eſtate of a wealthy freedwoman, by name Æmilia Muſa, who died this year inteſtate, being claimed by the treaſury, the emperor generouſly yielded it to one Æmilius Lepidus, to whoſe family ſhe ſeemed to belong (H). With the ſame diſintereſtedneſs he ſurrendered to Marcus Servilius the whole inheritance of Patuleius, a rich Roman knight, though part of it had been bequeathed to himſelf. Neither could he ever be prevailed upon to accept legacies, but from his intimate friends, utterly rejecting the inheritances of ſuch as were ſtrangers to him, or out of hatred to their relations appointed him their heir. His bounties were, generally ſpeaking, well placed; for as he readily relieved ſuch ſenators as were by misfortunes reduced to poverty, ſo he excluded without pity from the ſenate thoſe who had wantonly ſquandered away their eſtates in luxury and debauchery. Of this number were Vibidius Varro, Marius Nepos, Appius Appianus, Cornelius Sylla, Quintus Vitellius, and Attilius Buta. The latter was a man of

(H) Tacitus does not tell us, that Æmilia Muſa was a freedwoman; but from her Greek cognomen it is manifeſt, that ſuch was her condition; for we have not one inſtance in hiſtory of a Roman aſſuming a Greek name. The prænomen of Æmilia ſhe probably borrowed from ſome of the Æmilian family, to whom ſhe had formerly belonged. Perhaps ſhe was related to the famous Antonius Muſa, the freedman and phyſician of Auguſtus. As ſhe died inteſtate, her eſtate, ſuppoſing her to have been a liberta, or freedwoman, and to have no relations of her own then living, fell, according to the Roman law, to her former maſter and his heirs of blood. "Si libertus inteſtato de-" ceſſerit, patronum, aut filium, nepotemve ejus ad ſucceſſionem " vocari indubitatum eſt," ſays Julian (54); and Ulpian, " Liberto inteſtato mortuo, primum ſuis deferri hereditatem " verum eſt: ſi hi non fuerint, tunc patrono (55)." But what title had the exchequer to her eſtate? It appears from this paſſage of Tacitus and the laws we have quoted, that if a freedman or woman had no ſurviving relations, and their former maſter's family was extinct, their eſtate fell to the prince. In the preſent caſe one Æmilius Lepidus, as heir of blood to Muſa's former maſter, claimed her eſtate, and Tiberius generouſly ſurrendered it to him, though he could not plainly make good his claim.

of pleaſure, and uſed conſtantly to paſs the night in revels and debaucheries, and ſleep the greateſt part of the day; by which courſe of life, being ſoon reduced to great indigence, he had recourſe to the emperor for relief; but Tiberius rejected his petition, without returning him any other anſwer, than that "he had awaked too late" [k]. But the applauſe Tiberius gained by his public and private bounties were counterbalanced, by the countenance he gave to informations and arraignments upon the law of violated majeſty. Informers multiplied daily, the ſpirit of accuſing grew common, and the dread of it univerſal. Apuleia Varilia, grand niece to Auguſtus by his ſiſter (I), was accuſed by one of that infamous profeſſion of having reviled the deified Auguſtus, Tiberius, and his mother Livia, and of having diſhonoured with adultery the blood of the Cæſars, which, according to the conſtruction Auguſtus had put upon the law of majeſty, was high treaſon (K). Tiberius admitted the [k] Tacit. c. 48. Dio, ibid.

(I) Auguſtus had two ſiſters, viz. Octavia Major and Octavia Minor; but by which of theſe Apuleia Varilia was grand niece to Auguſtus, hiſtory does not inform us. Neither do we know of any writer who mentions the marriage or offspring of Octavia Minor. The other ſiſter married Marcellus, and had by him two daughters, Marcella Major and Marcella Minor; one of theſe was, we conjecture, from what we read in Dion Caſſius, married into the Apuleian family; for that writer calls Sextus Apuleius, who was conſul the year Auguſtus died, συγγενῆ Αὐγούστου, that is, Auguſtus's kinſman (56). If we admit this conjecture, which is not ill grounded, Apuleia Varilia was daughter to an Apuleius by one of the Marcellæ, and conſequently grand-niece to Auguſtus by his ſiſter Octavia Major.

(K) Auguſtus, as Tacitus informs us (57), to a fault common between men and women gave the grievous name of ſacrilege and treaſon; and, as his daughter and grand-daughter were proſtitutes, he puniſhed, according to the law of treaſon, which he had thus wreſted, all their adulterers and gallants either with death or exile. This ſort of treaſon was, as Tacitus ſeems to inſinuate, limited to the reigning houſe and the blood of the Cæſars; for that writer tells us, that Varilia, being nearly related to the emperor and guilty of adultery, was arraigned the accuſation, but ſhewed great moderation in the proſecution of the accuſed: for as to the adultery he ſaid, that ſufficient puniſhments had been already appointed for that crime by the Julian law, which was implicitly declaring, that it did not fall under the law of treaſon. As to the other crimes, he deſired they might be diſtinguiſhed: "If "Apuleia," ſaid he, "has uttered impious ſpeeches againſt "the deified Auguſtus, ſhe muſt be condemned; but for "her invectives againſt me I will not ſuffer her to be called "to any account. But ſhe has had the impudence to at-"tack the reputation of your mother," replied one of the conſuls. To this Tiberius returned no anſwer then, but the next time the ſenate met, he begged in his mother's name, that the words ſpoken againſt her might not be conſtrued into treaſon. Hereupon ſhe was tried only upon the words ſpoken againſt Auguſtus, and found guilty, but pardoned by Tiberius, who likewiſe begged a mitigation of her puniſhment for adultery; ſo that, inſtead of undergoing the ſevere puniſhments inflicted on that crime by the Julian law, of which hereafter, ſhe was only removed two hundred miles from Rome; but Manlius, who had debauched her, was baniſhed Italy and Africa [l]. This ſame year, Tacfarinas, a native of Numidia, who had ſerved among the Roman auxiliaries, having drawn his countrymen and the neighbouring nations into a revolt, was overthrown in a pitched battle by Furius Camillus, proconſul of Africa, who till that time had paſſed for a man quite unacquainted with the art of war. For this victory, which Camillus gained with one legion and a ſmall body of auxiliaries, an handful of men, when compared with the numberleſs troops of the enemy, the enſigns of triumph were by the ſenate decreed to the conqueror; which honour, ſays the hiſtorian, did not prove fatal to him, becauſe he was a man of extraordinary modeſty, and choſe to live in retirement [m]. This year died, according to Euſebius [n], Ovid at Tomos in Pontus, and, according raigned of high treaſon. Auguſtus found his account in declaring the gallants of the two Julias traitors; for as thoſe traitors were very numerous, and conſiderable for their quality and credit, he had here a good pretence to get rid of many eminent citizens, who gave him uneaſineſs and jealouſy.

according to S. Jerom [o], the famous historian Livy at Padua, his native city. We are told, that Livia had designed the latter for præceptor to Claudius, the younger brother of Germanicus; but he was prevented by death from enjoying that honour. He was the last of those illustrious writers who once adorned the court of Augustus, and will render his age ever memorable. He has been our chief guide in the compiling of this history; for which we can make him no better return, than to repeat here what Seneca said of him many centuries since, that "the genius of "Livy was equal to the grandeur and majesty of the Roman "empire [p]."

The death of Ovid, and Livy the historian.

TOWARDS the end of the year, Germanicus, leaving Rome, set out for the Levant with his wife Agrippina and his son Caius, surnamed Caligula. After a long and dangerous passage both in the Adriatic and Ionian seas, he arrived in Dalmatia, whither he had first steered his course to visit his brother Drusus, who, as we have related above, had been sent into that country. From Dalmatia by the coast of Illyrium he reached Nicopolis, which city Augustus had built on the Ambracian bay, in memory of his victory at Actium. There he entered upon his second consulship, having Tiberius, now the third time consul, for his collegue. The emperor held this dignity to the ides of May, and then resigned it to L. Seius Tubero, who had served under Germanicus in quality of lieutenant [q]. Germanicus spent a few days at Nicopolis to refit his fleet, and in the mean time viewed the bay of Actium, the spoils which Augustus his grandfather had consecrated after his famous victory, and the camp of Antony his great uncle. From thence he proceeded to Athens, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of honour (L). Next he

(L) The Athenians received Germanicus with extraordinary marks of esteem, which lest he should undervalue, as that nation made then but a very indifferent figure, they put him in mind of the glory of their ancestors, by carrying before him on tablets succinct accounts of their most famous exploits. By this means they inhanced the honours they had conferred on him, and, to use Tacitus's expression, dignified their flattery. On the other hand, Germanicus, out of respect to them, divesting himself in a manner of his power, appeared among them almost ſailed to Eubæa, and thence to Leſbos, where his wife Agrippina was delivered of Julia her laſt child: then he ſteered his courſe to the cities of Perinthus and Byzantium in Thrace, entered the ſtreights of Propontis, and the mouth of the Pontic or Euxine ſea, being deſirous of ſeeing thoſe places ſo much celebrated by fame. In his return he endeavoured to touch at the iſland of Samothrace, being fond of beholding the religious ceremonies practiced there, of which we have ſpoken in our deſcription of that iſland [r]; but he was prevented from ſatisfying his laudable curioſity by contrary winds. Having therefore viſited antient Ilium, which gave birth to Rome, he regained the coaſt of Aſia, and put in at Colophon, to conſult there the oracle of the Clarian Apollo, of which we have given an account elſewhere [s]. The prieſt, by whoſe mouth the god was believed to utter his oracles, is ſaid to have foretold, but in dark and doubtful terms, the approaching death of Germanicus [t].

IN the mean time, Piſo and his wife Plancina, haſtening to the execution of their wicked deſigns, left Rome, and arriving at Athens, gave there the firſt proof of their hatred to Germanicus. For Piſo, in a ſpeech to the inhabitants, abuſed them in a moſt outrageous manner, not without an indirect cenſure upon Germanicus, for having debaſed the dignity of the Roman name in paying an exceſſive regard not to the Athenians, whoſe race was long ſince extinct, but to the mixt ſcum of different nations (M). Piſo did not ſtay long at moſt like a private citizen, being attended only by one lictor. By thus removing the enſigns of power, the Romans declared, that they treated thoſe with whom they converſed, not as ſubjects, but as friends. Antony, as we have obſerved above, uſed the ſame condeſcenſion towards the Athenians, during his reſidence in their city, as did alſo Tiberius towards the Rhodians, walking up and down without a lictor or viator, and converſing familiarly with the Greeks, as if they had been his equals (58).

(M) Piſo ſeems to us to have been not a little inconſiſtent with himſelf in his reproaches; for on one hand, he would not allow the preſent inhabitants of Athens to be deſcended from the antient Athenians; and on the other, he charged them with all the crimes, of which the antient Athenians had ever been guilty. He was alſo an enemy to their city, as Tacitus informs us, upon a private account, becauſe they would not pardon at his requeſt one Theophilus, condemned by the Areopagus for forgery.

at Athens, but being in haſte to reach Syria before Germanicus, left the metropolis of Attica, and taking the ſhorteſt courſe, though the leaſt ſafe, ſailed through the Cyclades, and appeared off of Rhodes, ſoon after Germanicus had put in there; but being overtaken by a violent ſtorm before he could enter the port, he was driven upon certain rocks, and muſt have inevitably periſhed, had not the good-natured Germanicus, though already informed of the invectives Piſo had uttered againſt him at Athens, diſpatched gallies to reſcue him from the wreck. This generous kindneſs and humanity made no impreſſion upon the hard-hearted Piſo, who, having ſtaid but one day with his benefactor, put to ſea again in order to arrive in Syria before him. He no ſooner reached his province, than he began to court the common ſoldiers by bounties and careſſes, to form factions among the troops, to remove the antient centurions and tribunes, and place in their room his own creatures, or men recommended only by their crimes: he permitted the ſoldiery either to live quite idle in the camp, or to ramble about, and commit with impunity all manner of diſorders in the villages and cities. By this criminal indulgence Piſo won the hearts of the idle and diſorderly multitude to ſuch a degree, that he was by them honoured with the title of "Father of the legions." On the other hand, Plancina, forgetting the modeſty peculiar to her ſex, appeared often on horſeback, aſſiſted at the reviews, and was not aſhamed, which in thoſe days was thought very unbecoming in a woman, to be ſeen at the public exerciſes and military evolutions. She laid hold of theſe occaſions to drop reproachful and injurious reflections on the conduct of Germanicus and Agrippina, in order to prejudice the minds of the ſoldiery againſt them. As to the officers, they were privately told, that their paying court to Germanicus and his wife would not recommend them to the favour of Tiberius. Though theſe proceedings were well known to the young prince, yet overlooking the unaccountable behaviour of Piſo and Plancina, in purſuit of the glorious ends of his expedition, he haſtened into Armenia, where with the approbation of the nobility in a great aſſembly he placed the diadem upon the head of Zeno, the ſon of Polemon king of Pontus, a friend and ally of the Romans. From Armenia he proceeded firſt to Cappadocia, and thence to Comagene, both which kingdoms, then vacant by the death of their ſovereigns, he reduced to Roman provinces, appointing Quintus Veranius governor of the former, and Quintus Servœus of the latter. The pleaſure which Germanicus reaped from thus ſucceſsfully ſettling the affairs of the allies was greatly allayed, by the proud and haughty behaviour of Piſo, who being commanded either to lead in perſon, or to ſend under the conduct of his ſon, part of the legions into Armenia, contemptuouſly neglected to do either. At laſt they met at Cyrrum, a city of Syria, and there had an interview, to which Germanicus admitted only a few of his intimate friends. He reproached the preſident of Syria with his ſtrange conduct and haughty behaviour, and charged him, his wife, and their ſons, with many imputations. On the other hand, Piſo pretended ſurpriſe, but at the ſame time betrayed, even in ſubmitting to Germanicus as his ſuperior, great ſcorn and contempt; ſo that they parted declared enemies. Thenceforth Piſo ſeldom appeared at the public aſſemblies, where Germanicus preſided, or, if he did, it was only to contradict him. Not long after he gave a public proof of his malice, ſpite, and ill-will to Germanicus. For at a grand entertainment made by the king of the Nabatheans (N), golden crowns of great weight being preſented to Germanicus and Agrippina, and ſuch as were much lighter, to Piſo and the reſt of the gueſts, the haughty preſident, offended at this diſtinction, with an air of contempt threw his away; and, uttering many invectives againſt luxury, withdrew with theſe words; "Rome abhors ſuch ſcandalous luxury; I thought I had been invited to a banquet made for the ſon of a Roman prince, not of a Parthian king." Germanicus was highly incenſed at this inſult; but the natural ſweetneſs of his temper getting the better of his reſentment, he took no notice of ſuch a provoking behaviour. Soon after embaſſadors arrived from Artabanus king of the Parthians to renew the antient alliance between the two empires, and entreat Germanicus in their maſter's name to remove Vonones, who had been lately driven from the throne, out of Syria, leaſt he ſhould find means, being ſo near to Parthia, to raiſe diſturbances in that kingdom. Germanicus renewed the antient alliance, and removed Vonones to Pompeiopolis, a maritime city of Cilicia, not ſo much in compliance

Piſo's inſolent behaviour.

Germanicus renews the antient alliance with the Parthians.

(N) The county of the Nabatheans extended, according to S. Jerom, from the Euphrates to the Red-ſea (59); ſo that it comprehended Arabia deſerta, and great part of Arabia Petræa. The metropolis of the Nabatheans was the city of Petra, which gave its name to Arabia Petræa (60). S. Jerom thinks they were called Nabatheans from Nabaioth Iſhmael's ſon.

pliance with the requeſt of Artabanus, as to ſeparate him from Piſo, with whom he was in high favour, in regard to the many preſents he had made to his wife Plancina, and the exceſſive court he paid her [u]. Of this year, which was Germanicus's firſt in the levant, not the leaſt mention is made by Dion Caſſius.

He viſits the curioſities of Egypt.

THE following year, Marcus Silanus and Lucius Norbanus being conſuls, Germanicus travelled into Egypt to view the rarities and antiquities of that famous country. His journey proved very beneficial to the inhabitants, whom he relieved from a great famine, cauſing the granaries to be everywhere opened, and the price of corn abated. He did not imagine, that the prohibition made by Auguſtus, extended to him; and nevertheleſs the jealous emperor in a letter to him cenſured him with great ſeverity for preſuming to enter that province, when Auguſtus among other ſecrets of ſtate had ſtrictly forbidden all ſenators and Roman knights of any figure to travel thither, without ſpecial licence [w]. While Germanicus was thus paſſing the ſummer very agreeably in Egypt, Druſus was buſy in ſowing feuds among the Germans, and was therein attended with great ſucceſs. For Maroboduus, king of the Suevians, whoſe power Rome dreaded, was this year driven out of his dominions, and obliged to paſs the laſt eighteen years of his life at Ravenna in Italy. Catualda, whom Druſus had underhand ſtirred up againſt him, had the ſame fate; and recurring to the Romans for protection, was conveyed by them to Forum Julium, now Frejus, a colony in Narbonne Gaul. As both theſe chiefs were followed by great numbers of their countrymen, Tiberius, fearing they might diſturb the quiet of the provinces, gave them ſettlements beyond the Danube, between the rivers Cuſus and Marus, now the Wag and the March, on the frontiers of Moravia, appointing them for their king one Vannius, by nation a Quadian (O), who reigned over them for the ſpace of thirty years, but was driven out in the reign of Claudius. With the ſame policy Tiberius circumvented and enticed to Rome

Maroboduus driven out of his dominions, and likewiſe Catualda.

(O) The country of the Quadi was at firſt bounded by Bohemia, the Danube, and the river March; but afterwards they extended their confines to the Sarmatian mountains in the neighbourhood of Erlaw in Hungary. We ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak of them in the reigns of Marcus Antoninus and Gallienus.

Rhescuporis, a petty king of Thrace, who having murdered Cotys (P), his nephew, had seized on that part of the kingdom which Augustus had bestowed upon him. To deceive Rhescuporis, Tiberius employed Pomponius Flaccus (Q), whom he preferred to the government of Mœsia, as being one of the king's most intimate friends, and therefore better qualified to betray him; which he did accordingly, having enticed him into the Roman dominions, and then sent him under a strong guard to Rome, where he was accused before the senate by the widow of Cotys, and banished to Alexandria, where he was slain attempting to make his escape, or falsely charged with it. This part of Thrace was divided between Rhemetalces, the son of Rhescuporis, and the sons of Cotys; but the latter being minors, Trebellienus Rufus, once prætor, was appointed governor of their share. About this Rhescuporis circumvented by Tiberius.

(P) Cotys was the son of Rhemetacles, upon whose death his kingdom was divided by Augustus between his son Cotys and his brother Rhescuporis, as we have related at length in our history of Thrace (61), to which we refer our readers for a full account of the transactions, we have only hinted at in this place. Cotys, though a Thracian, was not unacquainted with the muses; for to him Ovid inscribed the ninth elegy of his third book "de Ponto," the unhappy poet being confined by Augustus to his kingdom.

(Q) Ovid mentions Pomponius Flaccus in one of his epistles inscribed to Græcinus:

"Præfuit his, Græcine, locis modo Flaccus, & illo
"Ripa ferox Istri sub duce tuta fuit.
"Hic tenuit Mysas gentes in pace fideli;
"Hic arcu fisos terruit ense Getas (62)."

He was indeed a good soldier, but a man of a vile character. We have related above his flattering motion against the memory of Libo Drusus. He was preferred to the government of Mœsia on purpose to betray Rhescuporis, with whom he lived in close friendship, which he did not in the least scruple to do: and indeed Rhescuporis, who treacherously betrayed and murdered his own nephew, deserved to have no other friends but men of his own stamp, traytors and assassins. Pomponius was rewarded by Tiberius for his treachery with the government of Syria, in which employment he died (63).

this time Vonones, who had been removed to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia, attempting to make his escape, was overtaken and killed by one Remmius, a veteran, to whose custody he had been committed (R).

Germanicus returns from Egypt.

In the mean time, Germanicus, having satisfied his curiosity with viewing all the rarities and antiquities of Egypt, left that kingdom, and returned to Syria, where to his great surprise he found all the regulations he had made utterly abolished, and the orders he had left with the legions wholly neglected. Hereupon, no longer able to bear with such insults, he reproached Piso in very sharp and severe terms, which, notwithstanding his natural boldness, heightened by the confidence he placed in the protection of Tiberius, so frightened him, that he resolved to leave Syria and abandon his government. But while he was making the necessary preparations for his departure, Germanicus being taken ill, he thought it advisable

(R) The circumstances of this unhappy prince's death are differently related by the antients. Tacitus tells us, that having corrupted his keepers, he obtained leave of them to hunt in the neighbouring forests, and under that pretence attempted his escape to Armenia, with a design to pass from thence thro' the countries of the Albanians and Heniochians into Scythia, and there take sanctuary with one of the kings of that country, who was his kinsman. But the country people, being soon apprised of his flight, broke down the bridges of the Pyramus, a river of Cilicia; so that the prince, as the stream was not fordable, was overtaken and seized on the banks of that river by Vibius Fronto, who had pursued close with a body of horse. Soon after Remmius, his late keeper, came up, and, pretending to be transported with rage, ran him through with his sword. It was commonly believed, that Remmius, gained by the prince's presents, had connived at his escape, and therefore in an affected rage slew him through fear of being discovered (64). According to this account Tiberius had no hand in his death. But Suetonius throws the whole blame of this cruel action upon the emperor. Vonones, says that writer, being driven out of his kingdom, retired to Antioch with great wealth, and there continued some time, thinking himself safe under the protection of the Roman people; but was in the end, contrary to all justice and faith, not only pillaged by the emperor's order, but most treacherously slain (65). We take the account of Tacitus to be the most genuine, that writer being no ways inclined to lessen or suppress the faults of any of the Cæsar's, but where truth, to which he ever pays the utmost regard, obliges him.

adviſeable to wait the iſſue of the diſtemper. The young prince ſoon recovered, and, as he was univerſally adored, his recovery was celebrated at Antioch, where he then was, with public vows, ſacrifices, and all poſſible demonſtrations of the moſt ſincere and unaffected joy. This proved new matter of rage to Piſo, who, no longer maſter of himſelf, ordered his lictors to drive away the victims, to overturn the altars, and diſperſe the people aſſembled to celebrate the feſtival: a bold attempt this! and therefore Piſo immediately after it leaving Antioch, withdrew to Seleucia. Soon after his departure

Germanicus relapſed, and his perſuaſion that Piſo had cauſed him to be poiſoned heightened the violence of the diſtemper. Some of his domeſtics too had the imprudence to tell him, that on the floors and walls of his houſe had been found bones of human bodies taken out of the grave, aſhes mixed with blood, charms, incantations, and the name of Germanicus engraved on ſheets of lead. Theſe reports and the frequent viſits of perſons, who were ſuppoſed to be Piſo's creatures, and to have been ſent by him to watch the progreſs of the malady, doubled the young prince's anxiety and apprehenſions. "If my houſe," ſaid he, "is thus beſet by treacherous "friends in my life-time, what will become after my death "of my unhappy wife, of my little children? mind, he wrote a letter to Piſo, utterly renouncing his friendſhip, according to the cuſtom which obtained among the Romans, and was a ſolemn declaration that they intended to have no farther intercourſe or communication with the perſon, whoſe friendſhip they thus renounced. Some authors add, that he commanded him to depart the province. Be that as it will, Piſo ſoon after put to ſea; but kept hovering upon the coaſt of his province, that he might return the ſooner, ſhould the government of Syria become vacant by the death of Germanicus. In the mean time, the violence of the malady ſomewhat abating, the young prince's friends began to entertain ſome hopes of his recovery. But ſhort-lived was their joy; a ſudden relapſe threw them into deſpair; and the unfortunate Germanicus, finding his end approached, ſent for his friends, and ſpoke to them in this manner: "Were I to "die a natural death, yet ſhould I have juſt cauſe to com-

At theſe words his friends, drowned in tears, taking the dying prince by the hand, all ſwore, that they would ſooner loſe their lives, than their revenge. Then turning to his wife, he conjured her by his memory, by their common children, and all the bonds of nuptial love, that ſhe would lay aſide her haughty ſpirit, and yield to the cruel ſhocks of fortune, leſt on her return to the city ſhe ſhould, by an unſeaſonable competition, provoke thoſe who were more powerful than herſelf. Thus much he ſpoke openly, other things he ſaid in ſecret, whence it was conjectured, that they related to Tiberius, warning her perhaps to be upon her guard againſt his ſnares. However that be, the words he ſpoke to her in ſecret were his laſt; for he had ſcarce done when he

His death.

(S) Germanicus had by Agrippina nine children; Nero, Druſus, Caius, ſurnamed Caligula, three other ſons who died infants, and three daughters, born ſucceſſively in the ſpace of three years, Agrippina, the mother of Nero, Druſilla, and Livilla, commonly called Julia. One of the ſons that died was ſo beautiful a child, that Livia had cauſed him to be painted in the habit of Cupid, and conſecrated the picture in the temple of Venus Capitolina, whence it was removed to Auguſtus's chamber, who uſed conſtantly to kiſs it when he came in (66).

he fainted away, and ſoon after expired, to the unexpreſſible grief of the province and all the neighbouring countries. His funeral was performed without any pomp, and his body, before it was burnt, expoſed naked in the forum of Antioch, where the funeral pile was erected. Tacitus tells us, that it remained uncertain whether any marks of poiſon appeared on the body, the people, who ſaw it, giving oppoſite accounts, as they pitied Germanicus, or favoured Piſo. But Suetonius ſays, that the body appeared covered with black and blue ſpots, that foam flowed from his mouth, and that his heart, the body being burnt, was found among the aſhes, untouched by the flames; for the naturaliſts in thoſe days believed, that the heart, if in the leaſt touched or infected with poiſon, could not be conſumed with fire. Vitellius, who afterwards charged Piſo before the ſenate with the death of Germanicus, made uſe of this argument, to prove that the prince had been poiſoned, and openly declared, that his heart was found entire among the aſhes[x]. But after all, this argument, even allowing the truth of the fact, was no way convincing, ſince, in the opinion of the antients, the hearts of ſuch as died of the malady called by the phyſicians Cardiaca paſſio, were equally proof againſt fire[y]. The aſhes of the deceaſed prince were carefully gathered by his wife Agrippina, and encloſed in an urn in order to be conveyed to Rome.

SUCH was the end of the renowned Germanicus Cæſar, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, a prince no leſs famous for his military proweſs, than his extraordinary accompliſhments and inimitable virtues. The Roman people had ſo great an opinion of his rare talents and eminent qualities, that they were not afraid openly to declare on ſeveral occaſions, that ſince the time of Scipio Africanus the gods had not bleſſed Rome with ſuch a citizen. He was, ſays Tacitus, alike venerable, whether you ſaw him or heard him; and, without ever betraying the leaſt arrogance or pride, yet ſupported the dignity of his high ſtation. His complaiſance to all, his humanity even to his enemies, his clemency, moderation, and engaging behaviour, won him the hearts not only of the Roman people, but of the barbarians themſelves, who, though enemies to Rome, yet could not refrain their tears upon the firſt news they received of the death of Germanicus. Some of them at war with one another, and even with Rome, forbore hoſtilities for ſome time to bewail ſo great, ſo general a loſs. Some of their princes cut off their beards, and ſhaved their wives heads, heads, a token among them of the deepeſt ſorrow. The proud monarch of the Parthians denied himſelf for ſome time the pleaſure of the chace, without appearing at the ordinary entertainments given by the prince and lords of his court; which was a token of grief, like the ſhutting of the courts of juſtice among the Romans, and never uſed but upon ſome very extraordinary diſaſter. As for the people of Antioch, they carried their grief to impiety; for hearing that Germanicus was dead, in the tranſport of their ſorrow they threw ſtones at their temples, overturned their altars, flung contemptuouſly their houſhold gods out of doors, &c. nay, ſome of them, in the height of their grief and indignation, expoſed and forſook their new-born children. Strange tokens of ſorrow theſe! It is more eaſy to conceive than expreſs the conſternation which the news of his death occaſioned in Rome, where he was adored by all ranks of men (T). The firſt account of his illneſs alarmed the whole city; but while they were impatiently waiting between hope and fear for farther intelligence, in the evening a report was ſpread, no body ever knew how, that he was recovered and in good health. Hereupon the people, not able to refrain their joy, flew immediately with victims and ſacrifices to the capitol, impatient to diſcharge the vows they had made for his recovery. Tiberius awaked out of his ſleep with the noiſe of their mutual congratulations and loud ſhouts of joy, had the mortification to hear the following words ecchoed in every ſtreet, "Salva Roma, ſalva patria, ſalvus Germanicus; Rome is ſafe, "our

The grief of the Roman people.

(T) He was to ſuch a degree beloved by the people, ſays Suetonius (67), not only of Rome, but in the provinces, that when he departed or arrived at any place, ſuch crowds attended him, that he was often in danger of being ſtifled in the throng. On his return from Germany, after having appeaſed the mutinous legions, all the prætorian cohorts went out to meet him, though two only had orders to pay him that compliment. As for the people, the road was thronged with perſons of all ages and ranks for twenty miles diſtance (68). The people, ſays Tacitus (69), adored him, not only on account of his own good qualities, but likewiſe for the ſake of his father Druſus, whoſe memory was dear to every true Roman, no one doubting, but he would have reſtored Rome to her antient liberty, had he ever ſucceeded to the empire. Of Germanicus they entertained the ſame hopes; and hence their partiality for him, before he was of an age to gain their affections by his perſonal qualities.

" our country is ſafe, ſince Germanicus is ſafe." But their joy was ſoon changed into the deepeſt ſorrow; certain news of his death arriving the next day, nothing was heard in the ſtreets, nothing in the houſes, but ſighs, outcries, lamentations, and complaints. Without any orders from the prince or ſenate, all the courts of juſtice, the houſes of the citizens, and ſhops, were ſhut, and the moſt frequented ſtreets, no one appearing abroad, turned into a deſert. The emperor by ſeveral edicts endeavoured to reſtrain theſe public expreſſions of grief; but even the moſt cautious, not able to moderate their ſorrow, in ſpite of all his edicts, continued to mourn, though invited by the feſtivals of December to mirth and jollity [z]. His death was the more regretted, as he was commonly ſuppoſed to have been poiſoned by Piſo, at the inſtigation of Tiberius and Livia, the only two perſons in the whole Roman empire, ſays Dion [a], who were not affected with ſo great, ſo general a loſs (U).

And

(U) Germanicus was not only an excellent commander, but an eloquent orator, and if Ovid did not flatter him, one of the beſt poets of his age (70). He expreſſed his thoughts with great eaſe and elegance both in Greek and Latin, and pleaded ſeveral cauſes with extraordinary applauſe (71). He gave a ſpecimen of his taſte for poetry in ſome Greek comedies, which, as he was thorough maſter of that language, he wrote and publiſhed. S. Jerom and Lactantius tell us, that he tranſlated into Latin a treatiſe of aſtronomy written originally in Greek by Aratus, under the title of Phænomena: but Voſſius and Rutgerſius aſcribe this tranſlation to the emperor Domitian, who aſſumed the title of Germanicus, as we ſhall obſerve hereafter. But what above all gained the affections both of the Romans and foreigners was, the extaordinary ſweetneſs of his temper, his affability, complaiſance, and obliging behaviour, even towards the meaneſt of the populace, a behaviour no ways affected, but to him quite natural, as ariſing from a ſincere deſire of doing every one the beſt offices he could. Auguſtus was ſo taken with theſe good qualities, that he was long in ſuſpenſe, if Suetonius is to be credited (72), whether he ſhould declare him his ſucceſſor himſelf, or leave him to be adopted by Tiberius. Soon after his death Tiberius abandoned himſelf to all manner of cruelties, which added new luſtre to the memory of the deceaſed

AND now the government of Syria being vacant by the death of Germanicus and flight of Piſo, the lieutenants of the legions and ſenators, who were at Antioch, committed the adminiſtration of the province to Cneius Sentius, who, at the ſuit of Vitellius and Veranius, two illluſtrious ſenators and friends to Germanicus, immediately ſeized and ſent to Rome one Martina, a woman infamous in that province for poiſoning, and greatly cheriſhed by Plancina. In the mean time, Piſo being overtaken at the iſland of Cous by a meſſenger, acquainting him with the death of Germanicus, did not ſo much as pretend to diſguiſe his joy, but cauſed victims to be publicly ſlain, and repaired with thankſgiving to the temples for ſo ſignal a favour. His wife Plancina declared her joy in a manner ſtill more arrogant and inſulting; for ſhe no ſooner heard that Germanicus was dead, than, throwing off her mourning, which ſhe wore for the death of her ſiſter, ſhe appeared in a dreſs adapted to gaiety and mirth. The centurions of the army, which Piſo had commanded in Syria, flocked to him, aſſuring him, that the legions were ready to receive him, and reinſtate him in the goverment, which had been injuriouſly taken from him. Hereupon Piſo ſummoned a council of his friends to conſult what meaſures he had beſt purſue; whether he ſhould go with all ſpeed to Rome, or return to Syria. His ſon Marcus Piſo was for the former, but Domitius Celer, an intimate friend of Piſo, declared for the latter and prevailed. But as Piſo was well appriſed, that Sentius would oppoſe him, which would give riſe to a civil war in Syria, in order to bias Tiberius in his favour, he tranſmitted

ed prince, and made him the more regretted, every one concluding from thence, that, had he lived, the emperor would never have dared to commit ſuch exceſſes (73). His military exploits we have related above; and therefore ſhall only obſerve here, that after his death the inhabitants of Antioch compared him to Alexander the Great, as to the gracefulneſs of his perſon, the nobility of his deſcent, his age, the circumſtances of his death, &c. and concluded, that if his authority had been uncontrolled he would have equalled that great warrior in the glory of his conqueſts, as he far ſurpaſſed him in prudence, clemency, moderation, and other virtues (74). And indeed, if he had not been ſtopt in the midſt of his carreer and ſnatched away from his victorious legions, he would, in all likelihood, have completed the final reduction of Germany, already broken by ſo many overthrows.

mitted a letter to him, filled with invectives againſt the conduct, luxury, and pride of Germanicus; he enlarged on the injuſtice the young prince had done him in driving him out of his government, and concluded with acquainting the emperor, that he was preparing to return to his province, and reſume with his former loyalty the care of the army. In the mean time, putting Domitius Celer on board a galley, he ſent him before him into Syria, while he himſelf, having formed into companies the deſerters, who flocked to him from all parts, and the ſervants who attended the camp, ſailed over to the continent, where he had the good look to intercept a body of new-raiſed ſoldiers on their march into Syria. He alſo wrote to the petty kings of Cilicia, ordering them to join him with all their forces. By this means, having got together a conſiderable body of men, he put to ſea again, and ſteering along the coaſts of Lycia and Pamphylia, met the fleet, which carried Agrippina with the aſhes of her husband to Rome. Both fleets prepared for battle; but, as they were afraid of each other, they proceeded no farther than to hard words. Vibius Marſus, who commanded Agrippina's galleys, ſummoned Piſo as a criminal to his trial at Rome, which ſummons he anſwered with deriſion and contempt. After this both fleets continued their courſe, the one for Italy, the other for Cilicia, where Piſo made a deſcent, and ſeized a ſtrong caſtle on the frontiers of Syria; which Sentius no ſooner underſtood, than he flew thither at the head of his legions, overthrew Piſo's men at the firſt onſet, obliged him to take ſhelter behind the walls of the caſtle, and ſoon reduced him to ſuch ſtreights, that he offered to ſurrender the place, upon condition that Sentius would ſuffer him to remain there till the emperor's pleaſure was known. But this being rejected, and the place reduced to the utmoſt extremity, he was forced to ſubmit upon what terms Sentius thought fit to impoſe upon him, which were, that he ſhould forthwith embarque and return to Rome [b].

He reſolves to return to his government.

He is forced to abandon Syria.

DURING theſe troubles in the eaſt, the ſenate was wholly taken up at Rome with inventing and decreeing new honours to Germanicus, in order to eternalize the memory of a prince ſo much beloved, and ſo well deſerving of the empire. It was decreed, that his name ſhould be inſerted in the Salian hymns (W); that curule chairs ſhould be placed for him among Honours decreed at Rome to Germanicus.

[b] Tacit. c. 74—82.

(W) This honour was peculiar to the gods; for till this time, only their names were ſung in the Salian hymns. Afterwards M. Antoninus, mong the prieſts of Auguſtus (X), and oaken crowns hung over them, as an acknowledgement of his having ſaved many citizens; that his ſtatue in ivory ſhould be carried before the proceſſion at the Circenſian games; an honour peculiar to the gods and ſuch men as were deified; that none but one of the Julian family ſhould be appointed flamen or augur in his room, &c. To theſe honours triumphal arches were added, one at Rome, another on the banks of the Rhine, and a third upon mount Amanus in Syria, with inſcriptions of his exploits, and a declaration that he died for the republic; a ſepulchre at Antioch, where his body was burnt; and a tribunal at Epidaphne, where he ended his life (Y). Many ſtatues were raiſed to him, and many places appointed for paying him divine honours. Some were for decreeing to him, as a great maſter of eloquence, a golden ſhield, remarkable for its bulk (Z); but this Tiberius would not allow, ſaying, that in M. Antoninus, the philoſopher, ordered the ſame honour to be conferred on his ſon Verus, as Spartianus informs us (74).

(X) It was deemed a particular mark of diſtinction at Rome, for any one to have a fixed place allotted him at the public ſhews. This honour was in proceſs of time improved by flattery, and extended not only to ſuch as were abſent, but even to the dead. P. Valerius Poplicola, who was made dictator in the year of Rome 409, firſt enjoyed the honour of being diſtinguiſhed, though abſent, with a fixed place in the circus, which was allotted to him and his poſterity (75). The ſame honour was afterwards beſtowed upon Julius Cæſar, M. Marcellus, and others, with this improvement; that curule chairs with golden crowns ſhould be placed for them in the circus and theatre, even after their death to preſerve their memory (76). The emperor Severus cauſed three curule chairs to be placed in the theatre to honour thereby the memory of Pertinax (77). To Germanicus was probably decreed but one chair in each of the three theatres.

(Y) Tacitus tells us, that he died at Epidaphne, a celebrated place in the neighbourhood of Antioch, of which we have ſpoken in our hiſtory of Syria; but all other writers agree, that he ended his days in the city of Antioch (78).

(Z) It was an antient cuſtom among the Romans to ſet up the images of illuſtrious men in the curia and in their temples. Thus the

in eloquence no regard was to be had of the dignity of the perſon, and that therefore he himſelf would dedicate a ſhield equal in ſize to thoſe of other orators, it being ſufficient glory for him to be ranked amongſt the antient writers. The Roman knights in their turn, to honour the memory of the deceaſed prince, agreed to change the name of that body of horſe which, being compoſed of the young nobility, was ſtyled "The ſquadron of the juniors," and call it thenceforth "The "ſquadron of Germanicus," appointing at the ſame time, that the effigies of Germanicus ſhould be carried before the ſaid ſquadron, as their ſtandard, at their public reviews, which were annually made on the ides of July[c]. In the height of the public grief Livia, called alſo Livilla, ſiſter to Germanicus and wife to Druſus, was delivered of male twins, which proved ſuch matter of joy to Tiberius, that he could not help boaſting to the ſenate, that to no Roman of the ſame rank had ever before been born two ſons at a birth. But the encreaſe of Druſus's family doubled the grief of the people, who ſaw with regret that of their beloved Germanicus removed farther and farther from the throne[d]. This ſame year ſevere laws were enacted

the image of Scipio Africanus was ſet up in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and that of Cato the cenſor in the curia, or ſenate-houſe, as we read in Valerius Maximus (79). Auguſtus cauſed the images of all thoſe Romans, who before his time had eminently diſtinguiſhed themſelves, in the arts either of peace or war, to be ſet up in the curia, allotting to each profeſſion its proper place. Thus Tacitus tells us, that the image of Hortenſius was placed among the orators. The like honour the fathers were now for decreeing to Germanicus, as to one of the maſters of eloquence. Theſe images are called by the antients ſhields (80), becauſe engraved in gold, ſilver, or braſs, in the form of a ſhield. This is the common opinion; though ſome writers think, that in latin they ought not to be called clypei, which word ſignifies a ſhield; but clupea, that is, engraved work, from the antient word "cluere" to engrave. This derivation Pliny deſpiſes as a fond conceit of the grammarians: "Scutis qualibus ad Trojam pugnatum eſt," ſays he, "continebantur imagines, unde & nomen habuere clype-"orum, non, ut perverſa Grammaticorum ſubtilitas voluit, a "cluendo." However, Livy calls them clupea; "clupea," ſays "he, de columnis dempſit" (81). Frequent mentionis made of theſe acted by the ſenate to reſtrain the lewdneſs of women, and it was provided, that no woman ſhould proſtitute herſelf, whoſe father, grandfather, or huſband were Roman knights. The fathers were prompted to make this prohibition by the monſtrous impudence of one Viſtilla, who, though a lady of great quality and born of a prætorian family, was not aſhamed to appear before the ædiles, and publicly declare herſelf a proſtitute, purſuant to an antient law, which obliged all women, who became venal, to acknowledge their infamy before the above-mentioned magiſtrates. By this public declaration the antient Romans had thought proſtitutes ſufficiently puniſhed; but Viſtilla making no account of ſuch a chaſtiſement, and the fathers fearing other women of diſtinction might follow her example, they publiſhed the above-mentioned prohibition, and at the ſame time baniſhed the infamous Viſtilla to the iſland of Seriphos. Meaſures were alſo taken by the fathers for utterly extirpating the Jewiſh and Ægyptian ceremonies; and by a decree of the ſenate four thouſand young men, all deſcended from manumitted ſlaves, and infected, ſays Tacitus, with that ſuperſtition, were enrolled and tranſported to Sardinia to ſuppreſs the robbers who infeſted that iſland: if they periſhed through the badneſs of the air, the ſenate thought it would be no great loſs (A). The reſt were ordered to depart Rome, and all Italy, if within a ſtated time they did not renounce their national ceremonies[c]. The ſame year, Tiberius gave ſeveral theſe ſhields in antient inſcriptions: Lipſius quotes the following: "Huic. Decuriones. Funus. Publicum. Statuam. Equeſtrem. Clypeum. Argenteum. Locum. Sepulturae. Decreverunt." Theſe ſhields were ſometimes hung up to preſerve the memory of the deceaſed without any effigies, and only with the names of the perſons, by whom and to whoſe honour they were offered (82). Such ſhields were ſometimes ſet up by private perſons to honour the memory of their anceſtors without any order or decree of the ſenate; for Pliny in ſpeaking of Appius Claudius who was conſul in the year of Rome 259, ſays, that he was the firſt, who, though a private perſon, ſet up in public and conſecrated the ſhields of his anceſtors (83).

(A) Joſephus complains of this ſeverity; for, according to him, the four thouſand men ſent into Sardinia were all Jews. Suetonius agrees with Joſephus. Tiberius, ſays that writer, put a ſtop to foreign inſtances of generoſity, which ought not to be omitted. Occia, who had preſided over the veſtals fifty-ſeven years with great reputation of ſanctimony, being dead, he repreſented to the ſenate, that another virgin was to be choſen in her room; and Fonteius Agrippa and Aſinius Pollio offering their daughters, he thanked them both for their regard to the commonwealth, but preferred Pollio's daughter, for no other reaſon, but becauſe her mother had had but one huſband: to comfort the other who was poſtponed, he gave her for her fortune a thouſand great ſeſterces. reign ceremonies, and likewiſe to the Egyptian and Jewiſh rites, obliging all thoſe, who were inclined to ſuch ſuperſtitions, to burn the furniture belonging to their religion. He liſted the Jewiſh youth, and ſent them into the moſt peſtilent and unwholeſome provinces under his command, obliging the remainder of that nation, and ſuch as followed their footſteps, to depart the city upon pain of perpetual ſlavery. Thus far Suetonius (84). To the expulſion of the Jews an impoſtor of that nation gave occaſion, who being obliged to fly his country for a breach of the laws, retired to Rome, where he ſet up for an expounder of the law of Moſes, and, with the aſſiſtance of three others, all of the ſame ſtamp with himſelf, gained over to the Jewiſh religion one Fulvia, the wife of Saturninus, a woman of great diſtinction. The zealous proſelyte was eaſily perſuaded to make a rich preſent of purple and gold to the temple of Jeruſalem, which ſhe delivered to her directors; but they, inſtead of ſending the offering to Jeruſalem, converted it to their own uſe. This Fulvia diſcloſed to her huſband, and he to the emperor, who thereupon ordered all the Jews to depart Rome, after having liſted four thouſand of their youth and ſent them into Sardinia. Joſephus tells us, that ſuch as ſcrupled ſerving in the Roman army were ſeverely puniſhed (85). At the ſame time the Egyptians were driven out of Rome, and their rites utterly ſuppreſſed: they had been formerly forbidden by Auguſtus (86), but at this time that prohibition was renewed and enforced, on occaſion of a very ſcandalous ſtory related at length by Joſephus. Decius Mundus, a young Roman knight, falling in love with a married lady of the firſt quality in Rome, by name Paulina, and not being able to prevail upon her, as ſhe was a mirrour of chaſtity, even with the offer of two hundred thouſand drachmas, to comply with his unlawful deſires, had recourſe to the prieſts of the god Iſis. Theſe took upon himself to pay two nummi, that is, fourteen pence of our money, a buthel over and above the fixed price. For these bounties the people offered him again the title of "Father of his country," which he rejected, and at the same time sharply rebuked such as styled him lord, shewing thereby, says Tacitus, that though he dreaded liberty, yet he could not abide flattery. The same author tells us, upon the authority of the writers of those times, some of them senators, that letters were read in the senate from Adgandestrius, prince of the Catti, offering to dispatch Arminius, provided poison were sent him for that purpose: to which Tiberius returned this answer; that it was not the custom of the Roman peo-

These pretending that the god Anubis, to whose worship Paulina was greatly addicted, was in love with her, persuaded her to pass a night in the temple of that deity; when Mundus, by paying down twenty-five thousand drachmas to the priests, and promising them the like sum, obtained what he had in vain applied for to Paulina herself with the tender of two hundred thousand drachmas. The next day the deluded lady bragging of the honour done her by the Egyptian deity, some believed her, while others ascribed the whole to the strength of her imagination. But three days after Mundus meeting her, "I thank you Paulina," said he, "for saving me "two hundred thousand drachmas, and granting me at the same "time, not under the name of Mundus, but of Anubis, the favours "which I would willingly have purchased at so dear a rate." At these words the virtuous Paulina was thunder-struck; she burst into tears, tore her garments, and hastening to her husband, she acquainted him how she had been abused and betrayed by the priests; and, drowned in tears, besought him to exert himself in the prosecution of the priests, by whom her simplicity and credulity had been thus enormously abused. Hereupon her husband complained to the emperor, relating to him every particular of so base an action; and he, upon a narrow enquiry into the fact, and a strict examination of the priests, finding them guilty, ordered them all to be crucified, the temple of Anubis to be pulled down, his statue to be thrown into the Tiber, the Egyptian rites to be utterly suppressed, and all who professed them to be banished Rome. Ida, the freedwoman of Mundus's father, who first advised him to apply to the priests, for which advice she received fifty thousand drachmas, was crucified with the priests; but Mundus himself was only banished, Tiberius exempting him, says Josephus, from a more severe punishment in regard of his passion, which was so violent, that, finding the chaste Paulina proof against all temptation, he had resolved to starve himself to death (87) ple to take vengence on their enemies by treachery, but openly and in the field; wherein he gained equal glory, ſays our hiſtorian, with the antient Roman commanders, who would not ſuffer king Pyrrhus to be poiſoned, but diſcloſed to him the whole plot. Arminius, however, after the departure of the Romans, and expulſion of his rival in power Maroboduus, attempting to inſlave his country, fell by the treachery of his kindred in the thirty-ſeventh year of his age. Tacitus calls him, not undeſervedly, the deliverer of Germany; for under his conduct the Germans ſhook off the Roman yoke, and long maintained their liberties, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the generals ſent from Rome to bring them again under ſubjection. He commanded the troops of his country twelve years, during which time he was often defeated, but always found means to repair his loſſes, and renew the war with freſh rigor. His name in Tacitus's time was ſtill celebrated by his countrymen in their ſongs [f]. Pliny obſerves, that this year on the eighth of July a new iſland was formed near that of Delos in the Archipelago [g].

Death of Arminius.

Agrippina's arrival in Italy with the aſhes of her husband.

In the beginning of the next year, M. Valerius Meſſalinus and M. Aurelius Cotta being conſuls, Agrippina arrived at Brunduſium with the aſhes of her deceaſed huſband, and was received at her landing with tokens of the deepeſt ſorrow, not only by the inhabitants of that, but of all the neighbouring cities, who had flocked to Brunduſium to condole with her on ſo melancholy an occaſion. She no ſooner appeared on the ſhore, attended by her two children, Caius and Julia, with the funeral urn in her arms and her eyes fixed on the ground, than the whole multitude burſt into tears; nothing was heard but groans, outcries, and lamentations, friends, relations, ſtrangers, being equally affected at the ſight of ſo moving an object. Tiberius had diſpatched two prætorian cohorts to attend the remains of the deceaſed prince from Brunduſium to Rome, and ordered the magiſtrates of Calabria, Apulia, and Campania to pay their laſt offices to the memory of his ſon. The urn therefore was carried on the ſhoulders of the tribunes and centurions, and accompanied by the chief magiſtrates of the places through which it paſſed, the lictors of the deceaſed general marching before it with their faſces reverſed (B). When

When the funeral proceſſion arrived at any Roman colony, the nobility in their beſt apparel, and the people in mourning, ſlew victims, erected altars, and burnt perfumes, teſtifying with loud lamentations their common ſorrow. The nearer they drew to Rome, the greater was the concourſe. At Terracina they were met by Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius, by Claudius, Germanicus's younger brother, and by ſuch of his children as had been left at Rome. At ſome diſtance from the city the conſcript fathers, with the conſuls at their head, and immenſe crouds of people, lined the road, through which the proceſſion paſſed, all drowned in tears and teſtifying their grief with ſighs, in which flattery had no ſhare, every one being well appriſed how real was the joy, how inſincere was the grief of Tiberius. Neither he nor his mother Livia appeared abroad, either becauſe they thought it below their grandeur to lament publicly, or through fear of betraying in their countenances ſome marks of joy amidſt the public lamentations (C). How received.

Not only the lictors carried their faſces reverſed, but the ſoldiers their arms, as appears from the funeral proceſſion, which Virgil deſcribes on occaſion of the death of Pallas:

„ ——————Tum mæſta phalanx Teucrique ſequuntur, „ Tyrrhenique duces, & verſis Arcades armis (89)."

It is well known, that Virgil introduces in his poem the cuſtoms that prevailed at Rome.

(C) Tacitus tells us, that neither in any hiſtorian, nor in the journals of the city, he could find, that Antonia, the mother of Germanicus, bore any part in the funeral, though Agrippina, Druſus, Claudius, and the other relations of the deceaſed, were there recorded by name. Perhaps ſhe was prevented by ſickneſs; perhaps ſhe was ſenſible, that ſhe would have ſunk under the weight of her ſorrow; or elſe ſhe was detained by Tiberius that he and Livia might ſeem to have followed her example, and the people not think it ſtrange, that the grandmother

The remains of the deceaſed were repoſited in the tomb of Auguſtus, the whole city attending them to the field of Mars, where that ſtately monument was erected, and crying aloud in the height of their grief, that the republic was utterly ruined, that no farther hope remained, as if they had forgot by whom they were governed. But nothing offended Tiberius ſo much as the affection which the people ſhewed for Agrippina, calling her, "The ornament of her "country, the only blood of Auguſtus, a true pattern of "antient virtue," and at the ſame time imploring the bleſſings of the gods for her iſſue, that they might outlive the perſecutions of the wicked. As the people ſet no bounds to their grief, he thought proper to check it by a public decree, exhorting them to reſume their ſeveral vocations, and, as the Magneſian games were at hand, to indulge themſelves in their uſual diverſions, now they had by their lamentations given ſufficient vent to their grief. He urged the examples of the deified Julius and the deified Auguſtus, who upon the loſs, the former of an only daughter, the latter of his beloved grandſons, had both got the better of their ſorrow; he put them alſo in mind of the conſtancy with which the Roman people had formerly borne the ſlaughter of their armies, the death of their generals, and the utter deſtruction of many noble families, adding, that princes were mortal, but the commonwealth eternal. The emperor's decree was immediately complied with, as to the external appearance; the courts of juſtice were opened again, public affairs reſumed, and an end put to the vacation. Druſus, who was come to Rome on purpoſe to attend the funeral, returned to the army in Illyricum; which he had ſcarce reached, when Piſo appeared in the camp, hoping to find the young prince leſs incenſed againſt him for the death of a brother, than favourable to him for the removal of a rival. Druſus at their firſt meeting told him, that if the crime laid to his charge was true, he would be the firſt to revenge it; but that he hoped the current report was groundleſs, and that the death of Germanicus would be pernicious to none. This declaration he made in public, and carefully avoided all private interviews with Piſo. This artful anſwer and the cautious behaviour of a youth, otherwiſe frank and unwary, prompted moſt people

ple to believe, that he had been inſtructed beforehand by his father how to behave in ſo nice and critical a conjuncture. Young Piſo, whom the father had ſent to Rome with inſtructions how to ſoften the emperor, was received very kindly by him, and honoured with ſuch preſents as were uſually beſtowed on the ſons of governors, when they returned from the provinces. This he did to ſhew himſelf utterly unbiaſſed. In the mean time, news was brought, that Martina, famous for the art of poiſoning, who, as we have related above, had been ſent in cuſtody towards Rome, was found dead at Brunduſium with poiſon bound up in the knots of her hair, but without any marks of poiſon on her body. Whether her death was accidental, or procured by private orders from Tiberius or Piſo, was never known. By her death the accuſers were deprived of their chief evidence; for ſhe had ever lived in cloſe confidence with Plancina, and the ſenate hoped to extort from her, by force of torments, a ſincere confeſſion of the crime and a diſcovery of her accomplices. Not long after Piſo arrived at Rome with his wife Plancina, and landed, as he had embarqued at Narnia upon the Nar and thence ſailed into the Tiber, near the tomb of Auguſtus, where the aſhes of Germanicus had been lately repoſited. This with their inſolent behaviour heightened the indignation of the people; for they both appeared with gay countenances, and, attended with a numerous retinue, he of clients and domeſtics and ſhe of women, proceeded to their ſtately palace, which overlooked the forum, and was, on occaſion of their return, magnificently adorned and illuminated. The night they paſſed in rejoicings, having invited their friends and relations to a great banquet, with which they ſolemnized their ſafe arrival. But the very next day Piſo was arraigned by Vitellius, Veranius, and others, who had attended Germanicus, before the emperor; who after having heard in a private audience the charge of the accuſers and the defence of the accuſed, referred the entire cauſe to the ſenate, being well appriſed of the reflections that would be caſt upon him, whether he condemned or abſolved the accuſed. When the ſenate met for this great trial, Tiberius made a ſpeech full of affected moderation; he told the conſcript fathers, that Piſo had been his father's lieutenant and friend, and lately appointed by himſelf, at the direction of the ſenate, to aſſiſt Germanicus in ſettling the affairs of the eaſt: whether he had there, by his haughtineſs and oppoſition, provoked the young prince, and rejoiced at his death, or wickedly procured it, they were then to judge with unbiaſſed minds. "If you find him guilty," ſaid the emperor, "of having only exceeded the bounds of his commiſ-

"ſion, and not ſubmitted to the will of his general, or even
"of having betrayed joy at his death and my affliction, I
"ſhall ever hate him and baniſh him from my houſe; but "cannot for private injuries exert the prince, and condemn "him as a criminal. But if you find him guilty of Germa"nicus's death, it is incumbent upou you to revenge it, and "afford his children, and us his father and grandmother,
"the ſatisfaction of ſeeing him puniſhed for ſuch an enor"mous attempt. Examine too with great care, whether "he endeavoured to debauch the army, whether he counte"nanced licenciouſneſs in the ſoldiery, or attempted to re"cover the province by force of arms. I have juſt cauſe
"to be offended with the indiſcreet zeal of his accuſers;
"to what purpoſe ſtrip the corſe, and expoſe it naked to

"mong foreign nations, that he was taken off by poiſon,
"if all this was ſtill doubtful and remains to be examined?
"I am grieved for the death of my ſon, and ever ſhall la-

"Germanicus, if he had any faults. I beſeech you to proceed "with the ſame impartiality: let not your regard to me
"miſlead you to take crimes for proved, becauſe they are "committed againſt me. As for the accuſed, if he has any "friends or relations, let them exert their eloquence, and
"uſe their utmoſt endeavours to clear him from the crimes
"laid to his charge. Let his accuſers take the ſame pains "to convict him of the charge which is brought againſt him:
"by this means we ſhall be able to judge impartially, to "abſolve the accuſed, if innocent; to condemn him, if "guilty." Two days were then allowed to the accuſers to make good their charge, and, ſix days after, three to the accuſed to make his defence. The articles of impeachment, brought againſt Piſo by Servæus, Veranius, and Vitellius, were, that he had permitted a general licentiouſneſs in the army, and corrupted the common ſoldiers to that degree, that he was ſtyled by the moſt profligate father of the legions; that he had abuſed in a moſt outrageous manner the friends of Germanicus; and laſtly, that by poiſon and witchcraft he had deſtroyed Germanicus himſelf, and borne arms againſt the commonwealth; inſomuch, that they had been obliged to engage and defeat him before they could bring him to his trial. He defended himſelf but weakly againſt theſe accuſations; only the charge of poiſoning Germanicus could not be ſufficiently proved. However, the ſenate could not be perſuaded, that Germanicus had died a natural death; and at the ſame time the people were heard crying aloud at the door of the ſenate-houſe, that though the fathers abſolved the accuſed, yet he ſhould not eſcape the puniſhment due to his crimes; nay, they had already overturned the ſtatues of Piſo, and would have dragged them to the ſcalæ Gemoniæ, the place where criminals were executed, had they not been reſcued by Tiberius's orders. Theſe diſturbances induced the ſenate to put off the final deciſion of the caſe; and Piſo, that he might not be expoſed to the outrages of the incenſed multitude, was conveyed to his houſe in a litter, followed by a tribune of a prætorian cohort, whom ſome looked upon as a guard for his ſafety, others as the miniſter of his death.

THE people were no leſs incenſed againſt Plancina than Piſo; but ſhe, having by the ſecret ſolicitations of Livia ſecured her own pardon, began by degrees to drop her huſband, and to make a ſeparate defence, though ſhe had declared from the beginning, that ſhe would employ all her intereſt and favour with Livia in behalf of both, and that by the ſame ſentence they ſhould both be either abſolved or condemned. This ſo diſheartened Piſo, who had placed more confidence in the intereſt of his wife, than his own, that he was ſometime in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould make any farther defence. But his ſon prevailed upon him to appear once more before the ſenate and try whether he could move the fathers or Tiberius to compaſſion. But the ſenate proving implacable, and the emperor carefully avoiding to ſhew even in his countenance the leaſt mark of tenderneſs towards him in his diſtreſs, he returned home, as if he deſigned to prepare for his farther defence againſt the next day. But, inſtead of that, he wrote a letter to the emperor, which he ſealed and delivered to his freedmen. He then bathed, according to the Roman cuſtom, and ſupped as uſual. His wife kept him company till the night was far ſpent, and then retired; which ſhe had no ſooner done, than Piſo ordered the door of the chamber to be ſhut, and was found at break of day with his throat cut, and his ſword lying by him. Tacitus tells us, that while he was a youth, he heard from ſome old men, that a bundle of writings was frequently ſeen in Piſo's hands during his trial, which contained, as his friends conſtantly affirmed, the letters of Tiberius, ordering him to dispatch Germanicus. These letters, said they, he designed to lay before the senate and accuse the prince; but was diverted from it by Sejanus, who in the emperor's name promised him his pardon: they add, that Piso did not fall by his own hand, but by that of an executioner sent privately by Tiberius to dispatch him. Our historian tells us, that he dares affirm neither of these things, but yet thought himself obliged to acquaint his readers with such relations (D). Tiberius fearing the death of Piso might be imputed to him, as if he had procured it to prevent farther discoveries, examined his domestics in the senate about the circumstances of his death, and then read the letter which Piso had written to him, imploring his protection for his sons, whom he cleared from having any share in his late conduct, whatever it were. Of his wife Plancina he said nothing. One of his sons had remained at Rome, and therefore could be no ways accessory to his father's guilt; the other had indeed attended him into Syria, and served under him in the war he raised in the province; but Tiberius would not allow that to be imputed to him as a crime, alledging the orders of his father, which, he said, a son could not disobey. As for Plancina, who was supposed to have been more guilty than her husband, Tiberius openly declared, not without blushing and betraying great confusion in his speech and countenance, that at the earnest entreaties of his mother he could not help pleading for her and assisting her in her trial. However, Vitellius and Veranius did not drop the prosecution; but after they had in a trial, which lasted two days, made the charge appear pretty plain, and silenced those who pleaded for the accused, she escaped the punishment due to her crime by the indulgence of the servile senate. For the consul Aurelius Cotta being first asked his opinion by the emperor, who collected the voices himself, answered

(D) Suetonius writes that he narrowly escaped being torn in pieces by the populace and was condemned to death by the senate (90). Dion says, that he was brought into the senate by Tiberius himself, who desired, that he might have time to prepare for his defence, and that he laid violent hands on himself. But, according to Tacitus, the sentence was not awarded against him till after his death; neither does that writer say, that he laid violent hand on himself, but only that he was found with his throat cut, and his sword lying by him.

anſwered in the following terms: I am of opinion, that the name of Piſo be razed out of the conſular faſti or tables, part of his eſtate forfeited, and part granted to his ſon Cneius upon his changing that name; that his ſon Marcus be driven out of the ſenate, baniſhed for ten years, and allowed out of his father's eſtate only fifty thouſand great ſeſterces; as to Plancina, I think ſhe ſhould be pardoned at the requeſt of Livia. This ſentence ſeemed too rigorous to the emperor with reſpect to Piſo's children and memory; he therefore would not allow his name to be ſtruck out of the conſular tables, ſaying, that the name of Marc Antony, who had made war upon his country, and that of his ſon Julius Antonius, who had by adultery diſhonoured the houſe of Auguſtus, remained ſtill there. He likewiſe delivered Marcus Piſo from the infamy of being deveſted of his dignity, and left him his paternal inheritance entire. He alſo oppoſed the motion of Valerius Meſſalinus, who was for erecting a golden ſtatue in the temple of Mars the avenger, and that of Cæcina Severus, who propoſed building an altar to Revenge. Such monuments, he ſaid, were fit to be raiſed for victories over a foreign enemy; but domeſtic evils were either to be buried in oblivion, or remembered with grief (E). As the emperor had ſhewn great favour to Plancina and her children, to maintain the opinion of an impartial judge, a few days after the trial, he moved in the ſenate, that Vitellius, Veranius, and Servæus, who had accuſed Piſo, might be rewarded; and they were accordingly preferred to pontifical honours [h].

(E) Meſſalinus added to his motion, that public thanks ſhould be rendered to Tiberius, Livia, Antonia, Agrippina, and Druſus, for having revenged the death of Germanicus, but omitted to mention Claudius the brother of the deceaſed prince. Whereupon Lucius Aſprenas aſked him, whether he had omitted him deſignedly; and then Meſſalinus ſubjoined the name of Claudius too. This ſhews how little regard was then paid to Claudius: and indeed he was deſpiſed and neglected by all, and thought incapable of any public employment. But for all this, fortune reſerved the ſovereignty to him, and we ſhall ſee him one day, notwithſtanding the weakneſs both of his body and mind, maſter of the Roman empire.

many, he had poſtponed till the trial was over. A few days after died his mother Vipſania, of all the children of Agrippa, the only one, ſays Tacitus, who died a natural death (F).

Tacfarinas renews the war, but is defeated.

The ſame year Tacfarinas, who had been ſome time before defeated by Furius Camillus, as we have related above, renewed the war in Africa, but was obliged by L. Apronius, who had ſucceeded Camillus in the government of that province, to ſhelter himſelf again in the deſerts. A Roman cohort having on this occaſion given ground at the firſt onſet, the proconſul cauſed every tenth man of that cowardly body to be executed; which exemplary rigor, at this time very rare, had ſo good an effect on the reſt, that a numerous body of the enemy was ſoon after put to flight by a detachment of no more than five hundred veterans, and their numerous army utterly routed by another detachment commanded by Apronius Ceſianus, the proconſul's ſon. This year, Æmilia Lepida, deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, and beſides great grand-daughter to Sylla and Pompey, and once deſigned for the wife of Lucius Cæſar and for the daughter-in-law of Auguſtus, was charged with impoſing upon her huſband Publius Quirinius a ſuppoſititious child, with audultery, and with conſulting the Chaldeans about the fate of the imperial family, which was a capital crime. Her brother Manius Lepidus undertook her defence, Tiberius behaving on this occaſion with ſuch ſubtlety, that it was impoſſible to diſcover his real ſentiments. At firſt he begged the ſenators not to meddle with the articles of treaſon, and ſoon after charged Marcus Servilius to produce thoſe very proofs which he pretended to ſuppreſs:

The trial of Æmilia Lepida.

(F) Agrippa had three wives, viz. Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus, Marcella the daughter of Octavia, and Julia. By Pomponia he had Vipſania the mother of Druſus, mentioned here by Tacitus; Marcella likewiſe brought him children, if Suetonius is to be credited; but as we find no farther mention made of them, we conclude, that they died very young: by Julia he had five children, Caius and Lucius Cæſars, Agrippa Poſthumus, Agrippina, and Julia. Caius and Lucius were ſuppoſed to have been poiſoned; Agrippina periſhed by hunger, and Poſthumius Agrippa by the ſword; but as to Julia, ſhe died a natural death, according to the account which Tacitus himſelf gives of it (91); though he tells us in this place, that Vipſania was of all the children of Agrippa the only one who died a natural death.

ſuppreſs: He would not ſuffer the ſlaves of Lepida to be examined by torture as to the articles of treaſon, nor his ſon Druſus, though conſul elect, to vote firſt, leſt the reſt ſhould think themſelves obliged to follow his example. However, the ſlaves of Lepida confeſſing upon the rack, that ſhe had impoſed upon her huſband a ſuppoſititious child, and even attempted to poiſon him, ſhe was condemned to perpetual baniſhment; but at the requeſt of Scaurus, who had had a daughter by her, either before her marriage with Quirinius or after her divorce, her eſtate was not confiſcated. After ſhe was condemned, Tiberius told the ſenators, that he had learnt from the ſlaves too of her huſband Quirinius, that ſhe had attempted to poiſon him [i]. Suetonius tells us, that ſhe had committed the crimes, for which ſhe was at this time condemned, twenty years before; but Tacitus only ſays, that ſhe was proſecuted by her huſband even after their divorce; which drew compaſſion upon her, however guilty and infamous. This year Tiberius ſoftened the rigor of the law Papia Poppea, which, as we have related above, loaded thoſe with heavy fines who did not marry at a certain age. But great numbers of Romans chuſing rather to pay the ſaid fines, than incumber themſelves with a family, ſo that the law ſerved only to enrich the exchequer, Tiberius with great diſintereſtedneſs appointed five perſons, who had been formerly conſuls, five who had been prætors, with ten other ſenators, to examine all the regulations made before his time againſt celibacy. Theſe explained the intricacies of the laws enacted againſt a ſingle life, which the pleaders, that is, the lawyers of thoſe days, laid hold of to undo many noble families; and at the ſame time they qualified the rigor of the antient law by leſſening the fines, which, according to the regulations of Auguſtus, every man was to pay, who did not marry at a certain age. This, as Tacitus obſerves, was ſome relief to the city, the number of laws proving as great an evil as the crimes, for the reſtraining of which they were enacted. Towards the end of this year, Nero, Germanicus's eldeſt ſon, being now of age, Tiberius recommended him to the ſenate, that he might ſtand for the quæſtorſhip five years ſooner than the laws directed, which, as we may well imagine, was readily granted, as alſo a place in the college of pontiffs. The firſt day he entered the forum in his manly robe, a donative of corn and money was diſtributed by Tiberius to the populace, overjoyed to ſee a ſon of Germanicus now of age. Their joy was doubled by his marriage with Julia the daughter of Druſus; but ſoon after the people ſaw with the utmoſt concern and indignation the daughter of Sejanus betrothed to young Druſus, the nephew of Germanicus and ſon of Claudius, who reigned after Caligula. By this match the Claudian family ſeemed in a manner degraded, and Sejanus, whoſe power and credit with the emperor was already too great, raiſed ſtill higher. But a few days after Druſus died at Pompeii by a very ſtrange accident, being choaked by a pear, which ſtuck in his throat, as in play he threw it up in the air, and catched it in his mouth [i].

Death of Druſus, nephew to Germanicus.

THE following year Tiberius was conſul the fourth time, and Druſus the ſecond; but Tiberius, ſoon after he had reſumed the faſces, under pretence of his health, retired to Campania, either with a deſign to accuſtom himſelf by degrees to live out of Rome, or to leave Druſus the honour of diſcharging that office alone. Not long after his departure he wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them, that Tacfarinas had raiſed new diſturbances in Africa, and exhorting them to chuſe a proconſul to be ſent into that province equal to the war with which it was threatened. Upon the receipt of this letter the fathers met, but, inſtead of naming a governor themſelves, decreed, that the appointment of a proper perſon for the government of Africa ſhould be left to the emperor. On this occaſion Cæcina Severus made a ſpeech againſt any magiſtrate's carrying his wife with him into his province; but, being oppoſed by Valerius Meſſalinus and Druſus himſelf, his motion was over-ruled (G). (G) Cæcina introduced this motion with a long preamble, that he lived in perfect concord with his wife, and had ſix children by her; but nevertheleſs had practiſed himſelf, though he had ſerved forty years in different provinces, what he offered to the public. He ſaid, that it had not without cauſe been provided of old, that women ſhould not be carried into the countries of confederate or foreign nations, ſince they introduced luxury in peace, retarded war with their fears, and made the Roman armies on their march reſemble thoſe of the barbarians. Women, ſaid he, are not only tender and unfit to bear fatigues; but, if not reſtrained, cruel, ambitious, and greedy of power. They even march among the ſoldiers, and

enate met, a letter was presented to them from Tiberius, wherein, after complaining of them for casting upon him the care are attended and obeyed by the centurions. A woman has lately acted the chief part at the exercise of the cohorts and the evolutions of the legions. Besides, you well know, conscript fathers, that as often as any of the magistrates are accused of plundering the provinces, their wives are always concerned in the guilt. To them the most profligate in the provinces immediately apply; by them all affairs are undertaken and transacted. They are no less respected than their husbands, have the same court paid them, are equally obeyed, nay more readily obeyed, their orders being generally more imperious. This authority in women was formerly restrained by the Oppian and other laws; but now they rule without controul, not only their families, but the forum, the courts of justice, and even the armies. To this speech, which was applauded by some, but disliked by the far greater part, Valerius Messalinus answered, That many of the institutions of their forefathers were changed for the better: that women were so far from burdening the provinces, that they were no burden to their own husbands; that in time of peace they proved no incumbrance to them, but a great relief after the fatigues of war, to which it was not proper they should attend their husbands. As to the pride, cruelty, and ambition, to which some of them had given a loose, he answered, that if on that account none were to be allowed to accompany their husbands into the provinces, no governors ought, according to that method of reasoning, be sent thither, since some of them had proved cruel, haughty, rapacious, &c. The Oppian laws, he said, were once judged necessary, and their severity thought expedient for the state; but afterwards their rigor was softened, and that too was judged expedient for the public good. As to the wives being accessory to the guilt of their husbands, the latter, he said, ought to bear the blame; but he thought it very hard, that for the too great compliance of one or a few weak husbands, all the rest should be deprived of the comfort and relief which the fellowship of their wives, the natural partners of their good and bad fortune, afforded them. He added, that the sex, weak by nature, would be thus left defenceless, a prey to their own passion, and exposed to the temptations of thousands, who would make it their business to seduce them; whereof the natural consequence in an absence of many years was to every one obvious, since the marriage-bed was scarce preserved undefiled under the eye of the husband. He concluded his speech with exhorting the fathers so to redress the evils abroad, as not to neglect the disorders at home. Drusus approved of this speech;

care of all public affairs, he named M. Lepidus and Junius Blæſus, leaving it to them to chuſe for the proconſulate of Africa which of the two they pleaſed. Hereupon Blæſus was choſen, Lepidus excuſing himſelf with great earneſtneſs, and pleading his infirmities, the tender age of his children, and a daughter who was marriageable. There was another reaſon too, ſays Tacitus, which, though not mentioned by Lepidus, was underſtood: Blæſus was uncle to Sejanus, and therefore, as his intereſt prevailed, Lepidus declined ſtanding in competition with him [k]. The moderation and mildneſs with which Druſus governed, during his father's abſence, encouraged ſome ſenators to apply to him for redreſs to an evil, which was by degrees grown inſupportable. The ſtatues of the emperor were become ſanctuaries to profligates, who, laying hold of them, might with impunity threaten, and wantonly inſult whom they pleaſed, not even a maſter being allowed to puniſh a ſlave for the invectives he had uttered againſt him, while he held the emperor's ſtatue. Againſt this abuſe Caius Seſtius, a ſenator, ſpoke with great vehemence, as he had been lately abuſed in a moſt outrageous manner by one Annia Rufilla, whom he had got condemned for forgery. To put a ſtop to this diſorder, Druſus ſummoned Rufilla before his tribunal; and finding her guilty of uttering invectives againſt Seſtius, under ſhelter of the emperor's ſtatue, he committed her to priſon. The puniſhment of this profligate women, and that of two Roman knights, Conſidius Æquus and Cælius Curſor, who had forged a charge of treaſon againſt the prætor Magius Cæcilianus, gained Druſus the affections of the people, and made them overlook his love of pleaſure and the luxury in which he lived, ſpending the day at the ſhews of gladiators, and the greater part of the night in revels and banquets. Antiſtius Vetus, a principal nobleman of Macedon, being tried for adultery, during Druſus's adminiſtration, was abſolved; which highly offended Tiberius, who wrote a letter to the ſenate, reproaching the judges, and ordering them

ſpeech; and having alledged the example of Auguſtus, who travelled moſtly accompanied with Livia, added, that he himſelf had taken a progreſs to Illyricum, and was ready, if it were thought expedient, to viſit other nations; but not without uneaſineſs, if he were to be torn from his dear wife, by whom he had ſo many children. them to recall Vetus and try him for treaſon, as a diſturber of the public peace, and confederate with the late king Rheſcuporis, when having killed his nephew Cotys, whom Tacitus through miſtake calls his brother, he deſigned to make war upon Rome. The charge of treaſon, ſays our hiſtorian, proved in thoſe days the ſum and bulwark of all accuſations whatſoever, and was the moſt effectual means of making ſure of the criminal. Vetus was therefore condemned to perpetual baniſhment, and to his ſentence was added, that he ſhould be confined to an iſland, neither in the neighbourhood of Macedon, nor of Thrace. The troubles, which began about this time in Thrace, pompted the judges, or rather Tiberius, to add this clauſe. For the Odryſians, and other warlike nations of Thrace, being diſſatisfied with the government of Rhemetalces, to whom Tiberius had given that part of Thrace, which his father Rheſcuporis had held, and much more with the government of Trebellienus Rufus, whom Tiberius had appointed guardian to the ſons of Cotys, who were minors, openly revolted; and having committed dreadful ravages, beſieged Rhemetalces in the city of Philippopolis. But diviſions ariſing among them, Publius Velleius, whom ſome writers take to be the hiſtorian Velleius Paterculus [l], marching againſt them from the neighbouring province, where he commanded, defeated them, and obliged them, without loſing a ſingle man, to abandon the ſiege [m].

A revolt in Thrace ſuppreſſed.

The ſame year, the Gauls, no longer able to bear the heavy tributes, with which they were loaded, and the cruelty and pride of their governors, attempted to ſhake off the Roman yoke, being ſtirred up by Julius Florus, a native of Treves, and Julius Sacrovir, a leading man among the Ædui, that is, thoſe of Autun. The Andecavi and Turonii, that is, the inhabitants of Angers and Tour, firſt took up arms; but the former were ſoon reduced by Acilius Aviola at the head of a cohort drawn from the garriſon of Lugdunum or Lions, and the latter by the ſame Aviola with a detachment ſent him by Viſellius Varro governor of Lower Germany. Julius Florus, having attempted in vain to debauch a body of horſe, which had been raiſed by the Romans at Treves, made to the foreſt of Ardea, attended by a rabble of his own clients and followers; but finding all the paſſes beſet by Viſellius Varro and Caius Silius, he was obliged to venture a battle with his countryman Julius Indus, whom the Romans had ſent forward with a choſen body of men, as one who was well acquainted with the roads, and a declared enemy to Florus. Indus put him to flight at the firſt onſet, and by purſuing him from place to place, reduced him to ſuch ſtreights, that finding no other means to avoid falling into the hands of his implacable enemy, he put an end to his life with his own ſword. By his death the inſurrection of Treves was quelled. But that of the Ædui gave the Roman generals no ſmall uneaſineſs, Sacrovir, the chief author of it, having raiſed an army of forty thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of Auguſtodunum or Autun, the capital of the nation, where he found and ſeized all the young nobility of Gaul, hoping by that means to engage their parents and relations in his intereſt. A contention which aroſe between the Roman generals about the command of the army, gave him time to prepare for a vigorous defence. At length Varro who was old and infirm, yielding to Silius, who was vigorous and in the flower of his age, the troops began their march, and advancing towards Auguſtodunum, were met by Sacrovir twelve miles from that city. Whereupon an engagement enſuing, the Gauls were routed with great ſlaughter, and Sacrovir obliged to fly firſt to Auguſtodunum, and thence to a neighbouring town, where he ſlew himſelf, and thoſe who attended him one another, after having ſet fire to the place, by which it was reduced to aſhes. Our hiſtorian obſerves, that when news of this inſurrection in Gaul was brought to Rome, the beſt men were grieved for the ſake of their country, but many rejoiced in their own dangers, and in hatred to Tiberius wiſhed ſucceſs to the common enemy [n].

Sacrovir the author of the rebellion dies in the ſame manner.

WHEN the inſurrection was entirely ſuppreſſed, Tiberius wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the riſe, progreſs, and concluſion of the war; he added, that it was brought to an happy iſſue by the fidelity and bravery of his lieutenants directed by his counſels. As ſome had complained of him for not going in perſon to ſuppreſs it, in the ſame letter he yielded reaſons why neither he nor Druſus had, during theſe commotions, offered to ſtir out of Italy, telling them, that the Roman empire was an immenſe body, and that it was below the dignity of princes, upon the revolt of one or two cities, to abandon the capital, whence proper directions were ſent to govern the whole; but nevertheleſs, that he would viſit thoſe nations and ſettle them, ſince they were again brought under ſubjection; which before before would have been doing them too much honour, as if he had not been able to conquer them by his lieutenants. The ſenate decreed vows, ſupplications, and the other uſual honours on ſuch occaſions; but Cornelius Dolabella, a notorious flatterer moved, that Tiberius, on his return from Campania, ſhould be honoured with an ovation. This ridiculous motion occaſioned a letter from the emperor, wherein he declared, that he was not ſo deſtitute of glory as to hunt after empty honours in his old age, for a ſhort progreſs in the neighbourhood of Rome, after having in his youth vanquiſhed moſt warlike nations, and either enjoyed or deſpiſed many triumphs. This year Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, whom St. Luke calls Cyrenius, dying at Rome, Tiberius wrote to the ſenate, deſiring that he might be honoured with a public funeral. He was a native of Lanuvium, a municipal town; but, though of a mean deſcent, had raiſed himſelf by his valour to the higheſt poſts in the army, and had been honoured by Auguſtus, firſt with the conſulſhip, and afterwards with the enſigns of triumph, for driving the Homonadenſes out of their ſtrong-holds in Cilicia. Upon the diſgrace of Marcus Lollius he was appointed governor to Caius Cæſar, then employed in ſettling the affairs of Armenia, in which high ſtation he made uſe of all his intereſt in behalf of Tiberius then at Rhodes, and by degrees reconciled the young prince to him. Theſe kind offices Tiberius now remembered, and extolled them in his letter to the ſenate, inveighing at the ſame time againſt Lollius, as the author of the miſunderſtanding between him and Caius. When Archelaus, the ſon of Herod, was depoſed by Auguſtus, Quirinius was appointed governor of Syria, and ordered to ſeize the country, which Archelaus had held, and reduce it to a Roman province; which he did accordingly, taxing the Jews according to the eſtimate of their eſtates, which had been made eleven years before by Sentius Saturninus. The ſenate readily complied with the requeſt of Tiberius as to the funeral of Quirinius, though they had no great reſpect for his memory on account of his covetouſneſs, his great credit with the emperor, and above all, for his proſecuting Æmilia Lepida in the manner we have related above [o]. At the end of the year Druſus falling ſick, Caius Lutorius Priſcus, a Roman knight, thinking the diſtemper would prove mortal, compoſed a poem bewailing his death, and out of vanity read it in the houſe

of P. Petronius in the preſence of Vitellia, mother-in-law to Petronius, and of another woman of great diſtinction. As Rome ſwarmed with informers, the poet was immediately accuſed of this before the ſenate; all the ladies, who had heard him, were ſummoned to appear againſt him, and frightened into a confeſſion, except Vitellia, who maintained to the laſt with great firmneſs, that ſhe had heard nothing. But more credit being given to thoſe who depoſed againſt him, Haterius Agrippa, who, as conſul elect, voted firſt, declared, that, in his opinion, he ought to be puniſhed with death; Lepidus was for condemning him to perpetutal baniſhment and confiſcating his eſtate. But of all the conſulars, Rubellius Blandus alone voting with Lepidus, and the reſt with Agrippa, Priſcus was conveyed to priſon, and immediately put to death. To what a deplorable ſtate of ſlavery was Rome already reduced! But Lutorius's real crime was, it ſeems, his having compoſed a poem on the death of Germanicus, which had been ſo well received, that Tiberius could not help rewarding him for it [p]. The emperor, who was ſtill in Campania, behaved on this occaſion with his uſual ambiguity; for in a letter, which he wrote to the ſenate, he commended their zeal in thus puniſhing the ſlighteſt injuries done to the prince; but at the ſame time entreated them not to be ſo haſty in puniſhing words: he praiſed Lepidus, blamed not Agrippa. His ſeeming to diſapprove of this ſudden execution gave riſe to a famous decree of the ſenate, viz. that their orders ſhould not be carried to the treaſury (H), nor the condemned perſon executed, in leſs than ten days. But no criminals reaped any benefit from this reſpite in Tiberius's reign, his cruel and revengeful temper being never ſoftened by time, as Tacitus well obſerves [q].

(H) In the treaſury were lodged the public regiſters and the decrees of the ſenate, which, till entered there, had neither the force nor name of decrees, but were called the orders or authority of the ſenate, as is evident from Cicero, Dion Caſſius, and other antient writers. This decree of the ſenate, by which it was provided, that no perſon condemned ſhould be executed till the tenth day after ſentence pronounced, was obſerved by Caligula, even with reſpect to thoſe whom he himſelf ſentenced to death (93), and probably by all the ſucceeding emperors to the time

(93) Senec. de tranq. c. 14. p. 354.

THE following year, Caius Sulpitius Galba and Decimus Haterius Agrippa being consuls, Caius Bibulus, one of the ædiles moved, that some regulation might be made against luxury, which, in spite of the sumptuary laws, was grown to a monstrous excess in the expence of entertainments, in the number of domestics, in the quantity of gold and silver plate, of pictures, statues, precious stones, &c. The motion was seconded by the other ædiles, who made long descants on the mischievous consequences of the growing evil. The fathers heard them with patience, but referred the whole matter to Tiberius; which occasioned a letter from him to time of Theodosius the Great, who granted twenty days more to those who were condemned (94) either by the prince, or the senate (95). This we find is the general opinion, an opinion, without all doubt, well grounded, since Tacitus, Dion Cassius, Suetonius, and Seneca affirm, in express terms, that Tiberius granted ten days respite to criminals after sentence, and the more modern writers unanimously ascribe to Theodosius the thirty days reprieve. But on the other hand, we read in Quintilian, who flourished about this time, the following words: "The "law forbidding a criminal to be executed till after thirty days "was wisely established, seeing the accuser may be deceived "(96);" and in Calpurnius Flaccus, who wrote long before Theodosius's time, "Let the punishment of a ravisher be de-"ferred thirty days (97)." As there is no reconciling testimonies so evidently opposite and contradictory, and on the other hand we have innumerable instances of transcribers mistaking numbers, we shall with the most judicious critics impute to them the present disagreement among authors. Perhaps in transcribing the declamations of Quintilian and Calpurnius in, or after, Theodosius's time, they adapted them to the law which that emperor had enacted. Baronius pretends, that the ten days reprieve extended to all criminals, by what judge soever condemned; and thence infers, that Pilate transgressed the law of his prince in causing our Saviour to be crucified as soon as he had pronounced sentence against him (98). But it is manifest from Gothofredus in his comments upon the Theodosian code, that neither the decree of Tiberius, nor the law of Theodosius, extended to the magistrates in the provinces till the time of Nicephorus Botoniates, who ordered all judges and magistrates to conform to the law of Theodosius (99).

the conſcript fathers, wherein, after commending the zeal of the ædiles, he owned, that the exceſſes they complained of required a regulation, that the prevailing evil ought to be checked by the ſevereſt laws; but nevertheleſs, if ſuch laws were enacted, even thoſe who now cenſure, at their entertainments and in their converſations, the profuſe luxury of the times, would be the firſt to complain, that the ſtate was utterly undone, that ſnares were laid for every noble and wealthy family, and that all men would become the prey of informers. In the end of his letter, he told them, that if any of the magiſtrates would undertake to put a ſtop to ſo great an evil, he ſhould have both his praiſes and thanks for eaſing him of part of his burden; but that as to himſelf, he would not take upon him that odious taſk: Believe me, conſcript fathers, ſaid he, I am not fond of being the object of the public hatred; I have already enemies enow: let me not therefore, I entreat you, wantonly and vainly raiſe more by ſuch regulations, as promiſe no advantage to you or to me. The ſenate, upon reading the emperor's letter, ordered the ædiles to proceed no farther in that matter. Tiberius, by thus rejecting the project of reforming luxury, which would have proved an inexhauſtible fund of crimes, impeachments, and confiſcations, gained the fame of moderation among the nobility, with whoſe wealth the accuſers would not have failed to enrich themſelves, had the emperor either enforced the antient, or enacted new, ſumptuary laws[r]. Soon after Tiberius wrote another letter to the ſenate, deſiring the tribunitial power for Druſus, which the fathers granted with the more refined flattery, as they had foreſeen this requeſt: ſtatues were decreed both to Tiberius and Druſus, altars were erected to the gods, arches raiſed, &c. M. Silanus moved, that for the future not the names of the conſuls, but of thoſe who exerciſed the tribunitial power, ſhould be prefixed to all public and private records; Haterius Agrippa, that the decrees of that day ſhould be written in letters of gold and hung up in the ſenate. Thus the lords of the Roman ſenate, who once headed mighty armies, raiſed and depoſed great kings, beſtowed or took away empires, were by degrees changed into mean ſlaves, and become by their infamous flattery an object of deriſion and contempt to all foreign nations, nay to that very prince, whoſe favour they ſtrove to gain by diſgracing themſelves. Druſus, who was then in Campania, probably with his father, wrote to the ſenate, returning them thanks for the tribunitial power with which they had inveſted

ed him; but did not condeſcend to come to Rome, as was expected, to receive it. Soon after, Servius Maluginenſis, who, as prieſt of Jupiter, was not allowed to leave Italy, nay, to ſleep one night out of Rome, demanding the government of Aſia, and his ſuit being oppoſed by Lentulus the augur, and others, the affair was referred to Tiberius, who, in his anſwer to the ſenate, poſtponing the pretenſions of the prieſt of Jupiter, moderated the honours which had been decreed to Druſus with the tribunitial power, and particularly cenſured the motion of the golden letters, as contrary to the cuſtom of Rome. As the liberty of inſtituting ſanctuaries and priviledge places at pleaſure had long ſince prevailed among the Greek cities, and filled their temples with fugitive ſlaves, debtors, and criminals, Tiberius this year referred to the ſenate the examining of the privileges which thoſe cities enjoyed, and the grants on which they were founded. The ſenate and conſuls, after having heard the Greek deputies, and carefully ſearched into the validity of their ſeveral pretenſions, utterly ſuppreſſed ſome ſanctuaries, and either limited the extent, or abridged the privileges and immunities of others, ordering the decree they enacted on this occaſion to be engraved on braſs, and hung up in the temples of Greece [s]. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius abſolutely ſuppreſſed all ſanctuaries throughout the whole Roman empire [t]. Not long after Livia being ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, Tiberius haſtened back to Rome; ſince the mother and ſon either ſtill lived in perfect amity, or cunningly diſguiſed their mutual hatred: the latter was commonly believed at Rome; for Livia having not long before dedicated a ſtatue to Auguſtus, and placed her own name before that of Tiberius, the emperor was thought to have grievouſly reſented this, as an undervaluing the majeſty of the prince, but to have ſmothered his reſentment with a deep diſſimulation. However that be, the ſenate upon her illneſs decreed ſupplications to the gods, with the celebration of the great Roman games for her recovery, and betrayed on this occaſion ſuch a mean ſpirit of ſervitude, that Tiberius himſelf was aſhamed of their vile debaſement, and ſcandalous ſubmiſſions [u]. The next time the ſenate met, Caius Silanus, proconſul of Aſia, Cæſius Cordus, proconſul of Crete, and Lucius Ennius, a Roman knight, were accuſed before them, the two firſt of robbing the public, and the other of treaſon, for having uſed as the current coin a piece of ſilver, on which was engraved graved the effigies of Tiberius. To the charge of rapine and extortion againſt Silanus and Cordus, that none of their friends or relations might dare to plead for them in their trial, articles of treaſon were ſubjoined, a ſure bar, ſays Tacitus, to all aſſiſtance, and a ſeal upon their lips. They were both found guilty of male-adminiſtration and extortion, and condemned to perpetual baniſhment, and their eſtates declared confiſcated.

Caius Silanus and Cæſius Cordus condemned.

But Cneius Lentulus moving, that the eſtates of Silanus deſcending to him from his mother Cornelia, who was related to the Cæſars, might be reſtored to his ſon, Tiberius approved of and aſſented to, the motion: nay, he even mitigated the rigor of the ſentence which the ſenate had pronounced againſt him, alledging, that the iſland of Gyarus, to which they had confined him, was an unhoſpitable place and deſtitute of inhabitants, and begging, that in favour of the Junian family and in regard of his ſiſter Torquata, a veſtal of an unblemiſhed character, they would allow him for the place of his exile the iſland of Cythera. This the ſenators readily granted at the requeſt of the prince, who by this affected ſhew of clemency pretended to cover the artifice and violence which he had employed to deſtroy the unhappy proconſul (I). To what place Cordus was confined, we are not told. As for L. Ennius, the emperor judged the charge brought againſt him frivolous, and therefore would not allow him to be tried as a criminal. Whereupon Ateius Capito, with an affected ſpirit of liberty, cried out, that

The infamous flattery of Capito.

(I) Silanus was very hardly uſed in his trial, as Tacitus obſerves. The beſt pleaders of all Aſia were choſen on purpoſe to accuſe him. They charged him with cruelty and extortion in his government. To this charge was added that of treaſon by Mamercus Scaurus once conſul, Junius Otho prætor, and Brutidius Niger ædile. The number of his accuſers was encreaſed by Gellius Poplicola and Marcus Paconius, the former quæſtor to Silanus, the other his lieutenant. As he was accuſed of treaſon, no one dared to appear in his favour, he himſelf was no pleader or orator, and beſides, Tiberius, with an awful voice and countenance, was continually interrupting and confounding him with queſtions, which he was not allowed time to refute, nay, he was often forced to confeſs, leſt the emperor ſhould have aſked in vain. His ſlaves too were firſt by the emperors orders ſold to the public, and then examined upon the rack. He was no doubt guilty of cruelty and extortion; but the hatred and ſpite, which Tiberius ſhewed him, and his eagerneſs to get him condemned, were juſtly cenſured.

that the emperor intrenched upon the privileges of the ſenate; that all injuries done to the prince were public injuries, injuries done to the commonwealth, which it was the province of the ſenate, charged with the care of the republic, to revenge and reſtrain in ſpite of any one's private clemency and compaſſion. Tiberius had reaſon to cry aloud, as we are told he uſed to do, as often as he went out of the ſenate, "Oh men prepared for bondage!" He was, ſays Tacitus, irreconcileable to public liberty; but abhorred flattery, as ſuiting only with the ſpirit of ſlaves. The infamy of Capito was the more ſignal, as he debaſed by it, not only the dignity of the ſenator, but his own perſonal accompliſhments [u] (K). The condemnation of Silanus and Cordus was followed by a religious debate, in what temple the offering ſhould be placed, which the Roman knights had vowed to Fortune Equeſtrian for the recovery of Livia. As there

(K) Ateius Capito was a man of extraordinary accompliſhments, and one of the moſt learned civilians of his age. All we know of his pedigree is, that his grandfather was only a centurion under Sylla, and that his father arrived at the prætorſhip. Gellius, Macrobius, and Feſtus, quote ſeveral books wrote by him, viz. a comment upon the laws of the twelve tables, a hundred and twenty books "de jure," ten books "de jure "pontificum, ten de jure ſacerdotum," a treatiſe "of the duty "of a ſenator," and a volume of collections. But he debaſed, ſays Tacitus, his rare accompliſhments by the moſt infamous flattery and a mean obſequiouſneſs to power. Auguſtus honoured him early with the conſulſhip to raiſe him above Antiſtius Labeo, another civilian of equal knowledge and abilities, but of an unblemiſhed character and a probity which was proof againſt all temptations. However, Labeo obtained the prætorſhip; but his virtue checked his riſe to greater preferments, whence he was no leſs beloved and adored by the people, than his rival abhorred and deteſted. We do not find the name of Capito in the conſular tables; whence, as both Tacitus in this place and Pomponius in his book "de origine juris" (100) aſſure us, that he was raiſed to the conſulſhip, we conclude, that he was one of the conſuls who were called ſuffecti, becauſe ſubſtituted in the room of thoſe who died or reſigned. Pighius produces an antient marble diſcovered at Rome with this inſcription; "C. Ateio. Capitone. C. Vibio. Poſtumo. "cos." Vibius was, according to Pighius, conſul in the year of Rome 759.

there was no temple in Rome dedicated to Fortune under that title, but one at Antium, it was decreed, that the gift of the knights ſhould be preſented there. And now that matters of religion were on foot, Tiberius, as pontifex maximus, returned the anſwer which he had lately deferred, touching the pretenſions of Servius Maluginenſis, and produced a ſtatute of the pontiffs made under Auguſtus, declaring, that when the prieſt of Jupiter was taken ill, he might, with the conſent of the pontifex maximus, be abſent from the city two nights, except on days of public ſacrifice, and never more than twice a year. This regulation ſhewed that the adminiſtration of a province, which required a year's abſence, was incompatible with the office of the flamen dialis, or prieſt of Jupiter [w]. So that the government of Aſia, which Maluginenſis had demanded, was conferred on the conſular, who was next in ſeniority to him. When this affair was over, Æmilius Lepidus aſked and obtained leave of the ſenate to repair and beautify at his own expence the baſilic (L) of Paulus Æmilius. On the other hand, the emperor undertook to rebuild the theatre of Pompey, which had been conſumed by accidental fire, none of that family being equal to ſo great a charge, and promiſed that it ſhould ſtill be called by the name of its illuſtrious founder. On this occaſion he enlarged on the praiſes of his favourite Sejanus, to whoſe care and vigilance, he ſaid, it was owing, that the fire had done no greater damage. Hereupon the ſervile ſenate, applauding the prince's ſpeech, decreed a ſtatue to Sejanus to be placed in the theatre of Pompey [x].

(L) Baſilics were originally ſpacious halls in which kings, from whom theſe buildings borrowed their name, adminiſtered juſtice to their ſubjects. The Romans appropriated that name to great halls, having two ranges of pillars and two wings with galleries over them. Cicero ſpeaks of the baſilic mentioned here (1), which, according to him, was begun by Æmilius Paulus, then ædile, and afterwards conſul with C. Marcellus. It was afterwards finiſhed under Auguſtus by Paulus Æmilius, who was conſul in the year of Rome 730, and afterwards cenſor (2); but being conſumed by accidental fire, it was rebuilt twenty years after by another Æmilius (3). As it was at this time out of repair, Lepidus aſked leave to ſtrengthen and embelliſh it at his own expence.

We are told by Seneca [y], that upon the paſſing of this decree, Cremutius Cordus, of whom we ſhall ſpeak anon, cried out, "Now is Pompey's theatre utterly de-"ſtroyed."

THIS year Tacfarinas, quitting a-new the deſerts, to which he had been ſo often driven, appeared unexpectedly in the fruitful plains of Africa at the head of a numerous army; and having committed every-where dreadful devaſtations, he arrived to ſuch an height of boldneſs, as to ſend embaſſadors to Tiberius, demanding a ſettlement for himſelf and his army, and threatening the emperor, in caſe he did not grant him his requeſt, with an eternal war. Our hiſtorian tells us, that Tiberius never betrayed ſo much indignation and reſentment as on this occaſion, not being able to bear, that a deſerter, a free-booter, ſhould have the arrogance to offer terms of peace, as if he were an equal enemy. He therefore ordered Junius Blæſus, whom he continued another year in the government of Africa, to exert his utmoſt efforts againſt ſo bold and contemptible an enemy. Blæſus drove him every-where before him, and purſued him even into the deſerts, where he took his brother priſoner; but Tacfarinas himſelf had the good luck to make his eſcape, though the paſſes were beſet on all ſides by the enemy. However, as moſt of his forces were cut in pieces and his brother taken, Tiberius looked upon the war as concluded, and confirmed to Blæſus the title of imperator, which his troops had conferred upon him. He was the laſt private perſon who enjoyed that title, thenceforth peculiar to the reigning family (M). He was likewiſe honoured with the enſigns of triumph, Tiberius declaring that he thus diſtinguiſhed him in regard of Sejanus, who was his nephew, though in Tacitus's opinion his actions entitled him to all the honours that were conferred upon him [z]. This year died three perſons of great diſtinction, viz. Ateius Capito, the moſt learned civilian in Rome, but one who debaſed his extraordinary parts with the meaneſt and moſt ſervile flattery, as we have obſerved above; Aſinius Saloninus, grandſon to M. Aggrippa; and Aſinius Pollio, half brother to Druſus,

She died ſixty-four years after the battle of Philippi, in which her huſband loſt his life. As ſhe was immenſely rich, her will made a great noiſe; for ſhe left legacies to almoſt all the great men of Rome, but nothing to Tiberius, who did not ſeem to reſent in the leaſt this omiſſion, but allowed her panegyric to be pronounced in public, and her obſequies to be performed with all the pomp ſuitable to her rank. Before the corſe were carried, according to the Roman cuſtom, the images of twenty of the moſt noble families in Rome, to which the illuſtrious deceaſed was related; but as thoſe of Brutus and Caſſius were not ſeen among the reſt, the people took thence occaſion to extol the zeal with which thoſe two heroes had formerly ſignalized themſelves in the cauſe of liberty [a].

The original character and purſuits of Sejanus.

C. Aſinius Gallus and C. Antiſtius Vetus were the following conſuls. During their adminiſtration, the famous Sejanus took the firſt ſteps towards the execution of the black deſigns he had been long foſtering in his heart. As this powerful and ambitious miniſter, henceforth to his downfal, is to act a principal part in the preſent hiſtory, we ſhall premiſe a ſuccinct account of his original, manners, and characters,

(N) Aſinius Pollio, the famous orator and poet, one of Auguſtus's chief favourites, and Virgil's patrons, had a ſon by name Aſinius Gallus, who, according to Lipſius (4), was ſurnamed Saloninus from the city of Salona in Dalmatia, which was taken either by him, or during his conſulſhip. Salonius, or, as Tacitus and Dion Caſſius conſtantly call him, Aſinius Gallus, married Vipſania, the daughter of Agrippa, after Tiberius had divorced her to marry Julia. Tiberius had by her Druſus; and Aſinius Gallus many children, viz. Aſinius Saloninus, or Aſinius Gallus, mentioned by Tacitus in this place, Aſinius Gallus, Aſinius Pollio, who was conſul in the year of Rome 756, Aſinius Agrippa, and Aſinius Celer, whom Pliny calls a conſular man.

(O) Junius Silanus, who was conſul with L. Licinius Murena, married Servilia the ſiſter of Cato, and had by her Tertia or Tertulla, and this Junia, who was ſiſter to Brutus by the mother; for M. Junius Brutus was the famous Brutus's father.

racters, copied from the most creditable writers of antiquity. L. Ælius Sejanus was born at Vulsinii in Hetruria (P), son to Sejus Strabo, who, though commander of the prætorian guards under Augustus, and in the beginning of Tiberius's reign, was but a private Roman knight [b]. His mother was descended of an illustrious family, viz. the Junian; for Junius Blæsus, who at the death of Augustus commanded the legions in Pannonia, and afterwards signalized himself against Tacfarinas in Africa, was his maternal uncle. He had other relations in great employments, and even brothers, who had been consuls [c]; but these were perhaps of the Ælian family, into which Sejanus, as we conjecture from his name, was probably adopted. In the very beginning of Tiberius's reign, he was joined with his father in the command of the prætorian guards, and even then in high favour with the prince; whence no collegue was assigned him in that important employment, when his father was sent into Egypt, the government of which kingdom was, by the regulation of Augustus, committed only to private knights. In his early youth he was suspected of having for hire abandoned himself to the lewd desires of the famous Apicius (Q). As to his character,

(P) The poet Juvenal alludes to Vulsinii the birth-place of Sejanus in the following lines:

" Faviſſet, si oppressa foret secura senectus
" Principis, hac ipsa Sejanum diceret hora
" Augustum," &c.

For Nursæia, or as some will have it, Nortia, was the tutelar goddess of Vulsinii, as appears from Livy (5).

(Q) The antients mention three Apiciuses, all famous epicures. The first lived in the times of the republic, and is spoken of by Athenæus (6). The second, who is mentioned by our historian in this place, lived under Augustus and Tiberius; and the third, as appears from Suidas, under Trajan. The second was the most famous of all for gluttony; for after he had by voluptuous eating and drinking reduced his immense wealth to ten millions of small sesterces, he chose rather to put an end to his life, than retrench the usual expences of his table, for which the ter, Tacitus draws it in the following lines: With various inſinuations and artifices he got the aſcendant over Tiberius ſo far, that he made him, tho' reſerved to others, to himſelf careleſs and open. He did not accompliſh this ſo much through policy, for by that others overpowered him, as from the wrath of the gods againſt the Roman ſtate, to which his riſe and his downfal proved alike deſtructive. He had a ſtrong body and a bold mind. He diſguiſed his own faults, and impeached others: alike fawning and imperious. By his outward appearance one would have thought him modeſt, but in his heart he had the moſt unſatiable thirſt after power, to which he made ſometimes luxury and bribery ſubſervient, and ſometimes induſtry and application, qualities no leſs pernicious, when they are aſſumed for the vile purpoſes of power. Thus far Tacitus. The ambitious favourite, ſeeing himſelf by the indulgence of his kind maſter, lifted up above his condition and raiſed to the higheſt poſts of the empire, began to entertain thoughts of ſoaring ſtill higher. He was in power and authority the ſecond man in the Roman ſtate; but this to his ambition ſeemed little; he aimed at nothing leſs than the ſovereign power, towards the attaining of which, his firſt ſtep was to gain the affections of the prætorian guards, who were all under his command. Till his time they had been quartered all over the city, and diſperſed about the neighbouring towns and villages. But Sejanus, the remaining ſum was no ways ſufficient. Tongues of peacocks and nightingales, and the moſt exquiſite meats, that the foreſts, ſeas, or rivers produced, were, ſays Appian the grammarian, his daily food (7). He is ſtyled by Pliny "nepotum "omnium altiſſimus gurges." Seneca, who was his contemporary, tells us, that he publiſhed a book of cookery with which he infected the age he lived in (8). A treatiſe "de re culina-"ria," that is, of "cookery," was diſcovered by Albanus Torinus in the iſland of Maguelonne near Montpelier in 1529, and printed at Baſle twelve years after. Another copy of the ſame treatiſe had been diſcovered an hundred years before, by Enochus of Aſcoli, under the pontificate of Nicolas V. To both theſe manuſcripts was prefixed the name of M. Cælius Apicius; but Voſſius is of opinion, that this Apicius lived long after the famous epicure of that name, whoſe books, "de irritamentis "gulæ and de juſcellis," are mentioned by Seneca (9), Iſidore of Seville (10), and the old ſcholiaſt of Juvenal.

janus, pretending, that while they were thus ſcattered, they lived looſe and debauched, and could not be eaſily gathered into one body on any ſudden emergency, obtained leave of the emperor to aſſemble them into one camp, where, he ſaid, the military diſcipline would be obſerved with more exactneſs and ſeverity. As ſoon as the camp was finiſhed, he made it his chief ſtudy to gain the favour of the common ſoldiers by his affability and obliging behaviour; as for the tribunes and centurions, they were all choſen by him, and he took care to employ none but his own creatures and dependents. Having thus attached to his intereſt this formidable corps, the flower of the Roman forces, his next care was to gain a ſtrong party in the ſenate, which it was no difficult taſk for a favourite to effect, at whoſe diſpoſal were both the public money and the public employments; for no ſenator, however diſtinguiſhed by his birth or perſonal accompliſhments, was employed, unleſs recommended by Sejanus [d]. He is ſaid to have gained over to his intereſt even the wives of all the men of quality in Rome, by a private promiſe of marriage to each of them, when he attained the ſovereignty. This encouraged them to contribute all that lay in their power to his grandeur, which they looked upon as their own, and at the ſame time to acquaint him with the moſt ſecret counſels of their huſbands [e]. He did not even neglect the emperor's freedmen, but carefully cultivated their friendſhip too [f]. In the mean time, Tiberius, though a man of great penetration, inſtead of curtailing the overgrown power of his favourite, was ever extolling him, in his ſpeeches both to the ſenate and people, as the ſharer of his burdens, and even ſuffered his effigies to be adored in all public places, nay, among the eagles of the legions [g]; for they all carried the image of Sejanus in their colours, except thoſe that were then quartered in Syria, which refuſed to follow the example of the reſt [h].

But Sejanus's deſign of raiſing himſelf to the ſovereign power met with many obſtructions. The imperial family had a numerous iſſue; the emperor's ſon was a grown man, and his grandſons, the children of Germanicus, who was his ſon by adoption, were now of age. This, however, did not deter Sejanus from his wicked purſuits; he reſolved to cut off off the reigning family root and branch, that none of the blood of the Cæſars might traverſe his ambitious deſign. But as it was dangerous to cut them off all at once, he reſolved to deſtroy the whole race by degrees, and to begin with Druſus, who was continually complaining of his overgrown power (R), and had lately upon ſome conteſt ſhaken his fiſt at him; and, as he offered to reſiſt, given him a blow in the face. Upon this affront, Sejanus, after having examined with himſelf various expedients to rid himſelf of ſuch a rival, reſolved at length to apply to his wife Livia, the ſiſter of Germanicus; which he did accordingly; and having firſt, by pretending a violent paſſion for her, induced her to comply with his criminal deſires, prevailed upon her afterwards, without much difficulty, to concur with him in deſtroying her huſband. Thus the niece of Auguſtus, the daughter-in-law of Tiberius, the mother of ſeveral children by Druſus, diſgraced herſelf, her anceſtors, and her poſterity, with a mean adulterer, and all to exchange her preſent condition, both honourable and certain, for the hopes of one equally infamous and uncertain; for Sejanus had promiſed to marry her upon the death of her huſband, and make her his partner in the empire. Eudemus was made privy to the wicked deſign, becauſe he, as phyſician to Livia, under colour of his profeſſion, was frequently with her in private, and conſequently could adviſe and direct her without giving any umbrage. Sejanus, to convince Livia of the ſincerity of his intention, as to the promiſed marriage, and thereby encourage her to diſpatch her huſband, divorced his wife Apicata, though he had three children by her. But ſtill the blackneſs of the crime frightened Livia, and her ambition could not ſmother or get the better of her remorſe. Sejanus himſelf, abandoned as he was, could not, without horror, think of imbruing his hands in

He debauches his wife.

(R) Druſus complained, and indeed with a great deal of reaſon, that while he, the emperor's ſon, was in the flower of his age, another was called, as coadjutor to the government, nay, was in a manner declared collegue in the empire. Sejanus, ſaid he, has already formed a camp for the guards, that thus united, they may all at once receive his orders; the ſoldiery depend entirely upon him; his ſtatue is ſet up in the theatre of Pompey; in his grandchildren the blood of the Druſi will be mixed with that of Sejanus; what now remains but to ſee him inveſted with the ſovereign power, while the emperor's ſon is excluded from any ſhare in the adminiſtration?

In the mean time, Germanicus's ſecond ſon, by name Druſus, putting on the toga virilis, or the manly robe, had the ſame honours decreed him by the ſenate, which had been conferred on his elder brother Nero. On this occaſion Tiberius made a ſpeech in commendation of the youth, and likewiſe of his ſon Druſus, on account of the kindneſs he ſhewed to his brother's children (S). This raiſed new jealouſy in Sejanus, who judging it time to haſten the execution of his wicked deſign, ordered Eudemus to prepare a ſlow working poiſon, that the death of the young prince might be aſcribed to a caſual diſtemper. The fatal potion was adminiſtered to Druſus by Lygdus the eunuch, one of his freedmen, as was learnt eight years after, that is, the year in which

He cauſes Druſus to be poiſoned.

[i] Tacit. l. iv. c. 3.

(S) Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius, in the end of his ſpeech, told the conſcript fathers, as he had often done before, that he deſigned to take a progreſs into the provinces, alledging the multitude of veterans diſcharged, and thence the neceſſity of recruiting the armies. On this occaſion he enumerated all the legions then in pay, and named the countries, where they were quartered. As from this detail we may learn, what forces the Romans had then on foot, what kings were their confederates, and how far the boundaries of the empire extended, it would be an unpardonable omiſſion not to acquaint our readers with it, In the firſt place, Italy was guarded by two fleets, one at Miſenum in the Mediterranean, the other at Ravenna in the Adriatic ſea; and the coaſt adjoining to Gaul, by the gallies taken by Auguſtus at the battle of Actium, and ſent well manned and equipped to Forojulium. As to the legions, there were eight upon the Rhine to keep in awe both the Germans and Gauls, and three in Spain. In Mauritania reigned king Juba, of whom we ſpoke above, a friend and ally of Rome; the reſt of Africa was kept in ſubjection by two legions, and Egypt by the like number. Syria, quite to the banks of the Euphrates, was maintained by four legions. Thrace was poſſeſſed by Rhemetalces and the ſons of Cotys, who were in alliance with Rome; on the banks of the Danube lay four legions; two were quartered in Pannonia, two in Mœſia, and two in Dalmatia. The latter two, by the ſituation of the country, were at hand to ſupport the former, and might be ſoon in Italy upon any ſudden emergency; though Rome had her peculiar guards, nine prætorian and three city cohorts. Beſides the legions, fleets, and cohorts, which we have enumerated in the ſeveral provinces, were

Sejanus was diſgraced and puniſhed according to his deſerts, this whole ſcene of iniquity being then brought to light by his wife Apicata, and the particulars of the murder owned by Eudemus and Lygdus on the rack. Druſus fell into a lingering diſtemper, pined away and died. Tiberius, during the whole time of the illneſs of his ſon, appeared altogether unconcerned, perhaps to make a ſhew, ſays Tacitus, of the firmneſs and conſtancy of his mind; nay, after his death, when his corſe lay yet unburied, he went to the ſenate, and finding the conſuls had left their curule chairs, and placed themſelves, as a token of their grief, on a common ſeat, he put them in mind of their dignity and ſtation; and the ſenate burſting into tears, he ſmothered his own ſorrow to comfort them, which he did in a ſpeech uttered without the leaſt heſitation: he told the fathers, that he was well appriſed he might be cenſured for appearing among them while his grief was yet freſh, when few in the firſt tranſports of their ſorrow could endure even the comforting ſpeeches of their relations, or behold the day. Though thoſe who thus indulged their grief were not, he ſaid, to be condemned of weakneſs, yet for his part, he had ſought for more powerful comforts, ſuch as aroſe from purſuing the welfare of the republic. He then lamented the preſent condition of the imperial family, the extreme age of his mother, the tender years of his grandſons, and his own life in its decline, and begged, that the ſons of Germanicus, who alone could leſſen the preſent misfortunes, might be introduced. Hereupon the conſuls went for them, and bringing in the two youths, Nero and Druſus ſtationed, according to their ſituation and neceſſity, the fleets of the ſeveral allies, with bodies both of horſe and foot, no ways inferior either in number or ſtrength to the Roman legions. From this vaſt number of forces kept in conſtant pay, we may judge of the ſtrength and wealth of the empire at this time. As to the emperor's intended progreſs, Suetonius tells us, that he often declared in the ſenate his intention of viſiting the provinces and armies abroad, and made almoſt every year the neceſſary preparations for his journey, ordering carriages to be bought, and proviſions to be laid in at a great charge in all the municipal towns and in the colonies; nay, he went ſo far as to let the people make their ſolemn vows for his happy journey, and ſafe return, but in the mean time never ſtirred out of Rome, or went only to the neighbouring towns; whence he was generally nicknamed Callipedes, one, who according to the Greek proverb, was always running, yet never advancing (10).

(10) Suet. in Tib. c. 38.

Druſus, preſented them to the emperor, who taking them by the hand, addreſſed the ſenate thus: "Conſcript fathers, theſe father-
"leſs children I commended to their uncle, and beſought him, He recommends to them the ſons of Germanicus.
"though he had iſſue of his own, to bring them up and che-

"dreſs my prayers to you, and, in the preſence of the gods
"and our country, conjure you to receive into your protecti-

"Auguſtus, deſcended from moſt illuſtrious anceſtors; fulfil

"are in the ſtead of a father: your condition is ſuch, that what"ever good or evil befalls you, muſt befall the common"wealth." This diſcourſe was heard with great ſatisfaction, and drew tears from the eyes of all who were preſent. Had Tiberius ſtopt here, he had left the hearts of the ſenators full of compaſſion and admiration. But as he repeated anew what he had often ſaid, and what had been as often ridiculed, viz. that he deſigned to reſtore the republic, the ſenators began to ſuſpect the ſincerity of his other aſſertions[k]. Before the ſenate broke up, they decreed the ſame honours to the memory of Druſus, which they had before decreed to that of Germanicus, adding many others to them agreeable to the genius of flattery. The obſequies were performed with the utmoſt pomp, and the funeral proceſſion diſtinguiſhed with a long train of images, repreſenting Æneas the ſuppoſed father of the Julian family, all the kings of Alba, Romulus founder of Rome, all the heroes of the Claudian race, with Attus Claudius, the firſt of that family who came to Rome, at the head of them. Tiberius himſelf pronounced the panegyric of his ſon, the people and ſenate aſſuming the outward appearance of mourners, but rejoicing in their hearts to ſee the houſe of Germanicus nearer the throne. Beſides, Druſus was generally hated, being cruel (T), paſſionate, given to drinking, and all manner of debau-

(T) Tacitus and Dion Caſſius give us ſeveral inſtances of Druſus's cruelty, The former writer tells us, that when he firſt preſided at a ſhew of gladiators exhibited in the name of Germanicus and his own, he betrayed ſuch delight in blood, that his father was ſaid to have reproved him for it. Dion Caſſius ſays, that he often upbraided him with his cruelty both in public and in private, and adds, that from him ſharp ſwords were ſtiled "gladii "Druſiani."

chery (U). However, he lived in a friendly manner with Germanicus, and after his death ſhewed himſelf kind, at leaſt not ill
His offspring diſpoſed, towards his children. He left behind him two ſons born at a birth, one of whom did not long ſurvive him, the other named Tiberius Nero Gemellus, lived to the reign of Caius by whom he was put to death. Tiberius, if we may give credit to Suetonius[l], deſpiſed them both, as doubting whether they were really the ſons of Druſus. As ſoon as the funeral ceremonies were over, Tiberius reſumed his uſual employments, prohibited any farther vacation, and to the embaſſadors of the Ilienſes or Trojans, who came ſomewhat too late with their compliments of condolence, anſwered by way of raillery, as if the memory of his loſs had been quite effaced, that he in his turn condoled with them for having loſt ſo brave and eminent a citizen as Hector[m].

"Druſiani." The perſon who exhibited the ſhew of gladiators uſed, as Lipſius obſerves, to examine the weapons of the combatants before they entered the liſts; on which occaſion Druſus approved of ſuch only as were exceeding ſharp; and thence ſharp ſwords were called Druſian ſwords. This was, no doubt, a great inſtance of his cruelty, as it was of humanity and good nature in M. Antoninus, to approve on the like occaſion of ſuch ſwords only as were blunt, and incapable of occaſioning deep wounds. Beſides Druſus, as Dion informs us, was very paſſionate, and upon the leaſt provocation ready to ſtrike perſons of the firſt quality; whence he was nicknamed Caſtor, whom the antients ſuppoſe to have been a famous boxer.

(U) Tacitus tells us, that in relating the death of Druſus, he followed the greateſt part of the Latin hiſtorians, and the moſt credible; but adds, that a ſtrong report prevailed in thoſe times, and was ſtill current in his, as if Tiberius himſelf had at the inſtigation of Lygdus, preſented the poiſonous potion to his ſon. The eunuch, according to this report, charged Druſus with a deſign of poiſoning his father; and privately warning the emperor of this, adviſed him to beware of the firſt draught offered him in the next entertainment at his ſon's houſe. Upon this, Tiberius, fully perſuaded of Druſus's wicked deſign, after he had ſat down to table, delivered to him the firſt cup that was preſented to him, which the young prince, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting any plot, gayly drank off. This heightened the jealouſy of Tiberius, who upon the death of his ſon, which happened ſoon after, the potion having beforehand been poiſoned by Lygdus, concluded, that Druſus through fear and ſhame had ſwallowed that death which he had prepared for his father. This report our hiſtorian refutes

SEJANUS, when he saw the death of Druſus paſs unreveng-ed, encouraged with the ſucceſs of his firſt attempt, began to meditate how he might deſtroy the ſons of Germanicus, whoſe ſucceſſion to the empire was now unqueſtionable. But as he could not compaſs his wicked ends by poiſon, on account of the great vigilance of their mother Agrippina, and the diſtinguiſhed fidelity of their governors, he choſe to attack them another way, which was to rouſe the old hatred Livia bore to Agrippina, and by her means raiſe jealouſies and ſuſpicions againſt her and her children in the mind of the emperor. His wicked counſels had their deſired effect; for having by a thouſand calumnies and falſe inſinuations rendered Livia, who was naturally greedy of power, irreconcileable to the widow of her grandſon, he compaſſed by her means the ruin of that unhappy family, as we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to relate.

IN the mean time, Tiberius, reſuming the care of public affairs, attended the adminiſtration of juſtice at Rome, and diſpatched the petitions from the provinces. At his motion the cities of Cibyra in Aſia and Ægyra in Achaia, both overthrown by an earthquake, were by a decree of the ſenate eaſed of tribute for three years. Vibius Serenus, proconſul of the Farther Spain or Bœtica, being accuſed of governing his province in a violent and arbitrary manner, was condemned and baniſhed into the iſland of Amorgos. But Carſius Sacerdos and Caius Gracchus (W), being charged with ſupplying Tacfarinas with corn, were both acquitted[n]. This year at length, after many complaints as void of all appearance of truth. For, who can believe, ſays he, that a man of common prudence, much leſs Tiberius, ſo long practiſed in great affairs, would to his own ſon, without ſo much as hearing him, preſent with his own hands the mortal potion? He would, no doubt, have tortured the informer, enquired into the plot, endeavoured to diſcover the authors of it, and uſed that caution and ſlowneſs towards his only ſon, hitherto never ſuſpected of any ſuch crime, which was natural to him even in his proceedings againſt ſtrangers.

(W) Caius Gracchus was ſon to Sempronius Gracchus, who, on account of his amours with Julia, had been baniſhed by Auguſtus into the iſland of Cercina, and afterwards aſſaſſinated there by Tiberius's orders. When he firſt left Italy, he took his ſon Caius, then very young, along with him, as a companion in his exile. Caius grew up there among fugitives and men deſtitute of liberal education, and afterwards ſupported himſelf by traffic between Africa and Sicily. But, notwithſtanding the low condition to which he complaints from the prætors, which had proved ineffectual, Tiberius, who had before layed the players under various reſtraints and curtailed their wages, repreſented to the ſenate, that they had on many occaſions raiſed tumults, and diſturbed the public tranquillity, that they promoted debauchery in private families, that the obſcenities of the Oſcan farce, the ſame with the Atellana, of which we have ſpoken in a foregoing volume[o], were grown to ſuch exceſs, that it required the authority of the ſenate to check them, &c. Upon theſe complaints from the emperor, the players were all driven out of Rome and Italy[p], and forbidden, if we believe Dion Caſſius[q], to act in any place whatſoever of the Roman dominions. The ſame year, died one of Druſus's twins, for whoſe death the emperor was greatly concerned, and no leſs afflicted for that of Lucillius Longus his antient and conſtant friend, and the only ſenator who had attended him in his retreat to Rhodes, and ſhared with him both his good and bad fortune; for which reaſon, though he was but a new man, the ſenate decreed him a public funeral, and a ſtatue to be placed in the forum built by Auguſtus. At the ſame time, Lucillius Capito, the emperor's procurator in Aſia, being accuſed before the ſenate by the province, Tiberius proteſted, that Lucillius had no authority from him but over his ſlaves, that he had only empowered him to collect his domeſtic rents, and therefore, if he had uſurped the authority of a prætor, or employed military force, he had therein traſgreſſed his orders. Hereupon the ſenate, after hearing the allegations of the province, found him guilty and condemned him. The cities of Aſia were ſo taken with the moderation Tiberius ſhewed on this occaſion, and the ſeverity with which he had proceeded the year before againſt Caius Silanus, accuſed of cruelty and extortion, that they decreed a temple to him, to his mother, and to the ſenate, and obtained leave to build it. For this conceſſion Nero returned thanks to the ſenate and his grandfather in a ſpeech which charmed the fathers, who imagined they heard and ſaw Germanicus himſelf[r]. This temple was built at Smyrna, and finiſhed three years after, as Dion Caſſius informs us[s]. Towards the

he was reduced, the ſplendor of his illuſtrious family would have occaſioned his ruin, had not Ælius Lamia and Lucius Apronius, ſucceſſively proconſuls of Africa, cleared him from the crime laid to his charge.

the end of this year Servius Maluginenſis dying, his ſon was appointed flamen Dialis, or prieſt of Jupiter, in his room, and Cornelia choſen ſuperior of the veſtals in the place of Scantia likewiſe deceaſed. To Cornelia a preſent of two thouſand great ſeſterces was decreed, and a privilege granted to Livia of ſitting amongſt the veſtals in the theatre[t], whoſe place was, as Suetonius informs us, over-againſt the prætor's tribunal[u], no other women, however diſtinguiſhed, having a peculiar place, but all ſitting promiſcuouſly together, apart from the men, purſuant to the regulations of Auguſtus.

THE following year, Sergius Cornelius Cethegus and L. Viſellius Varro being conſuls, the pontiffs, and after their example the other prieſts, making vows for the proſperity of the emperor, commended at the ſame time Nero and Druſus to the gods; which greatly provoked Tiberius, who ſending for the pontiffs, examined them, whether they had paid that compliment to the entreaties or menaces of Agrippina. The pontiffs denied both, but nevertheleſs the emperor rebuked them for putting youths upon the level with a man of his years, and afterwards in a ſpeech to the ſenate warned the fathers to take care for the future not to feed the pride of the young men with untimely and too early honours. Sejanus, ever intent on improving all opportunities of inflaming Tiberius againſt Agrippina, laid hold of this to inſinuate, that Rome was rent into factions, that already ſome had the boldneſs to declare themſelves openly the partizans of Agrippina, and that there was no other remedy againſt the prevailing ſpirit of faction, but the cutting off, under other pretences, one or two of the moſt forward and powerful. Hereupon it was by the deluded emperor thought expedient, that the ſuppoſed riſing faction ſhould be immediately ſuppreſſed, by the utter ruin of all the friends of the houſe of Germanicus. The chief among theſe were Caius Silius and Titius Sabinus, and with them it was agreed to begin this general maſſacre. Other conſiderations, beſides the friendſhip of Germanicus, concurred to ruin Silius. He had commanded for ſeven years a powerful army, and had been diſtinguiſhed, as we have related above, with the enſigns of triumph for his exploits in Germany; he had routed Sacrovir, and ſuppreſſed the revolt in Gaul; but by boaſting his ſervices, and publicly vaunting that he had ſecured the ſovereign authority to Tiberius, by keeping his ſoldiers in their obedience, when the other legions in Germany revolted, he had incurred the diſpleaſure of the emperor, who, thinking himſelf incapable.

incapable of rewarding, as he ought, ſuch important ſervices, was glad of any favourable opportunity to get rid of the perſon who had rendered them. So that his chief offence was over-much ſervice done to Tiberius; thence that refined obſervation of Tacitus, that benefits are ſo far acceptable, as it ſeems poſſible to requite them; but when once they have exceeded all retaliation, hatred is returned for gratitude. His wife too, by name Soſia Galla, contributed to his ruin by her friendſhip and intimacy with Agrippina. Both Tiberius and Sejanus thought it adviſeable to have Silius and his wife arraigned firſt, and poſtpone for ſome time the tryal of Sabinus. Accordingly, the ſenate was ſummoned, and Silius accuſed by Varro (X) the conſul of keeping up a correſpondence with the authors of the revolt in Gaul, and of diſhonouring his victory with cruel extortions: the behaviour of his wife and her avarice were likewiſe objected to him. Silius made no defence, being well appriſed it would be to no purpoſe: he only dropped ſome words to ſhew by whoſe malice he was oppreſſed. They were both declared guilty of treaſon, for under that article the whole charge was brought againſt them. Silius prevented his condemnation by a voluntary death; yet his eſtate was confiſcated, contrary to the conſtant cuſtom of Auguſtus, who beſtowed on the children of the condemned the eſtates of ſuch as died before ſentence, whether their death was natural or voluntary. His wife Soſia was baniſhed at the motion of Aſinius Gallus, who propoſed, that one half of her effects ſhould be forfeited, and the other left to her children. Marcus Lepidus voted the fourth part to the accuſers, as the law required, and all the reſt to the children. Which of theſe two opinions prevailed, our hiſtorian does not inform us. On this occaſion Cotta Meſſalinus moved, that by a decree of the ſenate, governors of provinces, however innocent in themſelves, ſhould be equally puniſhed for the crimes of their wives as for their own. As this decree is mentioned by Ulpian, we may ſuppoſe that it paſſed this year, though that writer ſpeaks of it as made four years before. Calpurnius Piſo was tried next, and charged by Quintus Granius with treaſonable words privately uttered againſt the emperor:

Prevents his condemnation by a voluntary death.

Calpurnius Piſo tried.

(X) Tacitus tells us, that Silius ſeeing the conſul engaged againſt him as an accuſer, begged the emperor to poſtpone the trial till the time of his conſulſhip was expired; but that his requeſt was rejected by Tiberius, who, cloaking his acts of tyranny under venerable old names, anſwered, that as other magiſtrates were allowed to bring particulars upon their trial, the prerogative of a conſul in the like caſe ought not to be infringed, ſince it was chiefly incumbent upon him to take care, that no damage accrued to the republic.

ror: to this charge the accuſer added, that Piſo kept poiſon in his houſe, and came into the ſenate armed with a dagger. The latter article ſeemed incredible, and therefore was dropped; but for other crimes, of which he was no leſs falſly accuſed, he was put upon his trial, but his condemnation was prevented by a natural death (Y). Then complaints were made of Caſſius Severus (Z), who, though formerly confined to the iſland of Crete for his petulant and ſatirical writings, yet continued even in his exile his former practices, defaming the moſt illuſtrious perſons in Rome. He was therefore ſtript of his eſtate, and baniſhed into the inhoſpitable iſland of Seriphos, which we have deſcribed elſewhere [u]. About this time Plautius Silvanus prætor, killed his wife Apronia, by throwing her headlong

(Y) L. Calpurnius Piſo was one of the boldeſt men at that time in Rome, and had threatened, as we have related above, to quit Rome, and to retire into ſome diſtant corner of the earth, where he might be free from the mercileſs purſuits of the informers. Tiberius bore this calmly, nay, he even deſcended to ſoften him with kind words. Afterwards the undaunted Piſo, in defiance of the power of Livia, proſecuted her favourite Urgulania, and could not be prevailed upon to drop the proſecution, though ſhe had taken ſanctuary in the emperor's palace. This alſo Tiberius diſſembled; but though he often ſuppreſſed his reſentment, yet deep impreſſions remained in his unforgiving ſoul. Piſo is now charged with treaſon, and but for a natural death, which very ſeaſonably intervened muſt have been puniſhed as a traitor.

(Z) Auguſtus was the firſt, as we have obſerved above, who brought libels under the penalties of the law of majeſty or treaſon. To this he was chiefly induced by the inſolence of Caſſius Severus, who had in his writings wantonly defamed the moſt illuſtrious men and women in Rome. He was of a mean deſcent, but an excellent ſpeaker, and had a particular turn for ſatyre. He wrote alſo an hiſtory, which we find quoted by Suetonius (11) and Tertullian (12). Seneca makes honourable mention of him in his controverſy (13). Tacitus tells us in this place, that he grew old among the rocks of Seriphos; which is agreeable to what we read in Euſebius, viz. that Caſſius Severus, a famous orator, died of want in the twenty-fifth year of his exile, being reduced to ſuch poverty, that he had not wherewithal to cover his nakedneſs (14). S. Jerom ſuppoſes him to have died for want of neceſſaries in the eighth year of his baniſhment (15).

headlong out of one of the windows of his apartment. Whereupon, being carried by Apronius his father-in-law before the emperor, he pretended, that while he was aſleep, his wife had been the occaſion of her own death. Upon this anſwer, Tiberius, unmindful of his dignity, haſtened to Silvanus's chamber, and finding there evident marks of his violence and his wife's ſtruggling, he made his report to the ſenate, who immediately appointed judges to try the prætor. In the mean time, his grandmother Urgulania, who, as we have obſerved above, was one of Livia's chief favourites, finding ſhe could not with all her intereſt ſave the life of her grandſon, ſent him, by the advice of Tiberius, as was ſuppoſed, a dagger, which was tacitly adviſing him to prevent his impending condemnation by a voluntary death. The criminal had not courage enough to make uſe of the dagger; but cauſing his veins to be opened, bled to death. After his death, his former wife Numantia, whom he had divorced to marry Apronia, was accuſed of having by charms and potions diſordered the underſtanding of her huſband, but was acquitted [w].

Tacfarinas defeated and killed.

THIS year at length put an end to the war with Tacfarinas the Numidian, who was utterly routed and killed by P. Dolabella, proconſul of Africa, with the aſſiſtance of Ptolemy, who had ſucceded his father Juba in the kingdom of Mauritania. The proconſul deſired the enſigns of triumph for his victory, which had been granted to three others; but Tiberius refuſed him that mark of diſtinction in compliment to Sejanus, that the fame of his uncle Blæſus might not be thence eclipſed. Dolabella on his return to Rome brought with him many diſtinguiſhed captives, among whom was the ſon of Tacfarinas; and was attended by embaſſadors from the Garamantes, a people of the Inner Libya, who, being frightened with the death of Tacfarinas, whom they had aſſiſted, thought it adviſeable to appeaſe, by an embaſſy, the reſentment of the Roman people. To Ptolemy, king of Mauritania, who had bore great ſhare in this war, was diſpatched a ſenator with an ivory ſtaff and an embroidered robe, preſents which the Roman people uſed to ſend in antient times to kings, who were their friends and confederates [x]. The ſame year, one Titus Curtiſius, formerly a ſoldier of the prætorian guards, ſowed the ſeeds of a ſervile war, inviting by declarations, publicly hung up, all ſlaves to reſume their liberty. But this tumult was ſuppreſſed juſt as it was breaking out, the leader himſelf and the moſt reſolute men of his party being ing surprised and dragged to Rome, which was already in great consternation on account of the immense number of domestic slaves [y].

Vibius Serenus accused by his own son.

DURING the same consulate, Rome saw an example of horror and unnatural cruelty, which alone is sufficient to render the reign and memory of Tiberius execrable to the latest posterity. Vibius Serenus, proconsul of the Farther Spain, was condemned, as we have related above, for arbitrary administration, and banished to the island of Amorgos. But now that unhappy father is dragged from the place of his exile to a fresh trial, being accused by his son of treasonable practices against the majesty of the emperor. The father appeared before the senate, bound in chains, with a dejected countenance, and in the dismal habit of a criminal, while the son, in the gayest attire, as if he intended to insult nature itself, alledged a plot framed by his father against the emperor, accusing him at the same time of having sent conspirators into Gaul, to stir up the people there to rebellion. He likewise charged Cæcilius Cornutus, formerly prætor, with having supplied the conspirators with money. Cornutus, tho' innocent, no sooner heard himself accused, than, looking upon his accusation only as a signal of destruction, he laid violent hands on himself. But Serenus, turning full upon his son and shaking his chains, begged of the gods with tears in his eyes, that they would restore him to the place of his exile, where he might pass his days far from such objects of horror, and that they would one day take just vengeance of such a cruel and unnatural son. He then urged, that Cornutus was innocent, and only frightened with a false accusation; and challenged his son to produce other witnesses and name other confederates, since it was not probable, that with one accomplice only he should have thought of murdering the prince, and introducing a change in the government. The accuser then named Cneius Lentulus and Seius Tubero, both men of the first rank in Rome and Tiberius's intimate friends. Besides, Lentulus was extremely old, and Tubero broken with infirmities; insomuch, that Tiberius himself could not help blushing in hearing them named. Dion Cassius tells us, that Lentulus, finding himself, aged as he was, charged with meditating the murder of the prince and a change of state, broke into a loud laugh; and that the emperor instantly acquitted him, saying, "I do not deserve to "live, if I am hated even by Lentulus [z]." Tubero was likewise discharged, but the slaves of the pretended criminal were were examined upon the rack, and their teſtimony proved favourable to their maſter. Hereupon the populace, provoked at ſuch monſtrous and unheard-of prceedings, began to threaten the unnatural ſon with the puniſhments inflicted by the laws on parricides; which ſo terrified him, that he fled privately out of Rome and withdrew to Ravenna. But Tiberius, ſtill remembering ſome expreſſions, a little too free, which Serenus had uſed in a letter written to him eight years before (A), and no wiſe diſguiſing his old hatred, obliged the ſon to return and purſue the action begun againſt his father. Nothing could be proved againſt him; nevertheleſs the votes being taken, he was ſentenced to death as a traytor. And then Tiberius, to mitigate the odium accruing to him from ſuch a crying piece of injuſtice, granted him his life. Hereupon Aſinius Gallus was for confining him to the iſland of Gyarus, or to that of Donuſa; this motion was diſliked by the emperor, becauſe both theſe iſlands were deſtitute of water, and to whom life is granted, ſaid he, the neceſſaries of life ought likewiſe to be granted. Serenus was therefore remanded to Amorgos [a]. The death of Cornutus, who had laid violent hands on himſelf, gave occaſion to the following motion in the ſenate; viz. that when a perſon charged with treaſon ſhould put an end to his own life before he was condemned, the accuſers ſhould looſe their rewards, which were the fourth part of the condemned perſon's eſtate. This motion ſeemed reaſonable, and would have been generally approved of, had not Tiberius, throwing off his uſual diſguiſe and reſerve, openly declared himſelf an advocate for the accuſers, ſaying with great ſternneſs, that by this means the laws would be defeated and the republic overturned; and that they had better diſannul the laws themſelves, than remove their guardians. Thus theſe bloody and deſtructive inſtruments, ſays Tacitus, never ſufficiently curbed by any terrors or puniſhments, were now allured and encouraged by ample rewards [b]. The ſame year, were accuſed and convicted Caius

(A) Tacitus tells us, that after the condemnation of Libo Druſus, Serenus had by letters upbraided the emperor for not rewarding the ſingular zeal with which he had ſignalized himſelf in that trial, uſing expreſſions more free than the tender ears of a prince, naturally proud and jealous of his prerogative, could bear. Our hiſtorian, in his account of that famous trial, which he ſeems to have deſcribed pretty minutely, does not mention Serenus among the informers, though he acted, as appears from this paſſage, a chief part on that occaſion.

Caius Cominius, a Roman knight, Publius Suilius, formerly quæſtor to Germanicus, and Catus Firmius, a ſenator. Cominius had written a ſcurrilous poem againſt the emperor, who nevertheleſs pardoned him at the entreaties of his brother, who was a ſenator. Suilius, being convicted of taking a bribe in an affair which he was to decide as a judge, was by the ſenate only condemned to be driven out of Italy; but this ſentence appearing too mild to the emperor, he cauſed him to be baniſhed into an iſland, after having declared upon oath, that he conſulted therein the welfare of the republic. This ſeverity, which was then ſharply cenſured, turned afterwards to the emperor's praiſe: for Suilius, returning to Rome in the reign of Claudius, proved an abandoned mercenary and one of the moſt miſchievous miniſters of that weak prince; a proof this, of Tiberius's deep penetration and thorough knowledge of mankind, a knowledge in which he has been equalled by few, and excelled by none. Catus Firmius was likewiſe by the ſentence of the ſenate to be expelled Italy for forging crimes of treaſon againſt his ſiſter. But as he had been inſtrumental in procuring the deſtruction of Libo Druſus, by firſt malicioufly ſeducing him, and afterwards informing againſt him, as we have related above, Tiberius, mindful of this ſervice, but pretending other motives, ſaved him from baniſhment, but did not oppoſe his being expelled the ſenate [c].

Several perſons accuſed.

TACITUS begins the following year, when Coſſius Cornelius Lentulus and M. Aſinius Agrippa were conſuls, with an account of the arraignment and noble defence of Cremutius Cordus, a celebrated hiſtorian, who was accuſed of having praiſed Brutus in the annals he had publiſhed, and ſtyled Caſſius the laſt of the Romans, which was the elogium beſtowed upon him by Brutus himſelf. His accuſers were Satrius Secundus and Pinarius Natta, both creatures of Sejanus; which he looking upon as a ſignal of his deſtruction, and beſides obſerving great ſternneſs and indignation in the countenance of Tiberius, he caſt away all hopes of life, ſpoke in his own defence with the ſpirit and in the ſtyle, of a true Roman (B), and then, withdrawing from the ſenate,

" maintain the memory of Brutus and Caſſius but mine too."

Notwithſtanding this noble defence, the hiſtorian, not doubting, but he would have been condemned by the ſervile ſenate, returned many ages after: whence our hiſtorian takes occaſion to deride the ſtupidity of thoſe, who imagine they can by their preſent power conceal the tranſactions of their times from future ages; whereas it happens quite otherwiſe; for the puniſhment of writers gains credit to their writings, and kings reap no other fruit from it, than infamy to themſelves and glory to thoſe whom they thus perſecute [d]. But time has done what the emperor could not effect with all his authority; only ſome few fragments of Cremutius Cordus's hiſtory have been tranſmitted to us by Seneca [e], the reſt having been long ſince loſt. For this whole year accuſations were purſued with ſuch warmth, that even during the feſtival of the Feriæ Latinæ, while Druſus, probably the ſon of Germanicus, who had been appointed governor of Rome, was aſcending the tribunal to take poſſeſſion of his new employment, Calpurnius Salvianus accoſted him with a charge againſt Sextus Marius, which Tiberius highly reſented, turned home and ended his life by abſtinence. What Cordus ſays here of the ſtatues of Caſſius and Brutus is confirmed by other writers, namely by Plutarch who tells us, that Auguſtus took care, that all the honours which had been paid to the two heads of the republican party in their life-time, ſhould be preſerved inviolable to them after their death, and relates to this purpoſe the following ſtory: As Auguſtus was paſſing thro' the city of Mediolanum in Ciſalpine Gaul, he obſerved a ſtatue of Brutus, which was of excellent workmanſhip, and ſtrongly reſembled the original. Upon this he halted, and, in the preſence of many who attended him, called the magiſtrates before him, and told them, that their town had broken the league and honoured one of his enemies. At firſt the magiſtrates denied the fact, and, not knowing what he drove at, ſtared upon one another, as men under an inexpreſſible ſurpriſe. Then Auguſtus, pointing to the ſtatue aſked them with a frown, "Is not that my enemy, whom you have received into the very "heart of your city?" At theſe words the magiſtrates, ſtill more aſtoniſhed, were ſtruck dumb. Whereupon Auguſtus ſmiling commended them for their conſtancy to their friends, though in adverſity; and left orders, that the ſtatue ſhould remain ſtanding as he found it (16).

fented, publicly rebuking the informer, who was thereupon immediately baniſhed by the ſenate. The inhabitants of Cyzicum were this year accuſed of neglecting the worſhip of the deified Auguſtus, which they had eſtabliſhed in their city, and of committing violences upon ſome Roman citizens (B). They were therefore deprived of their liberty, which had been formerly granted them by the Roman people, in conſideration of their gallant behaviour during the Mithridatic war [f], as we have related elſewhere. Fonteius Capito, formerly proconſul of Aſia, was accuſed at the ſame time, but acquitted, it plainly appearing, that the crimes, laid to his charge by Vibius Serenus, were forged. And yet Serenus eſcaped unpuniſhed; nay the public hatred he had incurred, by falſely arraigning perſons of the greateſt diſtinction, rendered him the more ſecure: for, as our hiſtorian obſerves, the more miſchievous an accuſer was, the ſafer he was, thoſe only of the tribe being ſurrendered to puniſhment, who were incapable of doing great miſchief [g].

The inhabitants of Cyzicum deprived of their liberties.

ABOUT this time embaſſadors arrived in Rome from the Farther Spain, to beg leave of the ſenate to erect a temple, after the example of Aſia, to Tiberius and his mother. When they were introduced to the ſenate, the emperor laid hold of that occaſion to confute thoſe who had taxed him with ambition,

(B) The Cyzicenians had begun to build a temple in honour of Auguſtus, but neglected to finiſh it, and beſides had committed violence upon ſome Roman citizens (17). Of the latter fault they had been guilty alſo in the reign of Auguſtus, who thereupon deprived them of their liberties, which, however, he reſtored to them ſoon after (18). In the Mithridatic war they ſuſtained a ſiege, as we have related in our hiſtory of Pontus, with incredible bravery, and repulſed the king. But now, without any regard to their former ſervices, they are ſtript of thoſe privileges, which they had purchaſed by a moſt gallant behaviour and at the expence of their blood (19). We do not find, that their liberties were ever after reſtored to them; whence we conclude, that Strabo was either dead, or had put the laſt hand to his work before this year, the eleventh of Tiberius's reign, ſince he writes, that in his time the city of Cyzicum was free (20).

ambition, for having allowed the Aſiatics to pay him divine honours, and ſpoke in the following manner: "I know, conſcript fathers, that I am generally blamed, and taxed with inconſtancy, for not oppoſing the cities of Aſia, when they petitioned for this very thing. I ſhall therefore now acquaint you with the motives of my former ſilence, and at the ſame time with the rules I propoſe to follow for the future. As the deified Auguſtus did not oppoſe the founding of a temple at Pergamus to himſelf and the city of Rome (C), I, with whom all his Tiberius's wiſe reaſoning againſt admitting divine honours.

(C) Though in Auguſtus's time temples were built even in honour of the proconſuls and governors of provinces, yet that prince, as Suetonius informs us, would ſuffer no temples to be erected to him alone, but jointly to him and the city of Rome. Thus the temple mentioned here by Tiberius was built at Pergamus by the communities of Aſia, and conſecrated to Rome and Auguſtus. The repreſentation of this temple is to be ſeen on ſeveral coins which have reached our times, with this legend; "Com. Aſiae. Rom. et. Aug." that is, "The communities of "Aſia to Rome and Auguſtus (21)." The Smyrneans firſt erected a temple to Rome in the year of the city 558 (22): their example was followed about twenty four years after by the inhabitants of Alabanda, a city of Caria (23). In proceſs of time, a temple was erected in the city itſelf to Rome and Venus. Of this temple Prudentius ſpeaks in the following lines:

"——colitur nam ſanguine & ipſa
"More deæ, nomenque loci ceu numen habetur:
"Æque urbis Veneriſque pari ſe culmine tollunt
"Templa, ſimul geminis adolentur thura deabus."

The ſame poet addreſſes elſewhere Rome as a goddeſs, thus:

"Exaudi, regina tui pulcherrima mundi,
"Inter ſydereos Roma recepta polos."

Claudian places this temple on mount Palatine:

"Conveniunt ad tecta deæ, quæ candida lucent
"Monte Palatino, &c."

Says that poet, ſpeaking of the temple conſecrated to Rome (24).

Thus ſpoke Tiberius; but his reaſoning, however judicious and wiſe, was variouſly conſtrued, ſome aſcribing his thus rejecting divine honours to modeſty, others to diffidence, and many to a meanneſs of ſpirit unbecoming a prince. But whatever was his motive, he thenceforth continued to ſlight upon all occaſions, and even in private converſation, divine honours [g].

Sejanus aſks young Livia in marriage.

And now Sejanus, intoxicated with his exceſſive power, and beſides egged on by the importunity of Livia, the widow of Druſus, who was continually reminding him of his promiſe, preſented a memorial to the emperor, begging, that if an huſband were ſought for Livia, he would remember his friend, to whom he had already given innumerable inſtances of his affection and benevolence. Tiberius for a preſent anſwer commended the fidelity of Sejanus, curſorily recapitulated his own favours towards him, and demanded time to examine his requeſt with more maturity. At length he returned this anſwer: "That princes "were not, like other men, guided in their purſuits by the "notions of conveniency, but were in their actions chiefly to conſider the applauſe and approbation of the public; and therefore, that he would not put Sejanus off with "this obvious and plauſible anſwer, that Livia could herſelf determine whether ſhe would marry again or no, or "that ſhe had a mother and grandmother, with whom, "as nearer relations, ſhe might adviſe; but would deal "more candidly with him: And in the firſt place, as to the "enmity of Agrippina, it would become more outrageous, "if by the marriage of Livia the houſe of the Cæſars were "rent, as it were, into two oppoſite parties; that even "as things ſtood, great emulation reigned among the women, "which occaſioned a mutual miſunderſtanding in his grandſons. Sejanus was alarmed at this anſwer, as being well acquainted with the emperor's obſcure and diſtruſtful temper: laying therefore aſide all thoughts of marrying Livia, he earneſtly entreated him not to give ear to the ſlanderous reports of his enemies, nor hearken to the malicious inſinuations of ſuch as hated him, only on account of his unſhaken fidelity. The more he reflected on Tiberius's anſwer, the more apprehenſive he grew of giving him any umbrage. He was chiefly at a loſs how to comport himſelf with reſpect to the crowds of perſons of all ranks, who daily frequented his houſe to court his favour. To refuſe them admittance would be impairing his power, and the encouraging of them might, as he juſtly apprehended, furniſh a handle for criminal accuſations. In this perplexity he came at length to the following reſolution, viz. to urge the emperor to leave Rome, and retire to ſome pleaſant place remote from the noiſe and hurry of the city. From this counſel he promiſed himſelf great advantages; there could be no acceſs to the prince, but by him; all letters and expreſſes, as they were conveyed, according to the cuſtom which then obtained, by ſoldiers, who were at his devotion,

His two brothers, Scipo and Muræna, having loſt their eſtates in the civil wars, he reſerved only one-third of his eſtate for himſelf, and gave the reſt to them, for which generoſity he is deſervedly celebrated by Horace in the following lines:

would pass through his hands; the emperor, declining in age, and growing slothful and effeminate through the solitude of the place, would more easily transfer upon him the whole charge of the empire; finally, he himself should be removed from the crowds of such as to make their court attended him at Rome, which would stop one source of envy. He therefore began by little and little to rail at the hurry of business at Rome, cunningly insinuating to Tiberius the great and enormous inconveniencies of the city, the constant trouble of attending the senate, the discontented and seditious temper of the people, highly extolling at the same time a quiet and solitary retirement, a life without anguish of mind, free from envy and ill-will, and therefore more fit to dispatch important and weighty matters. A trial, which happened about this time, gave no small weight to the cunning insinuations of Sejanus. One Votienus Montanus (E), a man of great wit, was charged with contumelious speeches against the emperor. Æmilius the witness, a rough and unthinking soldier, to make good his evidence, repeated word for word what he had heard. The fathers endeavoured with their clamours to stop his mouth; but to no purpose, Æmilius obstinately persisting in the odious detail, and rehearsing with a loud voice all the reproaches he had ever heard uttered against the prince, who was so affected with them, that he could not forbear crying out, that he would instantly clear himself, either in their presence, or before an assembly of the people: Votienus was condemned, and, according to Eusebius [h], confined to the Balearic islands. At the same time, was condemned to banishment Aquila, a woman of distinction, for adultery, and Apidius Merula expelled the senate for not having sworn upon the acts of Augustus [i]. Next were heard embassadors from the Lacedæmonians and Messenians about the right each people claimed to a temple of Diana, which the senate, after hearing the parties, adjudged to the latter [k]. likewiſe of Segeſtum in Sicily ſent deputies to Rome, begging that the temple of Venus Erycina, fallen through age, might be rebuilt. This charge Tiberius readily took upon himſelf, becauſe the Segeſtani were ſuppoſed to be likewiſe deſcended from the Trojans. Then a petition was heard from the inhabitants of Marſeilles, claiming the eſtate of one Volcatius Moſchus, who, being baniſhed from Rome and by them admitted a citizen, had left to their republic, as to his country, his whole fortune. Their claim was approved, and the eſtate of Moſchus ſurrendered to them. This year died three Romans of great diſtinction, viz, Cneius Lentulus, Lucius Domitius, and Lucius Antonius. Lentulus had been conſul, and rewarded for his victories over the Getuli with the enſigns of triumph: he had long borne private poverty with great patience, and afterwards with equal modeſty enjoyed great wealth virtuouſly acquired. Domitius was the ſon of Lucius Domitius, who being condemned by the Pedian law as privy to the murder of Julius Cæſar, though he was no way acceſſory to it, betook himſelf to Brutus and Caſſius, who were his kinſmen, and continued with them till their death; after which he retained the command of the fleet, which they had given him long before, and conſiderably augmented it in ſpite of all his diſaſters. At length, when the republican party was irrecoverably ruined, he ſurrendered the fleet under his command to Marc Antony, and was the only perſon, condemned by the Pedian law, who was allowed to return to his native country, where he was advanced to the higheſt honours. Upon the breaking out of the civil war between Antony and Octavianus, the former appointed him his lieutenant; but he not approving of Antony's conduct, and ſome offering to confer the ſupreme command upon him, he retired to Auguſtus, and died a few days after[l]. His ſon, mentioned here by Tacitus, led a Roman army beyond the Elb, and advanced farther into Germany than any had done before him; whence he was honoured with the enſigns of triumph. He married Antonia the younger, or, as Suetonius has it, the elder[m], and had by her Cneius Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero. Lucius Antonius, who likewiſe died at this time, was the ſon of Julius Antonius, whom Auguſtus put to death on account of his criminal converſation with Julia. Upon the death of the father the emperor removed the ſon, then a child, to Marſeilles, where, under pretence of purſuing his ſtudies, he was long kept in an honourable exile. However, as he was the grandſon of Octavia

Octavia, Auguſtus's ſiſter, by his mother Marcella, he was honoured with a public funeral, and his bones were, by a decree of the ſenate, repoſited in the tomb of the Octavian family [n].

During the adminiſtration of the ſame conſuls, Lucius Piſo, governor of the Hither Spain, as he travelled through the province unguarded, was attacked unawares by a peaſant and diſpatched with one blow. The aſſaſſin, by the fleetneſs of his horſe, eſcaped to a neighbouring foreſt and there quitted him. But the horſe being taken, the owner was ſoon diſcovered, ſeized, and put to the rack, which he bore with incredible conſtancy and reſolution, declaring in the language of his country, that his accomplices might ſafely ſtand by; for no torture or pain, however exquiſite, ſhould extort from him a diſcovery. The next day as they were dragging him again to the rack, he broke from his keepers, and daſhed his head with ſuch violence againſt a ſtone, that he immediately expired [o].

Lucius Piſo governor of Hither Spain killed by a peaſant.

The following year, Lentulus Getulicus, the ſon of Cneius Lentulus mentioned above, and Caius Calviſius Sabinus being conſuls, Poppæus Sabinus was honoured with the enſigns of triumph for his ſucceſsful exploits againſt the wild Thracians, who had taken arms, and endeavoured to drive the Romans out of their country, on account of their raiſing recruits amongſt them and conveying their ſtouteſt youths out of the country. They were, after a moſt vigorous reſiſtance, utterly defeated by Sabinus, and forced to ſubmit. This year, diſcord began to reign in the imperial family, which we ſhall ſee end at laſt in the deſtruction of Agrippina. Claudia Pulchra, her couſin, being accuſed by Domitius Afer of adultery with one Furnius, and likewiſe of employing magical charms and preparing poiſon for the emperor, ſhe flew to Tiberius; and finding him by chance ſacrificing to Auguſtus, as ſhe was, notwithſtanding her great virtue, of a violent temper, ſhe took occaſion from the ſacrifice he was offering to upbraid him, and tell him, that it ill became the ſame man to offer victims to the deified Auguſtus, and proſecute his poſterity; that his divine ſpirit was not transfuſed into dumb ſtatues and images; that the genuine images of Auguſtus were his deſcendents, of whom ſhe herſelf was one, in great diſtreſs and in the ſtate of a ſuppliant. She added, that other crimes were in vain alledged againſt Pulchra, when the only cauſe of her intended ruin was, that ſhe had unadviſedly loved Agrippina, even to adoration, not remembering the fate of Soſia, whoſe condemnation and misfortunes were owing to the the ſame crime, the like unſeaſonable affection. Theſe bitter words highly provoked Tiberius; but nevertheleſs, as he had a perfect command of his temper, he only rebuked her, by telling her in a Greek verſe, which he quoted out of an antient tragedy, "If you do not reign, you think yourſelf "injured;" and then diſmiſſed her, without vouchſafing her any further anſwer. Pulchra and Furnius, notwithſtanding the ſolicitations and remonſtrances of Agrippina, were both condemned. Some time after, Agrippina falling ſick, the emperor went to pay her a viſit, when ſhe, after many tears and long ſilence, at length entreated him to give her an huſband, in whom ſhe and the children of Germanicus might find a faithful protector againſt the malicious deſigns of their enemies. But Tiberius, well appriſed to what an height of power in the ſtate the perſon would be raiſed, who married the grand-daugher of Auguſtus, and, on the other hand, not caring openly to withſtand ſo reaſonable a requeſt, leſt it ſhould betray jealouſy or fear in him, inſtantly left her, though very preſſing with him, without returning her any anſwer. This behaviour was highly reſented by Agrippina, and Sejanus, to enflame her ſtill more, and by that means haſten her ruin, employed his ſecret agents to warn her, under colour of friendſhip, that poiſon was prepared for her, and that ſhe ought to avoid eating at her father-in-law's table. As Agrippina was a ſtranger to all diſſimulation, ſhe followed their advice; and though ſhe ſat near the emperor, touched no part of the meat; which Tiberius obſerving, to be the better convinced of her ſuſpicions, after having praiſed the apples that ſtood before him, preſented ſome of them to her with his own hand. This only encreaſed the ſuſpicion of Agrippina, who, without ſo much as offering to taſte them, delivered them to the waiters. However, Tiberius, always dark and reſerved, ſpoke not a word openly; but turning to his mother, "No wonder," ſaid he, "that I "ſhould uſe ſeverity with her, ſince ſhe charges me with "a deſign of poiſoning her." Hence a rumour was immediately ſpread abroad, that her ruin was reſolved upon; but that the emperor, not daring to attempt it openly, had choſe to diſpatch her by ſome ſecret means. Tiberius, to ſuppreſs that report, by diverting the public talk upon other topics, attended the ſenate with great aſſiduity, and gave audience to ſeveral embaſſadors from Aſia, contending in what city the temple lately decreed to Tiberius ſhould be built. For this honour eleven cities ſtrove; but when the votes of the ſenators were collected, the pretenſions of Smyrna were preferred (F). It was alſo moved by Vibius Marſus, that Lentulus, to whom had fallen the province of Aſia, ſhould have a legate extraordinary appointed to ſuperviſe the building of the temple. The motion was approved, and Lentulus empowered to chuſe whom he pleaſed; but he through modeſty declining to name one, Valerius Naſo was drawn by lot from among thoſe who had been prætors[p].

(F) For this honour eleven cities ſtrove with equal ambition, urging their antiquity and diſtinguiſhed zeal for the Roman people, during their ſeveral wars with Perſes, Ariſtonicus, and other kings. But the Hypæpenians, Trallians, Laodiceans, and Magneſians were diſmiſſed at once, as not ſufficient for the charge. The Ilienſes or Trojans repreſented, that Troy was the mother of Rome; but had no advantage above the reſt, beſides the glory of antiquity. The Halicarnaſſians urged, that for twelve hundred years their city had not been ſhaken by earthquakes, and promiſed to lay the foundations of the temple on a ſolid rock. The ſame plea was brought by the inhabitants of Pergamus; but as a temple was already erected in their city to Auguſtus, that diſtinction was judged ſufficient for them. The cities of Epheſus and Miletus were thought already ſufficiently taken up with the ceremonies of their peculiar deities, the former with thoſe of Diana, the latter with thoſe of Apollo. Thus the diſpute was confined to Sardes and Smyrna. The former urged their antiquity, power and opulence; they recited a decree of the Hetrurians, acknowledging them for kinſmen. For they pretended to derive their original from Atys, the ſon of Hercules by Omphale, who, as we have related in the hiſtory of Lydia, is ſuppoſed to have had two ſons, Lydus, and Tyrrhenus; the former remained in his native country, which from him was called Lydia, and the latter ſettled in Hetruria, where his followers were from him named Tyrrhenians. They likewiſe enlarged on the opulence of the antient Lydians, on the colonies ſent under Pelops into Greece, which from him took the name of Peloponneſus; their league with Rome during the war with Macedon, &c. The account they give here of their original does not entirely agree with what we read of it in Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus and Velleius Paterculus (27) The Smyrneans likewiſe diſplayed the glory of their antiquity and founders, of whom we have ſpoken at length in our hiſtory of Aſia; but inſiſted chiefly on their early friendſhip with Rome, and kindly offices to the Roman people, whom they aſſiſted, not only in their foreign wars, but in thoſe which were waged in the very bowels of Italy. They deſired the fathers to remember, that they had,

Tiberius abandons Rome. Year after the flood, 3025. Of Chriſt 26. Of Rome, 774.

THIS year at length, the twelfth of his reign, Tiberius put in excution the deſign, which he had long meditated and from time to time deferred, of leaving Rome. At his departure he gave out, that he was going into Campania only to dedicate a temple to Jupiter at Capua, and one at Nola to Auguſtus; but in truth determined never to return to Rome. Moſt hiſtorians, who wrote before Tacitus, aſcribe this his reſolution to the artful inſinuations of Sejanus; but, as he continued in his retirement ſix years after the diſgrace and execution of Sejanus, that writer thinks he was influenced by ſome other more powerful motive, namely, that of concealing in the darkneſs of a retired and ſolitary place his natural inclination to cruelty, lewdneſs, and debauchery (G). Some believed, that in his old age he was aſhamed had, before any other people whatſoever, erected a temple to Rome, when the power of the Roman people was indeed great, but not yet raiſed to its greateſt height, ſince Carthage was ſtill ſtanding, and Aſia governed by mighty kings; they laid great ſtreſs on their generoſity to Sylla, the miſerable condition of whoſe army, ready to periſh in a ſevere winter for want of cloaths, was no ſooner related to the citizens of Smyrna, at that time by chance aſſembled, than they all ſtript themſelves of their own garments and ſent them to the naked legions. This ſignal inſtance of their great fidelity and ſincere attachment to the Roman people made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the whole aſſembly, that the honour, for which ſo many cities contended, was by a great majority conferred upon them (28).

(G) As to his debauchery, Suetonius tells us, that in his youth he was much given to drinking, that inſtead of Tiberius Claudius Nero, he was nicknamed Biberius Caldius Mero. Afterwards being raiſed to the ſovereign power, continues the ſame writer, at the very time he was reforming the manners of the people, he ſpent one night and two days in carouſing with Pomponius Flaccus and L. Piſo, to one of whom he gave immediately the province of Syria, and to the other the government of Rome, ſtyling them in his letters, "jucundiſſimos & omnium horarum amicos". Being invited to ſupper by Sextius Gallus, an old debauchee, who had been noted with infamy by Auguſtus and ſeverely reprimanded by himſelf in the ſenate, he accepted the invitation, upon condition, that he altered nothing of his old way, and that they were ſerved at table by naked virgins. He preferred a man of a mean extraction, who ſtood for the quæſtorſhip, to ſeveral competitors of great diſtinction, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had drank with him

aſhamed of the figure of his perſon; for he was very thin, tall, and ſtooped; his head was bald, his face full of ulcers, and for the moſt part beſmeared with ointments (H). During his retirement at Rhodes, he uſed to avoid, as much as he could, appearing in public, and to conceal his debaucheries in the receſs of a ſolitary life; whence many concluded, that he had been prevailed upon, not ſo much by the plauſible perſuaſions of Sejanus, as by his own natural inclinations, to retire from the city. Some gave out, that he was driven from Rome by the reſtleſs and inſupportable ambition of his mother, whom on one hand he ſcorned to admit as a partner him an incredible quantity of wine at one meal. He preſented Aſellius Sabinus with two hundred thouſand ſeſterces for a dialogue he wrote between the muſhroom, the beccafico, or figpecker, the oyſter, and the thruſh, which were all his favourite diſhes (29). As to his lewdneſs, exceſſes ſo deteſtably infamous are related of him by the ſame writer, that they ſeem almoſt incredible. We ſhall not defile our hiſtory with the infamous detail he gives us of them, but only relate one inſtance out of the many which that author produces. He tells us, that a very ſcandalous picture, done by the famous Parrhaſius, and repreſenting Atalanta and Meleager, being left to the emperor as a legacy, upon condition, that if he liked not that piece, he ſhould have a million of ſeſterces paid him immediately in its ſtead, he not only preferred it to the ſaid ſum, but cauſed it to be hung up in his room (30).

(H) Suetonius deſcribes his perſon thus: he was, ſays he, of a ſtrong well-ſet body, ſomewhat exceeding the common ſize; broad in the breaſt and ſhoulders, in the reſt of his limbs from head to foot well proportioned. He uſed for the moſt part his left hand, in the joints of which he had ſuch ſtrength, that he could run his fingers through a green apple, however ſound, and ſtun a man with a fillip. His complexion was fair; his hair long behind, ſo as to cover his neck, which was peculiar to the Claudian family. His countenance was graceful, though covered with ſmall pimples: he had large eyes, and could ſee in the dark, but only for a ſhort time, and when he firſt awaked. He ſtooped, eſpecially when he walked, and ſhewed always a great deal of ſeverity in his ſtern looks. He was ſlow of ſpeech, and in private converſation continually moving his fingers, in a manner which no ways became him. All theſe imperfections, ſays the ſame writer, and indications of arrogance Auguſtus obſerved in him, and frequently endeavoured to excuſe to the ſenate and people, repreſenting to them, that they were defects in nature, but no imperfections in his mind. He was very healthy, and ſcarce ever out of order the whole time he was partner in the ſovereignty, but on the other could not entirely exclude, ſince the ſovereignty itſelf was her gift (I). Whatever was his motive, though he removed to ſeveral places, he never returned once to the city during the remaining part of his reign. He departed with a ſmall attendance, having with him but one ſenator, Cocceius Nerva, formerly conſul, and well verſed in the knowledge of the laws, one Roman knight, beſides Sejanus, by name Curtius Atticus (K), and ſome men of letters, chiefly Greeks, with whoſe converſation he was pleaſed and amuſed [q]. Suetonius tells us, he left orders, that during his abſence no one ſhould come near him, and that on his journey he declined all communication [r]. Upon his departure the aſtrologers gave out, that he left Rome under ſuch a conjunction of the planets, that he would never return thither, and that his end was at hand. That he was never to return to Rome proved true; but the conjectures, publiſhed by the aſtrologers concerning his death, ought to have convinced the world of the was emperor, though from the thirtieth year of his age he lived as he pleaſed, without hearkening to his phyſicians (31).

(I) Livia having preſſed him very earneſtly, as we read in Suetonius, to advance a perſon, whom he had admitted citizen of Rome, into the number of the decuries, he abſolutely refuſed to do it, unleſs ſhe would allow it to be inſerted in the regiſter; "That it "was extorted from him by his mother." This Livia took greatly amiſs, and immediately produced certain letters which Auguſtus had formerly written to her, complaining of his ſtubborn temper and the intolerable perverſeneſs of his manners, and cauſed them to be publicly read. This inſpired him with ſuch an averſion to the empreſs, who had ſo long preſerved, and ſo maliciouſly produced, theſe letters, that being no longer able to bear the ſight of her, he was thought by ſome to have withdrawn from Rome, that he might have no farther intercourſe or communication with her (32). Tacitus makes no mention of theſe letters, but only ſays, that Livia, who knew he was indebted to her alone for the empire, ſince ſhe had prevailed upon Auguſtus to adopt, contrary to his inclination, Tiberius, and exclude Germanicus, imperiouſly reclaimed the power which ſhe had procured him.

(K) Curtius Atticus was in high favour with Tiberius, which was the cauſe of his ruin, Sejanus, who was jealous of his power, having by falſe inſinuations brought him into diſgrace. To him Ovid inſcribed two elegies viz. the fourth and ſeventh of his ſecond book "de Ponto".

the falſhood of that art, ſince it proved fatal to its profeſſors, of whom many were for their predictions either put to death, or involved in endleſs calamities, which with all their knowledge of the ſtars they had not foreſeen [s]; whereas Tiberius lived eleven years after his retreat. However, their conjectures touching his death were very near being fulfilled ſoon after his departure; for as he was ſupping in a cave of one of his villas, called thence Spelunca (B), its mouth fell ſuddenly in, and buried under it ſome of his attendants; which ſo frightened the reſt, that, abandoning the emperor, they all fled, except Sejanus, who, covering the emperor's body with his own, and, ſtooping upon his knees and hands, received all the ſtones that fell from the roof; ſo that Tiberius eſcaped quite unhurt. From this time the emperor, looking upon him as one quite regardleſs of his own ſafety and only ſolicitous about his, repoſed an entire confidence in him, blindly following all his counſels, however bloody and deſtructive. This confidence the wicked miniſter abuſed to the deſtruction of the family of Germanicus, which alone could thwart his ambitious deſigns. He attacked

(B) Seneca tells us, that the Romans generally ſpeaking, choſe to build their country ſeats near ſome cave, to which they frequently reſorted, eſpecially in the ſummer. He gives us a very particular deſcription of two grottos or caves adjoining to the country ſeat of Vatia. The cave ſpoken of here lay, according to our hiſtorian, between the Amyclean ſea and the mountains of Fundi, or, as it is now called, Fondi, that is, between Caieta and Tarracina; for between theſe two places ſtood Amyclæ, which gave its name to the neighbouring ſea. Pliny (33) and Solinus (34) tell us, that the territory of Amyclæ was ſo infeſted with ſerpents and vipers, that the inhabitants were obliged to abandon their dwellings and ſettle elſewhere. Amyclæ is mentioned by Virgil:

——————— " ditiſſimus agri
" Qui fuit Auſonidum, & tacitis regnavit Amyclis, ſays that poet (35). He gives the epithet of " tacitus, ſilent", to Amyclæ, either becauſe it was built by the Lacedæmonians, who, as they followed the doctrine of Pythagoras, always inculcating ſilence, were thence called " taciti," or becauſe of a law which obtained in this place, forbidding under ſevere penalties any one to tacked first Nero, Germanicus's eldeſt ſon, and conſequently next in ſucceſſion, ſuborning perſons to miſrepreſent all his actions to Tiberius. Nero was a young prince no ways ambitious, but unmindful of that circumſpection which his preſent ſituation required. He was alſo miſled and ill-adviſed by his freedmen and followers, who, deſirous of having the power in their own hands, were continually animating him to exert the courage and reſolution becoming a perſon in his ſtation; that both the people and ſoldiery longed to ſee him ſhare the government with his grandfather; and that as to Sejanus, he would not dare to oppoſe him, though he now equally inſulted the tameneſs of an old man and the ſloth of a youth. As the young prince gave ear to ſuch ſuggeſtions, ſome unguarded expreſſions eſcaped, which were immediately catched up by the ſpies placed upon him, and with aggravations carried to the emperor, who would not ſo much as allow him the privilege of clearing himſelf. He was even betrayed by his wife Julia, the daughter of Druſus and Livia, who acquainted her mother and by her means Sejanus, not only with the words, but even with the ſigns and dreams, of her huſband. His brother Druſus was likewiſe drawn into the combination, with the hopes of immediately ſucceeding Tiberius, if his elder brother, already in diſgrace, were effectually ſet aſide (C). The emperor to mention the approach of an enemy. Theſe are the conjectures of Servius in his comments upon this place. He adds, that before this law was made the city was daily alarmed by falſe reports, as if the enemy had been already at the gates, from which terrors and uneaſineſs the above-mentioned law indeed delivered them; but in the end it proved their ruin; for no one venturing to tranſgreſs it, even when the enemy appeared unexpectedly under the walls, the city was taken and deſtroyed. To this Silius alluded in the following words.

——— " quaſque evertere ſilentia, Amyclæ (36); and Lucilius, as quoted by Servius, " I muſt ſpeak, for by " ſilence the city of Amyclæ was deſtroyed." Amyclæ was built by a colony from another city of the ſame name in Laconia, (37).

(C) Druſus was prompted to combine againſt his brother, not only by a paſſion for power, and by the uſual and too common competition among brothers, but alſo by the partiality of Agrippina, who was fond of Nero, and ſhewed no great affection for him (38).

emperor, thus prejudiced againſt him, even by his neareſt relations and thoſe who were thought to be his beſt friends, always received him with a ſtern countenance; if the youth ſpoke, there were crimes in his words; and crimes in his ſilence, if he ſpoke nothing. Sejanus, having by theſe baſe arts ſet Tiberius againſt Nero, began to conſult with his creatures how he might inflame him at the ſame time againſt Druſus and Agrippina, that the whole family of Germanicus might be involved in the ſame ruins [s]. We ſhall ſoon ſee what ſteps he took towards the compaſſing of that deſign. In the end of this year, died Aſinius Agrippa, deſcended of a family renowned rather than antient (D), himſelf not unworthy of his anceſtors; and Quintus Haterius of a ſenatorial family, and famous for eloquence while he lived, though the orations he left behind him were not much eſteemed, the harmony of his voice, as our hiſtorian obſerves, which charmed the ears of his hearers, dying with him [t] (E). This year Pontius Pilate was appointed by Tiberius governor of Judæa in the room of Valerius Gratus [u]. How he behaved during his ten years adminiſtration, appears from Philo [w], and from what we have ſaid in our hiſtory of the Jews [x].

THE following year, M. Licinius Craſſus and Lucius Calpurnius Piſo being conſuls, Atilius, one of the race of freedmen, having built an amphitheatre at Fidenæ, in order to exhibit in it a ſhew of gladiators, vaſt crowds flocked thither from Rome, eager for ſuch ſhews, as during the reign of Tiberius they were debarred from diverſions at home.

(D) Aſinius Agrippa was the ſon of Aſinius Gallus, of whom we have ſpoke above, and grandſon of the famous Aſinius Pollio, one of Auguſtus's chief favourites, by whom he was raiſed to great honours, though the Aſinian family had made no figure till his time; and hence Tacitus ſays, that Aſinius Agrippa was of anceſtors more illuſtrious than antient.

(E) Quintus Haterius is mentioned alſo by Seneca, who names him among the orators more applauded for their delivery than their compoſitions. Euſebius calls him a ready and popular orator, and adds, that he lived in great honours, and died in the ninetieth year of his age (39).

But, as the ſpectators were intent upon the gladiators, the amphitheatre, which was but ſlightly built and overcharged with the multitude, fell down, and with its fall deſtroyed or maimed fifty thouſand perſons [y]. Suetonius ſays, that twenty thouſand ſouls periſhed by this ſad ſtroke [z]. On this occaſion the great men of Rome threw open their doors to receive ſuch as had been hurt, ſupplied them with medicines, and took all poſſible care of them till they recovered. Thus, to the great ſatisfaction of the city, was revived at this juncture the public ſpirit of the antient Romans, who after great battles conſtantly relieved the wounded, ſuſtained them by their bounties, and reſtored them with care. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius, upon the news of this dreadful calamity, immediately left Capreæ, paſſed over to the continent, and allowed perſons of all ranks to come to him; but, according to Tacitus, he had not yet withdrawn to that iſland, but was either at Capua or Nola. Atilius, who had built the amphitheatre only for gain, and therefore employed bad materials and unſkilful workmen, was baniſhed; and it was provided for the future, by a decree of the ſenate, that no man, who was not worth four hundred thouſand ſeſterces, ſhould exhibit the ſhew of gladiators [a]. The public affliction from this terrible blow was yet freſh, when another ſupervened. A fire breaking out on mount Cœlius burnt with ſuch rage and violence, that it utterly conſumed all the houſes in that quarter of the city. On this occaſion Tiberius gave proofs of a generoſity truly worthy of a great prince. For at his own expence he made good the loſs of every ſufferer, ſeeking out, of his own accord, the unknown, and, without any ambitious views, without the application of friends, relieving them by his bounty. For this the ſenate returned him thanks, and decreed, that mount Cœlius ſhould for the future be ſtyled Mount Auguſtus, ſince the ſtatue of Tiberius, which ſtood there in the houſe of Junius the ſenator was ſpared by the flames, though every thing round it was conſumed (F).

Mons Cœlius conſumed by fire.

As

[y] Tacit. c. 62. [z] Suet. ibid. c. 40. [a] Tacit. c. 63.

(F) Suetonius diſagreeing, as he often does, with Tacitus, tells us, that Tiberius exerted on this occaſion his generoſity, and made good to the ſufferers all the loſſes they had ſuſtained; but that he did it with ſo much affectation of his own liberality, that he cauſed mount Cœlius to be called thenceforth mount Auguſtus,

As the univerſal zeal of the great men in Rome and the generous bounty of the prince adminiſtered great relief in the preſent misfortunes, ſo the fury and rage of the informers, which grew daily more dreadful, involved without alleviation the moſt illuſtrious citizens in endleſs calamities. Quintilius Varus, a man of great wealth and related to the emperor (G), was accuſed by Domitius Afer, the ſame who had arraigned his mother Claudia Pulchra. The informer had, it ſeems, ſquandered away what he had earned by procuring the condemnation of Claudia; and therefore in hopes of a more ample reward had marked out and doomed to deſtruction Varus, one of the moſt wealthy men in Rome. The city was ſurpriſed to ſee Publius Dolabella, a man of an illuſtrious family and nearly related to Varus, join a perſon of ſuch an infamous character as Afer, againſt his kinſman. The ſenate was ſo ſhocked with it, that they refuſed to hear the charge, and voted, that the trial ſhould be poſtponed till the return of the emperor [b].

Informers become more dreadful.

In the mean time, Tiberius, having dedicated the temples in Campania, though he had by an edict warned the public not to diſturb him, and poſted ſoldiers on all the roads to prevent the concourſe of people to the towns where he reſided, nevertheleſs hating all towns and every place on the continent, retired at length to Capreæ, an iſland ſeparated from the cape of Surrentum by a channel of three miles. The air is mild there in the winter, the cold winds being intercepted by a mountain, and refreſhed in the ſummer by gales from the weſt. The ſea, open all round it, makes a delightful view: from thence was ſeen then one of the moſt beautiful coaſts guſtus, with a view of perpetuating the memory of his liberality. Tiberius was, as evidently appears from innumerable inſtances, an utter enemy to all flattery, pomp, and oſtentation, which inclines us to prefer the authority of Tacitus to that of Suetonius.

(G) Quintilius Varus was probably ſon to the commander of that name, who was with the Roman legions cut off in Germany in the manner we have related above. He married one of Germanicus's daughters, as we read in Seneca (40). Beſides, he was the ſon of Claudia Pulchra, whom Tacitus calls Agrippina's couſin, and by that means too related to the reigning family.

in the world; but which was afterwards greatly damaged by the eruptions of mount Veſuvius. The iſland was ſurrounded on all ſides with inacceſſible rocks, and a profound and almoſt bottomleſs ſea, which was void of havens, and had but few ſtations for the ſmaller veſſels, and thoſe very difficult of acceſs; ſo that none could put in unperceived by the guards (H); and this, as is commonly believed, was what chiefly took Tiberius, who confined himſelf to twelve ſtately villas on the iſland, ſome of which were probably built by Auguſtus, who, liking the ſolitude and mild air of the place, purchaſed it, according to Dion Caſſius [c], of the Neapolitans. There Tiberius ſpent the laſt ten years of his life, giving himſelf entirely up to the moſt infamous lewdneſs and debaucheries, which for us ſhall be buried in oblivion, who think the detail Suetonius has publiſhed of them equally ſcandalous and unworthy of an hiſtorian. In that dark receſs he threw off all concern for the commonwealth, though he had been to that time very aſſiduous in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and wholly intent upon public cares. But nevertheleſs he retained his old inclination to ſuſpicions, and gave more credit than ever to informers, Sejanus enflaming his jealouſies and fomenting his diſtruſts for the private views of his ambition. Secret ſpies and informers were employed in all parts of the city, which cauſed daily diſturbances and the ruin of many worthy citizens. If a perſon of merit teſtified any zeal for the glory of the empire, Tiberius immediately ſuſpected it was from a ſecret deſign of gaining it. If another had an innocent remembrance of liberty, he was looked upon as a dangerous perſon, and one who aimed at re-eſtabliſhing the commonwealth. To praiſe any of the antient Romans was a capital crime; to bewail Auguſtus was complaining of Tiberius, &c. Every action became liable to forced interpretations; the moſt innocent diſcourſes expreſſed evil deſigns; a diſcreet ſilence concealed miſchievous intentions; joy betrayed hopes of the prince's

(H) Suetonius tells us, that a few days after his arrival in the iſland of Capreæ, a fiſherman brought him a mullet of an extraordinary ſize; but that the emperor, inſtead of rewarding him, cauſed him to be uſed moſt barbarouſly, being frightened with the conſideration, that he had made his way to him through places which he thought unfrequented and inacceſſible (41).

prince's death, melancholly envy of his proſperity, and fear the juſt apprehenſions of a guilty conſcience. So that to ſpeak, to be ſilent, to be glad, to be grieved, to be fearful, or aſſured, were all crimes, and frequently puniſhed with death. But Sejanus's pernicious practices and wicked devices were chiefly levelled againſt Agrippina and her ſon Nero. As there was now no acceſs to Tiberius, but by him, he made no longer his attempts upon them a ſecret, but openly placed guards about them to obſerve the meſſages they ſent, the viſits and company they received, their behaviour in public, their private converſation, &c. Beſides, he ſuborned ſome of their friends, to adviſe them, as they were thus diſtreſſed, either to fly to the armies in Germany, or, embracing the ſtatue of Auguſtus in the forum, to implore the aid and protection of the ſenate and Roman people. Theſe counſels, though rejected by them, were laid to their charge, as if they had intended to put them in execution [d].

THE following year, when Appius Junius Silanus and P. Silius Nerva were conſuls, began tragically. Titius Sabinus, an illuſtrious Roman knight, was hurried to priſon, for no other crime but his ſteady and faithful adherence to the family of Germanicus, being circumvented by the blackeſt treachery. One Latinius Latiaris, having inſinuated himſelf into his friendſhip with a deſign to betray him, firſt bewailed the caſe of Agrippina and her ſon Nero; and then, as Sabinus burſt into tears, inveighed bitterly againſt Sejanus's pride and cruelty, not ſparing the emperor himſelf. Sabinus, not aware of the ſnare, approved all he ſaid; and being ſoftened with compaſſion for the misfortunes of the unhappy family of his friend Germanicus, he added many, but ſevere, reflections of his own upon the cruelty of Tiberius, and imperious conduct of his favourite miniſter. And now the traytor, wanting only witneſſes to compaſs the ruin of one who repoſed in him an entire confidence, placed three ſenators, who had combined with him againſt Sabinus, between the roof of his room and the cieling, a place no leſs unbecoming men of their rank, than the treachery, which made them thus degrade themſelves, was execrable. The ſenators, Porcius Cato, Petilius Rufus, and Marcus Opſius, who, having been all prætors, aſpired at the conſulſhip, to which there was no acceſs but by Sejanus, and his favour was to be purchaſed only by iniquity, having thruſt themſelves into the above-mentioned lurking-place, Latiaris went abroad to find out Sabinus, whom he eaſily drew home and into his chamber, under pretence of relating to him ſome late diſcoveries. Then he began his former complaints, ſpeaking mighty things of Germanicus, and exclaiming againſt the cruelties of Tiberius and Sejanus. Sabinus, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery, readily joined him, and, reſuming his former detail of the calamities they had already undergone, and were likely to undergo, inveighing with great bitterneſs againſt the authors of them, Sejanus and Tiberius. This was enough; the three ſenators, who had been liſtening the whole time with their ears cloſe to holes and chinks, diſpatched forthwith a memorial to the emperor, acquainting him with what had paſſed, though they could not well do it, without diſcovering to him at the ſame time their own deteſtable infamy. Tiberius immediately wrote to the ſenate, and after having charged in his letter Sabinus with treaſon, required the conſcript fathers in plain terms to take vengeance of a traytor, who had aimed at his life. Hereupon the ſuppoſed criminal was immediately ſentenced to death, and the ſame day, the firſt of the new year, which was a great feſtival among the Romans, executed, without being allowed time to make his defence (I). The city was never

He is condemned and executed.

(I) Sabinus, ſays Tacitus, was dragged away to immediate death, with his head muffled in his robe and a rope about his neck: but nevertheleſs, exerting his voice as far as he could, he cried out, "With theſe ſolemnities the year begins; theſe are "the victims which Sejanus offers;" for on the firſt day of the new year victims were ſlain in all the temples. Such a diſmal ſight occaſioned univerſal terror, flight, and ſolitude, where-ever the unhappy victim appeared, the people, to avoid betraying any marks of grief or compaſſion, fled, and withdrew in the utmoſt conſternation; ſo that all along, as he paſſed, the ſtreets were empty, and the public places deſerted. Some, however, who had fled, returned, and ſhewed themſelves again, dreading, that their having diſcovered dread might prove fatal to them. The law, which had been enacted a few years before, granting to every condemned perſon ten days reſpite, was, it ſeems, neglected on this occaſion; for Tacitus tells us that the unfortunate Sabinus, was immediately after condemnation hurried away and executed without being impriſoned. The fidelity of Sabinus's dog made his death be more ſpoken of; for he conſtantly kept cloſe to him, followed his body while it was dragged through the ſtreets, and threw himſelf after it into the Tiber, where he periſhed (42).

never ſeized with greater dread; one relation feared another; a general diſtruſt reigned among men of all ranks; ſtrangers and acquaintance were equally avoided; nay, even dumb and inanimate things, roofs and walls, occaſioned dread and circumſpection. The emperor no ſooner heard of the execution of Sabinus, than he wrote to the ſenate, thanking them for having puniſhed an enemy to the commonwealth. He added in his letter, that he led a life full of fear and anxiety, and that he was under continual apprehenſions of the ſnares of his enemies: though he named none, yet it was no ways doubted but he meant Agrippina and Nero, againſt whom he was conſtantly incenſed by Sejanus and his creatures. Juſt vengeance ſoon overtook the authors and contrivers of ſuch a black piece of treachery; for ſome of them periſhed miſerably under the emperor Caius, and ſome under Tiberius himſelf, who, though he would not ſuffer the miniſters of his tyranny to be cruſhed by others, yet, ſurfeited with their infamy, he often ſacrificed them himſelf to the public vengeance, to make room for new ones, who were daily offering the ſame vile ſervices [e].

His accuſers meet their juſt doom.

When Tiberius's letter was read in the ſenate, Aſinius Gallus moved, that the prince ſhould be deſired to explain his fears, and ſuffer the ſenate to remove the cauſe of them. This the emperor highly reſented, thinking that Aſinius was appriſed of his diſſimulation; but, however, ſmothered his wrath for the preſent, Sejanus ſtriving to appeaſe him, not out of any kindneſs to Gallus, but becauſe he knew the more his anger was reſtrained, the more tragical it would prove at laſt. This year the Friſians, no longer able to bear with the tyranny of the Romans ſent to govern them, ſhook off the yoke, and defeated L. Apronius, who was diſpatched againſt them with a conſiderable force (K). But Tiberius

Pliny relates this ſtory at length, and aſſures us, that it was preſerved in the public regiſters of the city (43).

(K) The Friſians, ſays Tacitus, rebelled, rather provoked at the avarice of their governors, than impatient of the Roman yoke. Druſus laid a tribute upon them ſuited to their poverty, obliging them only to furniſh certain hides for the uſes of the ſoldiers, without inſiſting upon any particular ſize or thickneſs. But Olennius, whom Tiberius appointed to govern them, having procured the large hides of ſome wild bulls, inſiſted upon their paying

(43) Plin. l. viii. c. 40.

ing the tribute according to that meaſure. As their domeſtic cattle were but ſmall, this proved a very hard taſk upon them: at length, not being able to pay yearly the required tribute, they parted with their herds, next reſigned their lands, and laſtly ſurrendered their wives and children to bondage. Their miſeries and complaints made no impreſſion on their hard-hearted governor, which ſo provoked them, that in the end they reſolved to ſeek relief from war. Accordingly, they fell unexpectedly upon the ſoldiers, who were gathering the tribute, and hanged them on gibbets. Olennius had the good luck to make his eſcape to a neighbouring caſtle, which was defended by a numerous garriſon both of Romans and auxiliaries. Lucius Apronius, governor of Lower Germany, upon the firſt intelligence of this diſturbance, drew together ſome companies of the legions, and a choſen body of auxiliaries both horſe and foot, which he carried down the Rhine, and made a deſcent on the country of the Friſians. The enemy, who had inveſted Olennius in his caſtle, no ſooner heard of the arrival of Apronius, than they raiſed the ſiege, and marched with all their forces to meet him. Apronius, ſeeing them approach in order of battle, ordered his auxiliaries, ſupported by ſome legionary horſe, to charge them. The Friſians not only ſtood their ground, but repulſed firſt the auxiliaries, and afterwards five cohorts, ſent ſucceſſively to their relief. Hereupon Apronius ordered the whole cavalry of the legions to advance; but that body being put into diſorder by thoſe who fled, before they could charge the enemy, Cethegus Labeo, legate of the fifth legion, was ordered to fall upon the Friſians at the head of the reſt of the auxiliaries. He was attended with no better ſucceſs; for his men, being ſoon put into diſorder, would have given ground, had not the whole army, and firſt of all the fifth legion, haſtened to their relief. Then the Friſians retired in good order, the Roman general not thinking it adviſeable to purſue them: nay, he did not deem it ſafe to remain on the field of battle, till he had buried the dead, tho' many officers of diſtinction were ſlain. Beſides thoſe who fell on the ſide of the Romans in the engagement, a body of nine hundred men, who had ſeparated from the reſt, were all cut off, after having defended themſelves the whole night in a grove called Baduhenna. Another band of four hundred men, having poſſeſſed themſelves of a country-ſeat of a petty prince, named Cruptorix, once a tributary to Rome, and fearing they ſhould be delivered up to the enemy, choſe rather to fall by the hands of one another. This diſgrace Tiberius diſſembled, not daring to truſt any experienced commander with the conduct of the war. So than truſt any able general with the command of the army. The ſenate indeed met on this occaſion; but, inſtead of deliberating about an affair of ſuch importance, they only decreed ſtatues to Tiberius and Sejanus, being no ways affected with the loſſes ſuſtained on the extremities of the empire, but wholly intent on ſecuring themſelves, by the moſt ſhameful flattery, againſt the evils that threatened them at home. They importuned both the prince and his favourite with repeated ſolicitations, that they would be pleaſed only to ſhew themſelves in Rome. But to no purpoſe; they could not by any entreaties be prevailed upon to approach the city, thinking it ſufficient condeſcenſion to quit their iſland for a few days, and ſuffer themſelves to be ſeen on the coaſt of Campania. Thither crowded ſenators, knights, and great part of the people, all eager to be ſeen by Sejanus, who was more difficult of acceſs than the emperor himſelf, and admitted ſuch only as were either his creatures, or by his creatures recommended to him. His thus ſeeing the greateſt men of the empire crouching, with the meanneſs of ſlaves, before him, heightened his arrogance; nay, perſons of the firſt rank were not aſhamed to cringe to his ſlaves, to court the favour of his porters, and bear their inſults with incredible patience. Many, after having continued ſeveral days and nights in the open fields, in hopes of being admitted at laſt to his preſence, were in the end ordered to depart without the ſatisfaction of ſeeing him. Theſe returned trembling, and ſeized with dread and terror; whereas ſuch as he had deigned to receive were filled with joy, not knowing how fatal his friendſhip would ſoon prove to them. As for Tiberius, having here betrothed Agrippina, his grand-daughter by Germanicus, to Cneius Domitius (L), and ordered the

that the Friſians enjoyed their antient liberties unmoleſted till the ſucceeding reign (44).

(L) Cn. Domitius was deſcended of a very antient family, and beſides was nearly related to the Cæſars: for he was the ſon of L. Domitius, of whom we have ſpoken above, and Antonia Major, the daughter of Octavia and Marc Antony; ſo that Auguſtus was his great uncle. By Agrippina he had the emperor Nero, and was, as Suetonius obſerves, worthy to be the father of ſuch a prince, being in every part of his life deteſtable. In his youth he attended Caius Cæſar into the Levant, and there ſlew one of his freedmen, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he refuſed to drink the nuptials to be celebrated at Rome, he quitted the continent and returned to his iſland [f]. This year died Julia, granddaughter to Auguſtus, by whom, after her marriage with Æmilius Paulus, ſhe had been on account of her looſe and ſcandalous behaviour baniſhed to the iſland of Trimetus, where ſhe died after twenty years of exile.

The death and character of Livia.

THE following year, L. Rubellius Geminus and Caius Fuſius Geminus (M) being conſuls, died Livia, the mother of Tiberius, commonly ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions Julia Auguſta, becauſe adopted by Auguſtus in his laſt will into the Julian family. We have already ſpoken of her deſcent and marriage with Auguſtus, by whom ſhe had no iſſue; but by the marriage of Germanicus and Agrippina, her blood came to be mixed with that of Auguſtus in their great grandchildren. She had an abſolute ſway over Auguſtus, which ſhe acquired and maintained, ſays Dion Caſſius, by a ready acquieſcence to his will, without ever betraying the leaſt deſire to know what he concealed from her, or any jealouſy or diſſatisfaction on account of his intrigues with other women [g]. In her were united the wiſdom of her huſband and drink as much as he commanded him. On his return to Rome he drove his chariot over a boy on purpoſe, and trod him to death: in the midſt of the forum he pulled out the eye of a Roman knight, for reprehending him with more than ordinary liberty. While he was prætor, he defrauded the victors in the chariot races of their prizes. About the latter end of Tiberius's reign he was accuſed of treaſon, of adultery, and inceſt with his ſiſter Lepida; but Tiberius dying, he eſcaped the puniſhment due to his crimes. He died under the emperor Caius of a dropſy, leaving behind him Nero by Agrippina. We are told, that being congratulated by his friends upon the birth of his ſon Nero, he anſwered, that nothing could proceed from Agrippina and him, but what was deteſtable, and would prove pernicious to the commonwealth (45).

(M) The conſulate of the two Gemini is famous in the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, many of the antient chriſtian writers having held, that our Saviour was crucified during their adminiſtration, which opinion is now followed by very few. Aulus Plautius, famous for his wars in Britain under Claudius, and L. Nonius Aſprenas were ſubſtituted to the two Gemini the fifteenth day of July, as we gather from Gruter's inſcriptions (46), and cardinal Noris's "epiſtola conſularis," printed at Bologna in 1682 (47).

and the diſſimulation of her ſon. She was ſo paſſionate for the grandeur of her children, that ſhe was not without good grounds ſuſpected of having purchaſed it with the deſtruction of her huſband's family. For ſhe was charged with the death of Marcellus, of Caius and Lucius Cæſars, of Agrippa Poſthumus, nay, and of Auguſtus himſelf, which ſhe was ſuppoſed by ſome to have haſtened. She was an irreconcileable enemy to Julia the daughter of Auguſtus, and never ceaſed perſecuting her whole offspring. She challenged an equal ſhare with her ſon in the power which ſhe had procured him. This Tiberius was not of a temper to bear; and hence the miſunderſtanding between them, which gave occaſion to the ſatirical verſes, we have related above. He frequently warned her not to meddle with ſtate affairs, which he ſaid were above the ſphere of a woman. He avoided her converſation, eſpecially in private, as much as he decently could, leſt he ſhould ſeem to be governed by her counſels. Being informed, that on occaſion of a fire ſhe had run immediately among the people, encouraging both them and the ſoldiers to ſtop the rage of the flames, as ſhe uſed to do in the time of Auguſtus, he reprimanded her with ſome acrimony [h]. We are told, that by degrees he arrived at ſuch a height of iniquity, as to hate and deteſt her [i]. At leaſt it is certain, that during the three years ſhe lived after his retirement, he never ſaw her but once, and then for a very ſhort time. In her laſt malady, he never came near her, though he conſtantly gave out that he deſigned to pay his laſt offices to her; inſomuch, that her body was kept, in continual expectation of his arrival, till it began to putrify, and could be no longer borne. Afterwards he excuſed himſelf by a letter to the ſenate, pleading the multitude of public affairs. He would not ſuffer any divine honours to be paid to her memory, pretending her expreſs command to the contrary. Nay, in his letter to the ſenate, he reflected on thoſe who courted the friendſhip of women, alluding to the conſul Fuſius, who was a great favourite of the ſex, in high eſteem with Livia, but hated by Tiberius, whom, as he was a man of wit, he uſed to play upon with biting ſarcaſms [k]. We are told, that he proſecuted all her friends, above all, thoſe to whom ſhe had committed the care of her funeral; that of the many honours decreed her, he admitted but very few, and that he ſuppreſſed her laſt will, which was not executed till till after his death under his ſucceſſor Caius, who cauſed divine worſhip to be appointed her [l]. She died, according to Pliny [m], in the eighty-ſecond, according to Dion Caſſius, in the eighty-ſixth, year of her age.

He becomes more cruel after her death.

THOUGH Tiberius allowed his mother no great power, nevertheleſs, as he was indebted to her for the empire, he avoided openly oppoſing her; ſo that by her means many innocent perſons were ſaved from ruin, Sejanus not daring to arrogate an authority ſuperior to that of a parent. But after her death, both the prince and his favourite, being let looſe from all reſtraint, ſet no bounds to their unbridled fury. Letters were immediately diſpatched to the ſenate againſt Agrippina and Nero, which were thought to have been written before, and ſuppreſſed by Livia. They were couched in terms remarkably bitter, and yet they charged Nero with no crimes againſt the ſtate, but only with unnatural luſt and other impure pleaſures. Agrippina's known virtue ſcreened her from any imputations of this nature; her haughty looks therefore, and her violent, imperious, and ungovernable temper, were alledged againſt her. Theſe letters, when read in the ſenate, ſtruck the whole aſſembly with terror. The fathers continued long ſilent, looking with ſurpriſe at one another, till at length, ſome, deſirous of currying favour with Sejanus and Tiberius, demanded that they ſhould proceed upon the emperor's letters. The magiſtrates and leading men were at a loſs how to behave on ſo nice and critical a ſubject; for though the expreſſions in the letter were very bitter, yet all the reſt was left ambiguous. At length they concurred with Junius Ruſticus, whom they thought well acquainted with the emperor's intentions, ſince by him he had been appointed to keep a journal of their proceedings. Ruſticus had never before ſhewn the leaſt inſtance of generoſity, but nevertheleſs either by ſome ſecret impulſe, or becauſe unmindful of preſent dangers, he dreaded leſs Tiberius than the children of Agrippina, he oppoſed Cotta Meſſalinus's cruel motion, and exhorted the conſuls to ſuſpend their deliberations, and allow the old man time to change his wrath into repentance, ſince one moment might give a new turn to affairs. At the ſame time, the people, carrying with them the images of Agrippina and Nero, ſurrounded the ſenate-houſe, and, wiſhing happineſs and proſperity to Tiberius, cried out inceſſantly, that the letters were counterfeit, terfeit, and that the ruin of the prince's family was purſued againſt his will, and without his privity. Nothing was therefore concluded that day. In the mean time, ſeveral ſpeeches were diſperſed about the city, ſaid to have been uttered in the ſenate againſt Sejanus by the conſulars; but all feigned, and filled with moſt bitter and ſatirical reflections, as the authors of them were not known. This fired Sejanus, who immediately wrote to the ſenate, upbraiding them in the ſharpeſt terms with deſpiſing the reſentments of the prince, with liſtening to popular and diſaffected harangues, with paſſing new and unprecedented acts, &c. He concluded, that nothing wanted to complete their rebellion, but to take arms, and place at their head thoſe, whoſe images they had already choſen for their enſigns. Tiberius likewiſe wrote a ſecond letter to the ſenate, repeating his reproaches againſt his grandſon and daughter-in-law, and complaining of Ruſticus, the ſenate, and the people, for inſulting his authority, and making no account of his reſentment; but at the ſame time he reſerved to himſelf the final deciſion of the whole affair. The ſenate heſitated no longer, but inſtantly declared, that they were ready to inflict the deſerved puniſhments on ſuch as had by their crimes provoked his diſpleaſure, provided he would allow them on ſo juſt an occaſion to exert their authority [o]. We are ſorry we cannot give ſuch an account as the reader may expect of the further proceedings of the emperor and the ſenate againſt the unhappy Agrippina and her children, being deſtitute in this place of our faithful guide Tacitus, in whoſe excellent hiſtory begins here a chaſm for almoſt three years, by which we have loſt the detail of the moſt material tranſactions of Tiberius's reign, namely of the condemnation and baniſhment of Agrippina and her two children, Nero and Druſus, of the diſgrace and execution of Sejanus, of the further wickedneſs and death of Livilla, the widow of Druſus and daughter-in-law to Tiberius, &c. In ſhort, time has robbed us of the flower, we may ſay, of Tacitus's incomparable annals; ſo that we muſt, for the tranſactions of this year and the two following, recur to other writers, and be ſatisfied with their accounts, however imperfect. As for Agrippina, ſhe was condemned and baniſhed to the iſland of Pandataria, now known by the name of Santa Maria, over-againſt Tarracina and Gaeta. We are told, that, as ſhe could not forbear reproaching Tiberius with cruelty, and bitterly inveighing againſt him, the centurion, to whoſe cuſtody ſhe was committed, mitted, gave her ſo many blows on the face, that he ſtruck out one of her eyes [p]. Nero her eldeſt ſon, was likewiſe condemned and baniſhed to the iſland of Pontia, now Ponza, near that of Pandataria; and Druſus, her ſecond ſon, by the ſame vile arts of Sejanus, declared an enemy to the ſtate, and kept under cloſe confinement in the lower part of the palace. Nero died ſoon after in the place of his exile, ſome ſay for want of neceſſaries, while others tell us, that the young prince, frightened at the ſight of the executioner, who entered his room with the inſtruments of death in his hand, as if he had been ſent by the ſenate, choſe to put an end to his life by voluntary abſtinence [q]. Agrippina and Druſus lived four years in exile, that is, to the year of Chriſt 33, when we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of their tragical end. Cn. Lentulus Getulicus was this year appointed commander of the legions in Upper Germany, in which employment he was continued for the ſpace of ten years [r].

Extraordinary honours decreed to Sejanus.

THE next conſuls were L. Caſſius Longinus and M. Vinicius (N). This year the ſenate decreed many extraordinary honours to Sejanus; among the reſt, it was ordained, that his birth-day ſhould be yearly celebrated; that his ſtatues, which were ſet up in every quarter of the city, ſhould be adored; that vows and ſacrifices ſhould be offered for his ſafety, &c. In ſhort, he became, after the diſgrace and condemnation of Agrippina and her children, ſo powerful and formidable, that he was more reſpected and dreaded than Tiberius himſelf. As there was no acceſs to honours but through his favour, the ſoldiers, the ſenators, and all the great men of the empire, were entirely at his devotion; ſo that by their means he was immediately informed of all the actions of the prince, while no one dared to diſcover to the emperor

(N) Both theſe conſuls were choſen two years after by Tiberius for huſbands to two of Germanicus's daughters. Vinicius married Julia, and Caſſius Druſilla, who became ſo famous, or rather infamous, in the reign of her brother Caius, who took her by force from her huſband (48). C. Caſſius Longinus and L. Nævius Surdinus were ſubſtituted to them in the conſulate (49). In an antient inſcription quoted by Spon, Vinicius is called Venicius (50).

emperor the ambitious designs and views of his minister, though they were all well apprised of them [s]. However, he began to suspect him at last. Josephus tells us, that Antonia, the widow of his brother Drusus, having received private intelligence of the deep designs and secret practices of Sejanus, wrote a detail of them to the emperor, sending the letter to Capreæ by Pallas, one of her most trusty domestics, the same who afterwards became so famous under the emperor Claudius [t]. The emperor, thus warned of his danger, and recovering from his fatal blindness, began to consider with himself how he might thwart the ambitious views of his over-powerful minister, and deliver himself from the impending ruin. The prætorian cohorts were more addicted to the minister than to the sovereign, being filled with his creatures; the senate was entirely at his devotion; even those whom the emperor had about him were so many spies in the pay of Sejanus; so that Tiberius was kept in a kind of captivity, from which it was no easy matter to disengage himself. But he surmounted all difficulties with incredible address, which he thought it more adviseable to employ than open force, lest Sejanus, finding himself discovered, and thence driven to despair, should make a bold push and attempt the empire. The first step he took was to remove him from Capreæ, and in order to this, he declared his intention of taking upon him the consulate the next year, and named Sejanus for his collegue. This the haughty minister, not suspecting any snare, looked upon as the greatest mark of distinction the emperor could confer upon him. It is not to be doubted, but he created him at the same time senator; for Sejanus five years before, when the emperor removed from Rome, was but a knight, and we have not in the whole Roman history an instance of a knight being raised to the consular dignity. In the end of the year, Tiberius dispatched Sejanus to Rome to take possession of his new dignity there on the calends of January, which he did accordingly; but the emperor did not remove from his island, where he entered upon his fifth consulship, and held it to the fifteenth of May, when he resigned the fasces to Faustus Cornelius Sylla [u] (O). tion to Sejanus, the ſenate was for the greateſt part of the year wholly taken up in decreeing him new honours. His name was added to that of Tiberius in all inſcriptions; new ſtatues were erected to him, and victims ſlain before them: a decree paſſed confirming the conſulate to him and Tiberius for the term of five years; his houſe was crowded from morning to night with perſons of all ranks; nay, the greateſt men in Rome were not aſhamed to court, with the meaneſt ſubmiſſions, the favour of his ſlaves and freedmen. In ſhort, one would have taken Tiberius, as Dion Caſſius obſerves, for the prince of his ſmall iſland, and Sejanus for the ſovereign of Rome. However, ſeveral prodigies are ſaid to have happened at this time, which ſeemed to forbode the downfall of the favourite miniſter; but if any deity, ſays our hiſtorian, had revealed what happened ſoon after, no one would have believed him [w]. In the mean time, Tiberius, to ſound the diſpoſition of the ſenate and people, and diſcover the partizans of Sejanus, wrote frequent letters, acquainting the fathers at one time, that he was greatly indiſpoſed; at another, that he was perfectly recovered, and deſigned in a ſhort time to return to Rome: in ſome of his letters he blamed, in others he commended, Sejanus. This conduct ſurpriſed the miniſter and his friends, who inſenſibly began to abandon him, ſeeing his authority with the prince ſomewhat diminiſhed. The ſenate, however, conferred on him the proconſular power on his reſigning the conſulſhip; which he did, according to ſome, on the eighth, according to others, on the fifteenth, of May, to Sextidius Catullinus. At the ſame time Tiberius honoured both him and his ſon with a place amongſt the pontiffs; but could not by any entreaties be prevailed upon to give him permiſſion to return to Capreæ. The pretence Sejanus alledged for ſuch a permiſſion was, ſays Dion Caſſius, to viſit his future ſpouſe, probably Livilla the widow of Druſus, who was indiſpoſed; alone this year. Both he and Sejanus reſigned the faſces, before the conſular year expired, the one to Fauſtus Cornelius Sylla, the other to Sextidius Catullinus (51). L. Fulcinius Trio and L. Pomponius Secundus were ſubſtituted to them; the former held the conſulate to the end of the year, but Pomponius reſigned it on the calends of October to P. Maximus Regulus (52).

ndiſpoſed; but his real deſign was, to ſecure the perſon of he prince, whoſe guards were all at his devotion. Ti- berius, to keep both him and the ſenate in ſuſpenſe, re- urned no other anſwer to his earneſt and repeated entrea- ies, than that he deſigned to come himſelf very ſoon to Rome [x].

In the mean time, he began to heap honours on Caius, ſurnamed Caligula, the only ſurviving ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina. He had accompanied his grandfather to Capreæ, and artfully concealed under a deceitful appearance of modeſty his ſavage and inhuman temper. He had ſo well learnt to hide his heart, that when his mother and both his brothers were condemned, not a word, not a groan, eſcaped him, though all arts were uſed to draw words and reſentment from him. Young as he was, he ſmothered with the deepeſt diſſimulation all ſymptoms of tenderneſs and ſorrow. He was ſo obſervant of Tiberius, that he made it his whole buſineſs to ſtudy the bent of his temper, and to ſecond it in all things. He imitated his looks, affected his words and manner of expreſſion, and conformed even to the change and faſhion of his dreſs. Hence the obſervation of the orator Paſſienus, that "never lived a better ſlave, nor a worſe maſter." Tiberius made him this year augur, in the room of his brother Druſus, and raiſed him, before he had entered upon that office, to the dignity of pontiff of Auguſtus, beſtowing upon him the higheſt encomiums, as if he deſigned to appoint him his heir and ſucceſſor. This awaked the rage and jealouſy of Sejanus, who now could not forgive himſelf his paſt indolence. In the tranſports of his paſſion he condemned himſelf for not having taken arms, and openly revolted, when he was veſted with the conſular authority: he reflected with the utmoſt anguiſh on the many favourable opportunities he had neglected, to ſecure the perſon of the prince, and ſeize the empire; but the great joy the people teſtified at the preferments of Caius, deterred him at preſent from any attempts of that nature. At the ſame time, he had the mortification to ſee ſome of his friends turned out of their employments, and his enemies placed in their room. But nothing mortified him ſo much as a letter from Tiberius to the ſenate concerning the death of Nero; wherein he named Sejanus, without the uſual encomiums and commendations which he beſtowed on him in all his letters. Neither did he doubt, but the emperor had him chiefly in view, when he wrote to the ſenate, deſiring deſiring them to renew and put in execution the decree, forbidding divine worſhip to be paid to any mortal man; for vows were every-where made, and victims ſlain, before the ſtatues of Sejanus; nay, he was arrived at ſuch a height of arrogance, that he joined his adorers, and with an impudence hardly to be matched, offered ſacrifices to himſelf[y]. After ſo many tokens of coolneſs in the emperor towards his favourite miniſter, many, who had profeſſed an inviolable friendſhip for him, began to withdraw through fear of being involved in the calamities, which they apprehended would ſoon overtake them, if they did not, by abandoning him, in time conſult their own ſafety. The crouds, which daily frequented his houſe, inſenſibly diminiſhed: few perſons, and thoſe not of the firſt quality, attended him abroad; no farther mention was made of him in the ſenate &c. This encouraged Tiberius, who had hitherto doubted of the diſpoſition of the ſenate and people, to come to a final reſolution; which was to ſecure himſelf, without further delay, againſt the dangers that threatened him, by the utter deſtruction of Sejanus and his friends. However, to proceed in ſo nice an affair with all poſſible caution, and to prevent Sejanus from putting himſelf upon his defence, or taking any deſperate meaſures, he gave out, that he deſigned to inveſt him with the tribunitial power. But, in the mean time, he privately gave the command of the prætorian guards to Nervius Sertorius Macro, one in whom he knew he could confide; and diſpatched him to Rome with a letter to the ſenate, after having communicated to him the contents of it, and carefully inſtructed him how to behave, with reſpect both to Sejanus and the ſenate. Macro entered Rome late in the night, and immediately imparted his orders to the conſul P. Memmius Regulus, who had been ſubſtituted to L. Pomponius Secundus; for the other conſul L. Fulcinius Trio, was a friend to Sejanus. Regulus early next morning ſummoned the ſenate to aſſemble in the palace, whither Sejanus conveyed himſelf, attended, according to his cuſtom, by a detachment of the prætorian guards. As he was entering the palace, he was greatly ſurprized to ſee Macro, the more, becauſe he had brought no letters for him from the emperor; but Macro accoſting him, whiſpered him in the ear, that he had brought letters to the ſenate, wherein the emperor beſought them to confer upon him the tribunitial power. Sejanus, overjoyed at this news, entered the palace, and there took his place in the temple of Apollo, where moſt of the fathers were already met.

met. In the mean time, Macro, having firſt ſhewn to the ſoldiers of the prætorian guard his commiſſion from the emperor, appointing him to command them in the room of Sejanus, and aſſured them, that Tiberius had ordered a very conſiderable ſum to be diſtributed among them, took poſſeſſion of his new office, by remanding them to their camp without the walls of the city. In their ſtead Gracinus Laco, who was privy to the ſecret and commanded the vigiles, that is, the troops appointed to watch all night and prevent diſturbances, placed a ſtrong detachment of his men at the gates of the temple. And now the fathers being aſſembled, Macro appeared before them with the emperor's letter in his hand; which he had no ſooner preſented to the conſuls, than he withdrew, haſtening to the camp in order to prevent any diſturbance that might happen there. In the mean time, Regulus read aloud the emperor's letter, which was very long, and wrote with great craft and addreſs. For, after a long preamble upon other matters, came ſome complaints againſt Sejanus, which were immediately interrupted by quite different affairs: then followed other complaints, but without any bitterneſs of expreſſion; ſo that Sejanus hitherto betrayed no great concern. But when at length the emperor's orders were read touching the execution of two of his moſt intimate friends, who were privy to his ambitious and treacherous deſigns, he was ſtruck with ſuch terror, that he could not utter a ſingle word in their favour. Before he recovered from the conſternation, into which thoſe fatal orders had thrown him, he heard to his great ſurpriſe another article relating to himſelf, wherein the emperor, in an angry ſtyle, enjoined the fathers to ſecure his perſon. Hereupon the tribunes and prætors, quitting their ſeats, placed themſelves by him, to prevent him from making his eſcape and raiſing diſturbances [z]. Suetonius tells us, that in this letter Tiberius betrayed a meanneſs of ſpirit altogether unworthy of a prince, begging, amongſt other things, of the ſenate, that they would ſend one of the conſuls with a convoy of ſoldiers to conduct to Rome a poor old man forſaken by all. The ſame author adds, that he was under ſuch apprehenſions, that he had given private orders to Macro to ſet Druſus, in caſe of any diſturbance, at liberty, to preſent him to the ſenate and people, and even to declare him emperor. He had ſeveral ſhips ready to put to ſea, and convey him to ſome of his legions, if his affairs at Rome ſhould not take a good turn. He kept himſelf the whole time upon the top

top of a high rock, to know, by certain ſignals agreed on, what paſſed in the capital, fearing the meſſengers might betray him, or not bring him the news with the neceſſary expedition [a]. Seneca tells us, that while the conſul was reading the emperor's letter, a huge globe of fire appeared in the air, and ſoon after vaniſhed [b]; a true ſymbol of what paſſed in the ſenate. For the ſenators at firſt, not doubting but the emperor demanded in his letter the tribunitial power for Sejanus, crouded round him, each ſtriving to be the foremoſt in congratulating him with flattering ſpeeches upon his new dignity. But they no ſooner learnt the real contents of the fatal letter, than they all to a man forſook him, not one perſon in ſo numerous an aſſembly daring to utter one word in his favour. Even thoſe who happened to ſit by him, abandoning their places, ſeated themſelves elſewhere, fearing they might be looked upon as his friends, if they continued near him. The laſt article was no ſooner read, than the whole temple reſounded with curſes and moſt bitter invectives, againſt the very perſon, on whom they had a few minutes before beſtowed the higheſt commendations. Some inveighed againſt him out of the hatred they bore him, and others through fear of being reckoned amongſt his friends. Though all the ſenators declared againſt him, nevertheleſs, as he had many friends and relations among them, the conſul Regulus thought it adviſeable not to propoſe condemning him to death, nor even to gather the ſuffrages of the whole aſſembly. He therefore only aſked the opinions of ſome, whom he looked upon as the moſt impartial and unprejudiced; and finding they were for committing him to priſon, he conducted him thither himſelf, atttended by Gracinus Laco and all the magiſtrates. A memorable inſtance this of the viciſſitude of fortune, and the inſtability of all human grandeur! How different was Sejanus ruling the univerſe with an abſolute ſway, raiſing to the higheſt honours, or dooming to death whom he pleaſed, from himſelf loaded with chains, and dragged like a common malefactor to the public priſon! Had he ſucceeded in his attempts, and entailed the Roman empire upon his race, there would not have been wanting flattering poets and hiſtorians, who would have echoed his praiſes, his liberality, his politics, with all the other topics which are urged in commendation of Julius Cæſar and Auguſtus. But Sejanus failed, and is owned to have been a traytor; Cæſar's iniquity and that of Auguſtus were triumphant, and ſo were their names. Iniquity unproſperous or puniſhed

niſhed no man praiſes; but ſucceſsful iniquity never wants flatterers. But to return to Sejanus; he was followed from the palace to the priſon by immenſe crouds, the populace all the way loading him with curſes, upbraiding him with the many murders he had committed, and inſulting him with bitter ſarcaſms upon his tribunitial power. His confuſion was ſo great that, not able to bear it, he threw his robe over his head, in order to cover his face; but the guards, who attended him, obliged him to ſhew himſelf to the multitude, eager to ſee him humbled, and to inſult one who had ſo long rid upon their necks. At the ſame time, the populace in a ſudden tranſport overturned and broke in pieces all his ſtatues, thoſe very ſtatues which a few hours before they had adored. The ſame day, the ſenate aſſembled the ſecond time in the temple of Concord, near the priſon, when the fathers, finding all quiet in the city, by the care and vigilance of Macro, Gracinus, and the conſul Regulus, pronounced, without heſitation, no one daring to ſpeak in favour of the criminal, ſentence of death againſt Ælius Sejanus, accuſed and found guilty of high treaſon. The ſentence was put in execution the ſame day, that is, the ſeventeenth of October, notwithſtanding the late law, indulging ten days reſpite to every criminal after condemnation. His body was expoſed like thoſe of other malefactors, on the ſcalæ Gemoniæ, and afterwards abandoned to the rage of the populace, who dragged it for three days together through the ſtreets of Rome, and mangled it to ſuch a degree that the executioner could ſcarce find a limb entire to throw, according to cuſtom, into the Tiber [d]. Condemned and executed.

THE death of Sejanus was followed by a general ſlaughter of all his friends and relations. Tiberius, after having for a courſe of years deſtroyed every man who was obnoxious to this execrable favourite of his, deſtroyed every man who had been well with his favourite. He ſpared none who were accuſed of any intelligence with Sejanus, and any thing upon earth, the moſt fortuitous, the moſt ſlight or fooliſh, ſerved for proof of ſuch intelligence. All the ſtreets of Rome were covered with ſingle carcaſſes, or filled with carcaſſes in piles; perſons of all ranks, without diſtinction of ſex or age, were promiſcuouſly butchered, and their bodies caſt into the public ſtreets; neither their acquaintance nor kindred were allowed to approach them, or bewail them, nor even at laſt to behold them: ſpies were placed every-where to watch countenances and the ſigns of ſorrow; and when they putrified, and became noiſome, and were thrown into the Tiber, whether they floated in the ſtream, or were caſt upon the banks, no one ventured to touch them, no one dared to bury or burn them. Among the many who periſhed on this occaſion, Junius Blæſus, uncle to Sejanus, of whom we have often ſpoken above, ſeems not to have eſcaped the common ſlaughter, being loaded with many odious imputations [e]. Publius Vitellius being charged with offering the public treaſure, which was committed to his care, towards compaſſing a revolution, was nevertheleſs only delivered into the hands of his brother Lucius, father to Aulus Vitellius, who was afterwards emperor. Publius being ſoon weary of his confinement, and finding his trial put off from day to day, called for a penknife under pretence of writing, and pricked his veins with it, but timorouſly and without effect. However, he died, before his trial, of grief, and by his death ſaved both his eſtate and the reputation of his family [f]. He left it ſeems ſome writings behind him; for we find him quoted by Tertullian [g]. Pomponius Secundus, who had a little before reſigned the faſces to P. Memmius Regulus, was likewiſe accuſed of treaſon, becauſe Ælius Gallus, who was a friend to Sejanus, had, after the execution of that traytor, fled to the gardens of Pomponius, as to a place of ſafety. However, he was not committed to the public priſon, but conſigned to the cuſtody of his brother Quintus Pomponius, who generouſly became his ſurety. As Pomponius was a man of a gay temper, he bore his diſgrace with great conſtancy and reſolution; ſo that he outlived Tiberius, and was ſet at liberty by his ſucceſſor Caius. This is the ſame Pomponius, according to Voſſius, whoſe victories over the Catti we ſhall ſee in the following reign honoured with a triumph. If Pomponius was kept confined ſo long as Tiberius lived after the death of Sejanus, that is, ſeven years, only for ſome ſigns, not ſhewn by him neither, of friendſhip between him and a friend of Sejanus, we may judge judge from thence with how much ſeverity his relations were treated, and his avowed partizans, who had been privy to his ambitious deſigns [h].

AND now the chief friends and favourites of Sejanus, who could give any umbrage, being all to a man maſſacred, the ſenate ordered the two remaining children of the wicked miniſter to be executed, in order to cut off the whole family root and branch. Sejanus had three children, of whom the eldeſt ſon was already put to death as Tacitus ſeems to inſinuate; but we are quite in the dark as to the circumſtances of his execution, by reaſon of the lamentable chaſm in Tacitus's annals, which has robbed us of the detail of many remarkable incidents. There ſtill remained of that unhappy and generally abhorred family a ſon and a daughter, who were by a decree of the ſenate both ſentenced to death, notwithſtanding the tenderneſs of their age, and carried to priſon; the boy, ſenſible of his impending death, but the girl ſo ignorant of it, that ſhe often aſked whither they dragged her, and for what fault? adding, that if ſhe had done any thing amiſs, they might take the rod and whip her, and that ſhe would do ſo no more. But the ſenate having no regard either to her age or her innocence, ſhe was by the common executioner ſtrangled in priſon with her brother, and the tender bodies of both firſt expoſed on the ſcalæ Gemoniæ, and thence dragged with an iron hook through the city, and thrown into the Tiber. We are told by ſome writers of that time, that as it was a thing unheard-of to puniſh a virgin with death, the executioner deflowered her juſt before he tied the rope [i] (Q).

The execution of Sejanus's children.

EVERY one hoped, that, after the execution of Sejanus and his accomplices, the reign of Tiberius would prove more mild,

[h] Tacit. ibid. & Dio. l. lix. p. 644. [i] Idem ibid. c. 9.

(Q) The word virgo, in the law forbidding a virgin to be put to death, ſignified a girl, or a young woman under ſuch an age, whether ſhe was a virgin or no; but the grave ſenators with a chicane worthy only of ſuch mean, crouching ſlaves, took it in a ſenſe quite different from that of the law, which they pretended to obſerve, by cauſing the innocent girl to be deflowered by the executioner before ſhe was put to death. With a like cavil the triumvirs, as we read in Dion Caſſius, that they might not ſeem to tranſgreſs the law forbidding children to be put to death, cauſed one, whom they had condemned, to put on the manly robe before he was executed (53).

(53) Dio, l. xlvii.

mild, ſince to that powerful and cruel favourite they chiefly imputed the many executions, which had occaſioned ſuch a dreadful havock of their beſt citizens. But, when they expected ſome alleviation of their evils, they found themſelves involved in greater calamities than ever, the emperor waxing daily more cruel, and from this time commencing, as it were, an open enemy to his people, and delivering himſelf up to cruelty without reſtraint, and to every abomination, even to rapaciouſneſs and plunder, a vice to which he hitherto ſeemed to have no biaſs. No perſon, however virtuous and cautious, could be ſafe; for it was not enough for them to be upon their guard againſt the ſnares of the accuſers, and the falſe reports of informers; but they were liable to be ſacrificed to the jealouſy and conjectures of the emperor, when they thought themſelves ſecure by the innocence, not only of their actions, but even of their thoughts. He was under perpetual apprehenſions of the great lords of the ſenate, and making daily victims of them: their wealth and race, nay, their poverty, names, and quality, gave him umbrage: he was almoſt equally jealous of friends and enemies. Thoſe who adviſed him in council, thoſe who diverted him at his leiſure hours, fell all at length victims to his furious and diſtruſtful temper. He was ſo afraid of conſiderable men, and ſo unwilling to give them employments that made them ſo, that ſome who were appointed governors of provinces, were never allowed to go thither; inſomuch, that great provinces for a courſe of years were left deſtitute of their governors, and abandoned to the mercy of barbarous nations, Tiberius chuſing rather to ſuffer the inſults and invaſion of the enemy, than truſt any one with the power of avenging the ſtate and repulſing the public foe. This year Apicata, whom Sejanus had divorced, as we have related above, in hopes of marrying Livia or Livilla the widow of Druſus, ſeeing the bodies of her children publicly expoſed among thoſe of the other criminals, wrote a letter to Tiberius, acquainting him with the manner of his ſon Druſus's death, with no other view but to torment him, and then laid violent hands on herſelf. Tiberius, who had aſcribed his ſon's death to his own intemperance and irregular life, was ſo tranſported with rage, when he underſtood he had been poiſoned by a conſpiracy of Livilla and Sejanus, that he reſolved to exterminate all thoſe who had ever ſhewn the leaſt token of friendſhip to either [k]. Suetonius tells us, that he applied himſelf to the examination of that affair affair ſo ſeriouſly, that word being brought him, while he was receiving the depoſitions of ſome witneſſes, that an inhabitant of Rhodes was arrived, at whoſe houſe he had lodged, and whom he had invited by many kind letters, he immediately ordered him to be put to the rack, having at that time nothing in his thoughts, but blood, torments, and revenge. The ſame writer adds, that afterwards, when he came to himſelf, and was ſenſible of his miſtake, he commanded the innocent Rhodian to be privately murdered, leſt he ſhould divulge the injury he had received [l]. Such as he condemned in the iſland of Capreæ were from a rock thrown headlong into the ſea, where numbers of ſeamen were diſpoſed beforehand with their oars and long poles to diſpatch them. He ſuffered none to be executed, till they had undergone the moſt exquiſite torments cruelty itſelf could invent: for he looked upon death as ſo ſlight a puniſhment, that when he heard one of his priſon[illegible], named Carnulius, had laid violent hands on himſelf, he cried out, "Carnulius has eſcaped me." One of his priſoners begging him to haſten his execution, No, anſwered Tiberius, "You "and I are not yet ſo good friends [m]." But notwithſtanding the ſeverity with which he puniſhed others, Dion Caſſius tells us, that he was inclined to pardon Livilla his daughter-in-law, in regard of her mother Antonia; but that Antonia herſelf oppoſed ſuch an unſeaſonable inſtance of mercy; ſo that Livilla was this year by Tiberius's orders ſtarved to death [n].

Various inſtances of his cruelty.

CHAP. XVII.

The Hiſtory of Rome from the perfect ſettlement of the Roman empire to the death of Nero, the laſt of the family of the Cœſars continued.

THE following year, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Furius Camillus Scribonianus being conſuls (R), furious orders

(R) Domitius, the ſame who married Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, continued in the conſulſhip the whole year; Aulus Vitellius, uncle to the emperor of the ſame name, was

orders were paſſed againſt the ſtatues and memory of Livilla, and likewiſe a decree of the ſenate, commanding the effects of Sejanus to be taken out of the public treaſury, and placed in that of the emperor. This was the motion of Scipio, Silanus, and Caſſius, the principal men in the ſenate, who all urged it almoſt in the ſame words, and with great zeal and eagerneſs. Tagonius Gallus moved, that Tiberius ſhould chuſe twenty ſenators to wait upon him under arms, and defend his perſon as often as he entered the ſenate. The emperor, who was too wiſe to allow the ſenators arms, returned them thanks for ſuch an inſtance of affection; but rejected, and even turned into ridicule, the motion, as well as the author of it, adding in his letter, that he did not think his life of ſuch importance to have it thus protracted. Junius Gallio moved, that the prætorian ſoldiers, after their term of ſervice, ſhould have the privilege of ſitting in the theatre among the Roman knights. This propoſal was highly reſented by Tiberius, who in his letter to the ſenate fell upon Gallio with great warmth, demanding, as if he had been preſent, what buſineſs had Gallio with the ſoldiers, whoſe duty it was to obſerve only the orders of the emperor, and from the emperor alone to receive their rewards? Gallio indeed meant to flatter, but Tiberius highly reſenting that motion, which he ſaid tended to corrupt the military diſcipline and debauch the minds of the ſoldiers, he was inſtantly expelled the ſenate, and baniſhed Italy. He choſe the iſland of Leſbos for the place of his baniſhment; but the ſenate, thinking his exile would be too eaſy there, recalled him, and put him under cloſe confinement in the houſe of a magiſtrate.

The motion of Gallio reſented by Tiberius.

his collegue from the firſt of July to his death; for Vitellius died in his conſulate (54). We find the name of Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus in an antient inſcription quoted by Gruter, (55), where he is ſaid to have been conſul the year after the fifth conſulſhip of Tiberius; but the name of his collegue is razed both out of this, and out of another made this year at Terni, which inclines us to believe that he was the ſame Furius Camillus, who afterwards rebelled againſt the emperor Claudius, as we read in Suetonius (56).

magiſtrate. Such was the reward of his ſtudied flattery. In the ſame letter the emperor demanded the death of Sextus Paconianus, who had conſpired with Sejanus to compaſs the ruin of Caligula; but he eſcaped for the preſent by making an ample diſcovery of the plot, and naming all who were concerned in it. Among theſe was Latinius Latiaris, of whoſe deteſtable character we have ſpoken above. He was one of the moſt miſchievous informers in Rome, and had procured the deſtruction of many illuſtrious citizens; but now met with his juſt doom, being to the great joy of the whole city condemned and executed. The next accuſed was Cotta Meſſalinus, the moſt forward man in the ſenate to gratify on all occaſions the cruelty of Tiberius, and therefore univerſally hated. He was charged with having ſpoken contemptuouſly of Caligula, Livia Auguſta, and of Tiberius himſelf (S); and the charge was proved by men of the firſt rank in Rome. But Cotta appealing to Tiberius, a letter was ſoon after brought from him in behalf of the criminal, wherein, after relating the beginning of his friendſhip with Cotta, and his many good ſervices to himſelf, he beſought the fathers not to wreſt into crimes words perverſely conſtrued, and humorous tales told at an entertainment (T). Hereupon the fathers not only

Cotta Meſſalinus accuſed and by the favour of Tiberius diſcharged.

(S) He had traduced Caligula as guilty of the moſt ſcandalous debaucheries, as a pathic, as one deſtitute of all ſhame and modeſty; in celebrating among the prieſts the birth-day of Livia, the emperor's mother, he had ſpoken of her with diſreſpect without ſparing Tiberius himſelf: in complaining of the great ſway which Manius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius, with whom he had a ſuit about money, bore in the ſenate, he had ſaid, "They indeed will be ſupported by the ſenate, but I by my little Tiberius." Theſe were the crimes alledged againſt him; and to any other the charge would have proved fatal; but as he ſtudied in every thing to gratify the cruel temper of Tiberius, and was the author, as our hiſtorian tells us, of every moſt bloody counſel, the emperor took him under his protection, and ſhewed that mercy to him, which he would have denied the moſt worthy man in the ſenate.

(T) The beginning of his letter was very remarkable; for he introduced it with the following words. What to write to you, conſcript fathers, or in what manner to write to you at this time, if I know, may all the gods doom me to greater agonies, than thoſe under which I feel myſelf daily periſhing. Such were the only diſcharged Cotta, but inflicted on Cæcilianus the ſenator, who was the chief evidence againſt him, the ſame puniſhment which had been formerly decreed againſt the accuſers of Lucius Arruntius, one of the moſt virtuous men in Rome; but what this puniſhment was, we find no-where recorded. Afterwards, Quintus Servæus and Minutius Thermus were arraigned, Tiberius charging them as principals in the treaſon of Sejanus, and ordering Caius Ceſtius, a ſenator, to report to the ſenate what he had written to him. Thus Ceſtius undertook the accuſation; for in thoſe calamitous times the moſt illuſtrious chiefs of the ſenate were not aſhamed, as Tacitus obſerves, to degrade themſelves to the mean office of informers, ſome openly, ſome ſecretly, but both without regard to the ties of blood or friendſhip; no diſtinction of kinſmen from ſtrangers; for words ſpoken in the forum, or in private converſation, upon what ſubject ſoever ſpoken, thoſe who uttered them were accuſed, every one ſtriving to get the ſtart of another, ſome for their own ſafety, others as it were infected with the common contagion of informing. Minutius and Servæus were condemned, but ſaved themſelves by becoming evidence againſt others, namely, Julius Africanus and Seius Quadratus. While all men elſe were affecting to renounce the character of friends to Sejanus, a Roman knight, by name Marcus Terentius, the horrors that haunted him even among the rocks of Capreæ; though hardly acceſſible to men, yet they could not keep off the avenging furies that purſued him, nor inſure his tranquillity. This great prince, this ſovereign of Rome, with his numerous armies, with his prætorian bands, and his unlimited power, was in hourly fear of ſecret aſſaſſins, inceſſantly racked by his own apprehenſions; and conſequently with all the eclat of empire, the moſt miſerable being in his dominions. His power indeed was unlimited; but ſo was his miſery: the more he made others ſuffer, the faſter he multiplied his own torments. All the pleaſures and debaucheries in which he wallowed without controul, had not ſufficient charms to allay or mitigate his dreadful apprehenſions, and the anguiſh under which he felt himſelf daily periſhing. Private perſons, however obnoxious and threatened, had but ſome things and ſome perſons to fear; whereas Tiberius dreaded all men, and every thing but to do evil, which yet was the ſole cauſe of his fears. Such was his ſituation and life, and ſuch are the natural conſequences of the abuſe of power.

Terentius, being accuſed on this very account, owned the charge before the ſenate in the following ſpeech, which well deſerves to be recorded: "It would perhaps be "more wiſe in me, conſcript fathers, to deny than to "acknowledge the crime with which I am charged. But "whatever be the reſult, I cannot, I will not, deny it. "I therefore own, and publicly declare, that I was one "of Sejanus's friends, that I courted and ſought his friend-"ſhip, that I gloried in it, after I had gained it. And "what wonder that I did ſo? I ſaw Sejanus joined with "his father in the command of the prætorian guards, "and next governing the ſtate and the ſoldiery, both as a "miniſter and general: his kinſmen and friends were "raiſed to the firſt employments; as every man was in "credit with Sejanus, he was favoured by Tiberius; ſuch "on the contrary as incurred his diſpleaſure, were perſe-"cuted without mercy. Of this I need give no inſtances. "Sejanus therefore the Vulſinian was not the man "we courted; but Sejanus ingrafted by alliance into the "Claudian and Julian families; Sejanus, your ſon-in-law, "O Cæſar, your collegue in the conſulſhip, your favour-"ite, and under you charged with the adminiſtration of "the empire. It does not belong to us to judge who he "is, whom you think fit to raiſe above the reſt, or on "what conſiderations you have raiſed him. To you the "gods have left the ſupreme diſpoſal of all things, and "to us the glory of obedience. We only behold the out-"ward appearance of things; we perceive upon whom "you beſtow wealth and honours, to whom you truſt "the greateſt power of relieving or oppreſſing us, which "no man can deny Sejanus to have had. But to pry into "the ſecret thoughts of the prince, and the deſigns which "he induſtriouſly conceals, is both unlawful and dan-"gerous. Let us not, conſcript fathers, fix our thoughts "on the laſt day of Sejanus; but remember him for "the ſpace of ſixteen years, during which time we adored "ſuch of his retainers as Satrius and Pomponius, and "reckoned it a great honour to be acquainted with his por-"ters and freedmen. I ſpeak here of thoſe only who "were guiltleſs of his laſt deſigns. Let thoſe be puniſhed "who conſpired with him againſt the ſtate, who were "privy to his wicked attempts upon the life of the prince; "nothing can be more juſt. But as for us, who are charged "only with offices of friendſhip and inſtances of benevolence

" towards Sejanus, you cannot condemn us, O Cæſar, " without condemning at the ſame time yourſelf." The liberty of this ſpeech, and the joy that one was at laſt found who had courage enough to ſpeak aloud what they all thought in their hearts, had ſuch a powerful effect upon the minds of the fathers, that Terentius was abſolved, and his accuſers, for this and other crimes, condemned, ſome to baniſhment, others to death [o]. Tiberius himſelf approved of the proceedings of the ſenate on this occaſion, probably not daring to oppoſe a truth ſpoken with ſuch liberty, and generally applauded. But what induced him to diſſemble an affront offered him at this time by L. Sejanus the prætor, probably one of the diſgraced miniſter's kinſmen, 'tis no eaſy matter to gueſs. For the prætor in the ſhews, which he exhibited in virtue of his office, employed ſuch only as were bald, and diſpoſed five thouſand boys all ſhaved with torches in their hands to light the ſpectators home. No-body doubted, but this was done to deride Tiberius, who was bald; but neverthe leſs, he took no more notice of it, than if he had never known it [p].

Who is abſolved.

NEXT came letters from Tiberius againſt Sextus Veſtilius, formerly prætor, one whom Tiberius had long ſince admitted into the number of his friends in regard of his brother Druſus, to whom Veſtilius was exceeding dear. He was accuſed of having compoſed a ſatyr againſt Caligula, reproaching him with the lewdneſs of his life. Tiberius forbad him his table, which ſo grieved him, that he reſolved to lay violent hands on himſelf. Accordingly, having with a trembling and feeble hand, as he was very old, opened his veins, he bound them up, and wrote a letter to the prince, imploring his mercy, but Tiberius returning him an angry anſwer, he opened them again, and died. Not even women eſcaped the fury of accuſers: as they could not be charged with deſigns of uſurping the ſovereign power, their tears were made treaſonable; and Vitia, the mother of C. Fuſius Geminus conſul three years before, was condemned and executed in her old age, for bewailing the death of her ſon condemned by the ſenate. Neither did Tiberius ſpare his own friends; for by him were this year doomed to die Veſcularius Flaccus and Julius Marinus, two of his oldeſt friends, who had followed him to Rhodes, and not forſaken him at Capreæ. The former had acted a chief part in the trial and condemnation of Libo Druſus, and the latter had been employed by Sejanus to procure the ruin ruin of Curtius Atticus, of whom we have ſpoken above. This year died Lucius Piſo, who being ſubſtituted to Taurus Statilius in the government of Rome, diſcharged that important office with ſuch credit, that by a decree of the ſenate he was diſtinguiſhed with a public funeral. He had obtained for his warlike exploits in Thrace a triumph, was univerſally eſteemed and beloved, and nevertheleſs died in the eightieth year of his age by the courſe of nature, a rare thing, as our hiſtorian obſerves, in a man of great parts and of ſuch an illuſtrious deſcent q (U). A motion was afterwards made in the ſenate by Quinctilianus, tribune of the people, concerning a book of the Sibyl, which Caninius Gallus, one of the college of fifteen, had begged might be received by a decree amongſt the reſt of that propheteſs. The decree paſſed without oppoſition; but Tiberius in a letter to the ſenate deſired, that the book might firſt be examined by the quindecemvirs (W). Lucius Piſo dies.

q Idem. c. 10, 11.

(U) We read in Tacitus, that Piſo governed Rome twenty years: if ſo, he muſt have been raiſed to that dignity by Auguſtus; for he died in the eighteenth year of Tiberius's reign. But, on the other hand both Pliny (57) and Suetonius (58) tell us in expreſs terms, that he was created governor of Rome by Tiberius, for having continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, as Pliny will have it, after he was emperor. We therefore conclude with Lipſius, that ſome miſtake has crept into the text of Tacitus. That writer thinks that we ought to read ten inſtead of twenty, becauſe Pomponius Flaccus, who was with Piſo at that famous debauch, was on that ſcore raiſed to the government of Syria, which at the time of Piſo's death he had held ten years (59).

(W) In his letter he gently chid Quinctilianus as young, and therefore not well acquainted with the antient cuſtoms; but fell upon Gallus with ſome bitterneſs, for propoſing to a thin ſenate the receiving of a book, whereof the author was unknown, among the prophetic books of the Sibyl: he told him, that he who was ſo well ſkilled in the ſcience of ſacred ceremonies, ought not to have taken ſuch a ſtep without hearing the opinion of his own college, and without the uſual reading and deliberation with the other prieſts. He alſo put the ſenators in mind of the conduct of Auguſtus, who, to ſuppreſs the many fictitious predictions, every-where publiſhed under the name of the Sibyl

This year the dearth of corn occaſioned ſome diſturbances in the city, the people urging their wants in the theatre with great freedom, or rather licentiouſneſs. Tiberius, alarmed at their boldneſs, cenſured in his letter to the ſenate both them and the magiſtrates, for not quelling by their authority the mutinous populace. This encouraged the fathers to paſs a ſevere edict againſt rioters and ſuch as diſturbed the public tranquillity, which reſtored peace and quiet to the city. In the end of the year, Geminus, Pompeius, and Julius Celſus, all Roman knights, were arraigned of treaſon and condemned. Geminus was indeed one of Sejanus's friends, but had never been truſted by him with his private deſigns. However, he was executed with Pompeius; but Celſus, by ſtretching his chain over his head, and ſtraining with great violence againſt it, broke his neck and eſcaped the infamy of a public execution [r]. This year Tiberius having croſſed the channel between Capreæ and Surrentum, ſailed along the coaſt of Campania, and entering the Tiber, as if he deſigned to proceed to Rome, came as far as the gardens on that river, having firſt poſted guards all along the banks to keep off the multitude. But he advanced no farther, being aſhamed of his cruelties and abominable luſts, and impatient to return to his gloomy rocks, and beloved ſolitude, where he rioted without check or controul in the moſt infamous and unnatural debaucheries [s].

Other arraignments and executions.

Sibyl, had ordered that within a fixed day they ſhould be carried to the prætor and declared it unlawful for any private perſon to keep them. Upon the receipt of this letter, the ſenate, notwithſtanding their decree, ordered the book to be examined by the college of the quindecemvirs. Whether the book was admitted amongſt the authentic prophecies of the Sibyl, we are no-where told. Auguſtus, as we have obſerved in his reign, having gathered together a great number of prophecies and books of predictions written by unknown authors, whether in Greek or Latin, he cauſed them all to be burnt, to the number of two thouſand and upwards, reſerving only ſome ſelect pieces, which he depoſited under the pedeſtal of Apollo Palatinus (60).

(60) Vide Suet. in Aug. c. 31.

THE next conſuls were Servius Sulpicius Galba (X) and L. Cornelius Sylla Felix. This year Tiberius diſpoſed of his two grand-daughters, who were now of age, beſtowing Druſilla on Lucius Caſſius, and Julia on Marcus Vinicius, as we have related above. On this occaſion he wrote to the ſenate with a ſhort commendation of the young men; then touching upon the cauſe of his abſence, and the hatred and ill-will he had drawn upon himſelf by his zeal for the republic, he deſired that Macro, commander of the prætorian guards, with ſome few tribunes and centurions, might always attend him into the ſenate. The fathers readily granted him his requeſt, without any limitation either to the number or condition of the guards who were to accompany him [t]: nay, they paſſed a decree, ordering, that whenever the prince came to the ſenate, all the ſenators ſhould be ſearched to prevent their carrying arms under their robes [u]. But for all this, Tiberius never appeared in the ſenate, nor entered the walls of Rome, though he came ſometimes to the very gates, for the moſt part by ſolitary and by-ways, and flying back with great precipitation. This year great diſturbances being raiſed by the debtors, the emperor, to adminiſter ſome relief, declared, that he would lend an hundred thouſand great ſeſterces for the term of three years without intereſt, provided each borrower mortgaged in land double the value of what he borrowed. But this generoſity did not in the leaſt allay the public hatred which the emperor drew upon himſelf with his cruelties, many illuſtrious perſons being this year condemned and executed, and many others baniſhed upon the moſt groundleſs ſuſpicions.

(X) Servius Sulpicius Galba was afterwards raiſed to the empire: Suetonius obſerves, that he ſucceeded in the conſulſhip Cn. Domitius the father of Nero, and was ſucceeded by Salvius Otho, the father of the emperor of the ſame name. As the name of Otho is not marked in the conſular tables, Onuphrius, Caſſiodorus, and the learned cardinal Noris conclude, that he was ſubſtituted to Galba. Lucius Vitellius, one of the following year's conſuls, was father to Aulus Vitellius, who was likewiſe emperor, and ſucceeded Otho. Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius having ſent for Galba, during his conſulſhip, and ſifted him upon ſeveral ſubjects, he at laſt told him in Greek, that one day he ſhould taſte of empire, ſignifying thereby his ſhort ſovereignty (61).

(61) Tacit. c. 20.

Among theſe, Conſidius Proculus, while, void of all apprehenſion, he was celebrating his birth-day, was ſuddenly accuſed of treaſon, hurried to the ſenate, condemned and executed. Pompeia Macrina was ſentenced to exile; her huſband and his father, two men of great diſtinction among the Greeks, were both executed; but her father, an illuſtrious Roman knight, and her brother, once prætor, prevented their execution by a voluntary death. The crime laid to their charge was, that Macrina's huſband being deſcended from Theophanes, who had been one of the confidents of Pompey the Great, they had all paid divine honours to that illuſtrious Greek. The death of Sextus Marius, the moſt wealthy man in Spain, reflected great diſgrace upon Tiberius; for though he was accuſed of inceſt with his daughter, and for that crime, as was pretended, thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, yet it was commonly believed, that his immenſe riches had occaſioned his ruin; and indeed, not without good grounds; Tiberius having, after his condemnation, appropriated to himſelf his mines of gold, though forfeited to the public. So many bloody executions, inſtead of ſatiating, ſerved only to whet and inflame, Tiberius's cruelty. For this year he commanded all thoſe to be put to death without diſtinction of ſex or age, who were kept in priſon under accuſation of any attachment to Sejanus [w]. Inſomuch, that twenty were executed on one day, and among them ſeveral women and children; their bodies were expoſed on the ſcalæ Gemoniæ, from thence with iron hooks dragged through the city, and then thrown into the Tiber. The butchery, ſays Tacitus, was dreadful and general; expoſed to the ſun lay the carcaſſes of the noble and ignoble; thoſe of every ſex and age ſcattered up and down, or ignominiouſly thrown together in heaps: their ſurviving friends were not allowed to approach them, to bewail them, or even behold them; but round the dead, guards were placed to watch countenances, and obſerve the ſigns of ſorrow: when the bodies began to putrify, they were dragged to the Tiber, where they floated, or were driven upon the banks, no man daring to burn or touch them, the force of fear having cut off all intercourſe of humanity, and baniſhed every ſymptom of pity and tenderneſs. Among the reſt periſhed this year three of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the empire, Aſinius Gallus, Druſus the ſon of Germanicus, manicus, and the celebrated Agrippina. Of Aſinius Gallus we have ſpoken above [x] (Y). He was the ſon of the famous Aſinius Pollio, one of Auguſtus's chief favourites, and married Vipſania the daughter of Agrippa, after Tiberius had divorced her to marry Julia: ſo that his children were brothers to Druſus, whom Tiberius had by Vipſania, nephews to Agrippina, and nearly related to the Cæſars. not about what buſineſs, diſpatched to him by the ſenate, he received him in the moſt obliging manner, but at the ſame time wrote to the ſenate, requiring his condemnation; ſo that the very day he was entertained as a familiar friend at the emperor's table in Capreæ, he was condemned as a traytor in Rome, and a prætor was ſent to ſee the ſentence put in execution. However, the inhuman tyrant would not allow him to be immediately diſpatched; but cauſed him to be kept under cloſe confinement, no one being ſuffered to come near him, except ſuch as were charged to watch, leſt he ſhould by a voluntary death put an end to his miſeries. (Y) Lipſius takes this Aſinius Gallus to be the ſon of Aſinius Pollio, who was ſirnamed Saloninus, and upon whoſe birth Virgil compoſed the famous eclogue Sicelides Muſæ, &c. He owns, that no hiſtorian gives Aſinius the ſirname of Saloninus, but founds his opinion entirely upon the authority of Servius; which is very ſurpriſing in ſo wary a critic, ſince Servius tells us in expreſs terms, that Saloninus died ſoon after he was born; nam ipſum puerum inter ipſa primordia periiſſe manifeſtum eſt, ſays that commentator.

yond the grave with cruel invectives, and in a letter to the ſenate charged him with many heinous crimes, ordering at the ſame time the minutes of his words and actions to be read, which had long and daily been regiſtered by perſons expreſsly appointed to obſerve his looks, to watch all his actions, and note down every word, every complaint he uttered. The recital of this journal filled all who heard it with horror; and indeed, that a grand-father ſhould appoint perſons to watch all the actions, ſhould have all the weakneſſes or crimes of his grand-ſon regiſtered by ſecret ſpies, and thus expoſed to the world, ſeems ſuch a ſeries of treachery and meanneſs, as would hardly be credited, were it not atteſted by the moſt eminent writers of antiquity. Tacitus quotes the letter of Actius the centurion and Didymus the freedman, declaring particularly the names of the ſlaves ſet purpoſely to abuſe and provoke Druſus, with the ſeveral parts they acted, in order to draw from him complaints againſt Tiberius. The centurion, to whoſe cuſtody he was committed, being introduced to the ſenate, repeated in the preſence of the fathers, as matter of glory, his outrageous language to the young prince, with the words uttered by him under the agonies of hunger. He told them, that Druſus at firſt pretending to be diſtracted, vented in the ſtyle of a madman diſmal imprecations againſt Tiberius; but afterwards, finding his doom inevitable, he invoked with great deliberation and ſedateneſs the vengeance of the gods, beſeeching them, that as Tiberius had ſlaughtered his daughter-in-law, his nephew, his grandchildren, and filled with ſlaughters his whole houſe, ſo they would in juſtice to the anceſtors of the ſlain, in juſtice to their poſterity, avenge on this man of blood ſo many cruel and barbarous murders. The ſenators, in hearing the centurion, raiſed a mighty noiſe, as if they deteſted thoſe imprecations; but they were ſtruck with amazement in hearing the detail of the barbarities practiſed by the emperor's orders upon his grandſon [z]. The death of the ſon was followed by that of the mother, which happened on the ſeventeenth of October. Agrippina had been confined before the diſgrace of Sejanus, upon whoſe execution ſhe hoped Tiberius would uſe her and her ſon Druſus with more humanity. But finding him no leſs implacable than before, ſhe put an end to her miſeries by abſtaining from all food. Suetonius tells us, that after ſhe had taken a reſo-

a reſolution to ſtarve herſelf, Tiberius cauſed her mouth to be opened, and nouriſhment crammed down her throat by force [a]. But Tacitus queſtions whether ſhe abſtained voluntarily from all food, or was denied it by Tiberius's orders; and a report was afterwards ſpread, that death had been her own choice. Be that as it will, her death did not put an end to the malice and cruelty of the outrageous tyrant, who charged her with ſeveral abominable crimes, eſpecially with adultery, as if ſhe had maintained a criminal correſpondence with Aſinius Gallus, and upon his death become weary of life. But Agrippina's character and known chaſtity ſufficiently cleared her from all imputations of that nature; for ſhe had ſacrificed, as Tacitus obſerves, to a manly ambition all the paſſions and vices of her ſex. The emperor in his letter to the ſenate obſerved, that ſhe died the ſame day on which Sejanus had been executed two years before, adding, that ſuch a day ought to be particularly diſtinguiſhed; nay, he boaſted of his clemency, ſince he had not cauſed her to be ſtrangled, and her body to be expoſed on the ſcalæ Gemoniæ, and thence dragged to the Tiber. For this inſtance of mock-mercy the ſenate ſolemnly thanked him, and decreed, that on the ſeventeenth of October, the day of the death of Agrippina and Sejanus, a yearly offering ſhould be conſecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus for ever [b]. The death of Agrippina procured that of her declared enemy Plancina, the widow of Cnieus Piſo. She was guilty of many other crimes, beſides that which was laid to her charge of poiſoning Germanicus. When her huſband fell, ſhe was protected by the ſolicitations of Livia, and alſo by the animoſity of Agrippina, whom the ſpiteful Tiberius, could not find in his heart to gratify with the death of a perſon, whom ſhe abhorred. But as there was now no farther room for favour or hatred, juſtice prevailed; and Plancina, being accuſed of crimes long ſince ſufficiently proved, executed with her own hand that vengeance which was rather too late than too ſevere. Notwithſtanding the pleaſure Tiberius took in deſtroying the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, yet he was ſenſibly affected with the death of Cocceius Nerva, though it was entirely owing to his cruelty. He was one of the moſt learned civilians in Rome, had been conſul twelve twelve years before, had attended Tiberius to Capreæ, and was in high favour with him, ſo that he had no reaſon to be weary of life. But though thus in full proſperity of fortune, in perfect vigor of body, he reſolved to die, and accordingly refuſed all nouriſhment. Tiberius having learnt his deſign, did all that lay in his power to diſſuade him from putting it in execution; examined his motives, and deſcended even to entreaties, declaring, that it would be a great affliction to him, that it would reflect diſgrace upon him, and tarniſh his reputation, if one of his moſt intimate friends, his inſeparable companion, ſhould thus ſhew himſelf weary of life. But notwithſtanding the remonſtrances and reaſoning of Tiberius, Nerva perſiſted in his purpoſe, and ended his life by abſtinence. Towards the end of this year died three illuſtrious citizens, Ælius Lamia, Manius Lepidus, and Pomponius Flaccus. Lamia had for ſeveral years held the government of Syria, but had never been allowed to viſit his province. Upon the death of L. Piſo, which happened the preceding year, Tiberius diſcharged him from the mock-adminiſtration of Syria, and appointed him governor of Rome. A public funeral was decreed him by the ſenate [c]. He was ſucceeded in his laſt employment by C. Coſſus, who, though a famous drunkard, was never known, as Seneca informs us [d], to diſcloſe a ſecret; whence Tiberius truſted him with his moſt private counſels. Lepidus was one of the moſt worthy men in Rome; we have already given various inſtances of his wiſdom and moderation: as to his abilities, he was in the opinion of Auguſtus, as we have obſerved in the beginning of this reign, well qualified for the ſovereign power, but not fond of it. Pomponius Flaccus was by Tiberius firſt raiſed to the government of Mœſia, where he betrayed and ſeized Rheſcuporis, as we have related above. He was afterwards made proprætor of Syria, either for this piece of treachery, or upon the merit of his famous debauch with L. Piſo and Tiberius. This year, Claudia daughter to Marcus Silanus, a ſenator diſtinguiſhed by his illuſtrious birth and great eloquence, was married to Caius Caligula, the only ſurviving ſon of Germanicus. The people were no leſs pleaſed with this match, than diſſatisfied with that of Julia, the daughter of Druſus and widow of Nero, who debaſed herſelf to marry Rubellius Blandus, whoſe

THIS year, the thirty-third of the common æra and nineteenth of Tiberius's reign, our Saviour was crucified, according to the opinion of the beſt chronologers; Phlegon, the emperor Adrian's freedman, who wrote ſixteen books of the olympiads, ſeems to ſpeak of the darkneſs which happened at his death: his words are; there happened the greateſt and moſt remarkable eclipſe that ever had been known; at the ſixth hour the day was ſuddenly turned into night, inſomuch, that the ſtars were ſeen: at the ſame time, an earthquake in Bithynia overturned many houſes in the city of Nice. This darkneſs, which Phlegon calls an eclipſe, happened, according to him, in the fourth year of the two hundred and ſecond olympiad, which ended about the middle of the preſent year [f]. Chriſt crucified.

THE following year, when Paulus Fabius Perſicus, or, as ſome call him, Priſius, and L. Vitellius were conſuls, many eminent perſons fell, either by their own hands, or thoſe of the public executioner, among the reſt Pomponius Labeo and Marcus Æmilius Scaurus; the former, once governor of Mœſia, being charged with male-adminiſtration, and other crimes, prevented condemnation by opening his veins, his wife Paxea following his example. The latter, a noble orator, a man of an illuſtrious deſcent, but a profeſſed debauchee, was accuſed by Servilius and Cornelius of adultery with Livia the widow of Druſus, and of offering magical ſacrifices; but his true crime was the hatred Macro bore him; for Macro, who was at this time as much in favour with Tiberius, and no leſs miſchievous than Sejanus had ever been, prejudiced the emperor againſt him, by perſuading him, that Scaurus, in a tragedy which he had compoſed, deſcribed him, and diſplayed his cruelties under the name of Atreus. But the pretended criminal, before ſentence was awarded againſt him, laid violent hands on himſelf, being encouraged thereto by his wife, who died with him [g]. Servilius and Cornelius, his accuſers, were ſoon after baniſhed into ſeveral iſlands for accepting a bribe to drop the proſecution, which they had begun againſt Varius Ligur. Ruſo likewiſe, once ædile, was himſelf condemned and driven out of Rome, while he attempted to get Lentulus Getulicus, under whom he had commanded a legion, condemned, becauſe he had eſpouſed his daughter to a ſon of Sejanus. Getulicus was at this time commander of the legions in Upper Germany, and by them extremely beloved on account of his great mildneſs and clemency. He was likewiſe acceptable to the legions of Lower Germany in conſideration of their general Apronius, his father-in-law. Hence he was generally believed to have written to Tiberius, that not by his own inclination, but by his advice, he had ſought the alliance of Sejanus; that he had been as liable to be deceived as Tiberius, and that it was not reaſonable a fault common to both ſhould paſs unblamed in one, and be puniſhed in another: he added, that he had hitherto inviolably maintained the alliance he owed him, and that he would continue unſhaken in his fidelity to the laſt, provided no dark plots were framed againſt him; but that he would look upon a ſucceſſor as the meſſenger of death; and therefore, they they ſhould, as it were, ſtrike upon an agreement between them, by which the prince ſhould enjoy the reſt of the empire, and he always retain his province. This proceeding, however ſurprizing, was believed, becauſe of all thoſe who were allied to Sejanus, Getulicus alone eſcaped unhurt, and continued in high favour to the laſt. Tiberius, ſenſible that he was univerſally hated, and that his authority was ſupported more by reputation than by force, did not care to attack a man, who had both ſufficient power and courage to defend himſelf[f]. This year, as Dion Caſſius will have it, or four years before, while Druſus was yet living, as Tacitus relates it, a young man gave out, that he was Druſus the ſon of Germanicus. He was firſt ſeen in the Cyclades, and ſoon after on the continent, attended by ſome of the emperor's freed-men, and by great crouds of people, who flocked to him from all parts. But in the mean time, Poppæus Sabinus, governor of Greece and alſo of Macedon, where he was at that time, hearing the ſtory, haſtened to Nicopolis, a Roman colony, to obviate the evil conſequences of ſuch a report. There he learnt, that this counterfeit Druſus, being artfully examined, had declared himſelf himſelf to be the ſon of Marcus Silanus, and that many of his followers falling off, he had embarqued, as if he deſigned to ſail to Italy. Further than this, ſays Tacitus, we have found nothing concerning the origin or iſſue of that affair [g]. But Dion Caſſius adds, that the impoſtor being received by many cities, and ſtrengthened with vaſt numbers of followers, would have reached Syria, and probably been acknowledged there by the armies of his pretended father, had he not been diſcovered by ſome who knew, ſeized, and ſent him to Tiberius [h]. The ſame writer tells us, that this year, the twentieth of Tiberius's reign, ending on the nineteenth of Auguſt, the conſuls ſolemnized it with public vows and ſacrifices; which the emperor highly reſenting, as if they had taken upon them to confirm to him the ſovereign power for a further term of ten years, cauſed them both to be arraigned, condemned, and executed [i]. What Dion ſays of the conſuls of this year is not to be underſtood of thoſe we have named, but of others, who were ſubſtituted in their room, it being evident both from Tacitus and Suetonius, that L. Vitellius, the father of the emperor Aulus Vitellius, was ſent the year following into Syria to govern that province. We ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention him in the following reign (Z).

(Z) Tacitus tells us, that in the conſulſhip of Fabius and Vitellius, after many ages the phœnix appeared in Egypt, and furniſhed the learned, both of that country and of Greece, with matter for various obſervations concerning that miraculous bird. On this occaſion he acquaints us with the opinions of ſuch as have written on that ſubject, and tells, that they all agree in this, viz. that it is a creature ſacred to the ſun, and that as to its beak and feathers it differs from all other birds; but as to the length of its life relations vary: the common opinion is, ſays our hiſtorian, that it lives five hundred years; but there are not wanting ſome who extend its life to 1461, and affirm, that the three former phœnixes appeared in reigns greatly diſtant, the firſt under Seſoſtris, the next under Amaſis, and that the laſt was ſeen under Ptolemy, the third king of the Macedonian race, and flew to the city of Heliopolis, accompanied by a vaſt number of other

In the following conſulſhip of Ceſtius Gallus and M. Servilius Noniānus, the domeſtic evils continued, Tiberius, though now three years ſince the execution of Sejanus, being no ways appeaſed, either by time or the innumerable victims he had already ſacrificed to his jealouſy. He ſtill purſued with freſh rage ſtale and dubious imputations, puniſhing them as recent, heinous, and proved crimes. The moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons, who periſhed this year, were Fulcinius Trio, Granius Martianus, Tatius Gratianus, Trebellienus Rufus, and Sextius Paconiānus. Trio, who was conſul the year Sejanus was executed, being accuſed of having been privy to the treacherous deſigns of that miniſter, made his laſt will, in which he compiled a long charge of iniquities and dreadful invectives againſt Macro and the emperor's chief freedmen, not ſparing the prince himſelf, whom he ſtyled an old dotard, and, on account of his long abſence, a deſpicable exile. Theſe invectives were ſuppreſſed by the heirs of Trio; but Tiberius, not aſhamed to publiſh his own infamy, ordered them to be read in the ſenate, either to ſhew that he could bear ſuch liberties, or becauſe he was willing, ſince he had been ſo long ignorant of the black enormities of Sejanus, that whatever was ſaid, and however ſaid, concerning him and his adminiſtration, ſhould be divulged; that he might at leaſt learn from the reproaches uttered againſt him, the truths which flattery ſtudied to diſguiſe. other birds wondering at her ſtrange ſhape. But the accounts of antiquity, ſays Tacitus, are obſcure: between Ptolemy and Tiberius, ſcarce paſſed two hundred and fifty years; whence ſome thought that this was no true phœnix, nor come from Arabia, and that it had nothing of the inſtinct which antient tradition aſcribes to the genuine; according to which tradition the true phœnix, having completed a certain courſe of years, builds juſt before its death a neſt in its native land, upon which it ſheds a generative power, whence ſprings up a young one, whoſe firſt care, when grown up, is to bury its father: this it does not undertake unadviſedly; but firſt tries its ſtrength by gathering and carrying a great way loads of myrrh: when it finds itſelf equal to the burden, and fit for a long flight, it takes upon its back its father's body, carries it to the altar of the ſun, and there burns it (62). Such were the opinions of the antients, touching this miraculous, or rather fabulous, bird.

nicus Martianus, the ſenator, being charged with treaſon by Caius Gracchus, laid violent hands on himſelf (A). Tatius Gratianus, who had been prætor, was for the ſame charge ſentenced to death; and alſo Trebellienus Rufus, who had been likewiſe prætor, and formerly appointed by the ſenate guardian to the ſons of Cotys, king of Thrace; but he prevented condemnation by a voluntary death. Paconianus, who had been choſen by Sejanus to plot the overthrow of Caligula, as we have related above, was, after three years confinement, ſtrangled in priſon for verſes made there againſt Tiberius [k]. In the end of the year, died Poppæus Sabinus, who had been conſul under Auguſtus, had acquired triumphal honours, and governed for the ſpace of twenty-four years the two Mæſias, to which Tiberius had added in the ſecond year of his reign Macedon and Achaia [l]. Tacitus tells us, that he was not diſtinguiſhed either by his birth or abilities; but was nevertheleſs raiſed and favoured by the princes, becauſe he had talents equal to the employments given him, and not above them [m]. He was ſucceeded in the government of the above-mentioned provinces by C. Memmius Regulus [n]. As for the diſturbances which happened this year in Armenia, Parthia, and Cilicia, the reader will find them deſcribed by us at length in the hiſtories of thoſe kingdoms.

(A) No wonder, that voluntary deaths ſhould be ſo common at Rome, not yet illuminated with the light of the goſpel. For thoſe, who fell by the hand of the executioner, forfeited their eſtates with their lives, and were debarred the honour of burial. Their bodies were publicly expoſed to the inſults of the populace, dragged through the ſtreets with iron hooks, and thrown into the Tiber. No criminal, of what rank ſoever, nay not even women, were exempted from this baſe treatment. On the other hand, the bodies of ſuch, as by a voluntary death prevented condemnation, were interred; their wills remained in force, and their eſtates devolved to their children (63).

were condemned and executed. Such executions were now become ſo frequent and familiar, that they were hardly taken notice of; but that of Vibulenus Agrippa, a Roman knight, ſtruck all with terror and amazement. After his accuſers had finiſhed their pleadings againſt him, he pulled out poiſon, which he had concealed under his gown, and ſwallowed it in open ſenate. He immediately fell, ſo potent was the poiſon; but nevertheleſs was haſtily dragged by the lictors to the dungeon, where though ready to expire, he was ſtrangled by the common executioner [o]. Caius Galba, a conſular and brother to the emperor of this name, with the two Blæſi, fell by their own hands; Galba, upon the receipt of a letter from the emperor, forbidding him to caſt lots for the government of a province; and the Blæſi, becauſe Tiberius beſtowed their prieſthoods, as vacant dignities, upon others; this they took as a ſignal of death, and obeyed it. and, without any regard to the royal dignity, condemned and executed with the other pretended criminals [q]. This prince and his elder brother Alexander had renounced the Jewiſh, and embraced the Pagan religion out of complaiſance to their grandfather Archelaus. Agrippa their couſin-german was in the month of September dragged to priſon loaded with chains, and kept there under cloſe confinement till the death of Tiberius, as we have related in the hiſtory of the Jews. The ſame year, the city ſuffered greatly by an inundation of the Tiber [r], and by fire, which burnt down that part of the circus which was contiguous to mount Aventine, and all the buildings on the mount itſelf.

The generoſity of Tiberius on occaſion of a fire.

This misfortune turned to the glory of the prince, for he paid the value of the houſes deſtroyed, and expended in this bounty an hundred thouſand great ſeſterces; which proved the more acceptable to the people, ſays Tacitus, as he had ever been ſparing in private buildings (B). To make an eſtimate

(B) Tacitus tells us, that this bounty proved the more grateful to the people, as he was ever ſparing in private buildings; and adds

eſtimate of every man's loſs, he appointed his four ſons-in-law, Cneius Domitius, Caſſius Longinus, Marcus Vinicius, and Rubellius Blandus, aſſiſted by Publius Petronius, nominated by the conſuls [r]. The eccleſiaſtic writers tell us, that in this or the preceding year, Pontius Pilate wrote to Tiberius an account of the paſſion, reſurrection, and miracles of our Saviour, adding, that the number of his followers daily encreaſed, and that he was accounted a God. Hereupon the emperor, ſay they, made a report of the whole matter to the ſenate, with this favourable ſuffrage, that Chriſt might be reckoned among the gods: the ſenate oppoſed this motion, and even by an edict commanded all chriſtians to be baniſhed the city. But Tiberius by another edict threatening their accuſers with death, the perſecution ceaſed, and the number of the believers daily encreaſed both in Judæa and at Rome [s]. Whether this account is conſiſtent with the ſervile ſpirit of the ſenate, and the dread they were all under of oppoſing any motion made by the emperor, is what we refer to the judgment of every impartial reader.

THE next conſuls, and the laſt under Tiberius, were Cneius Acerronius and Caius Pontius Nigrinus, or, as Suetonius calls him, Niger. The emperor was now in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age, without having been ever once indiſpoſed ſince he came to the empire, though he neglected, adds, that his public works never exceeded two, viz. the temple of Auguſtus, and the ſcene of Pompey's theatre: nor, when he had finiſhed both, did he conſecrate either; whether prevented by old age, or deſpiſing popularity, is uncertain. Thus Tacitus (64), with whom Suetonius does not entirely agree. During the whole time he was emperor, ſays that writer, he built nothing that was great and magnificent: the temple of Auguſtus, and the reparation of Pompey's theatre, the only public works he ever undertook, he left unfiniſhed after ſo many years (65). And in the life of Caligula, he finiſhed the temple of Auguſtus, ſays he, and the amphitheatre of Pompey, which Tiberius had begun, but not completed (66). So that, according to Tacitus, he finiſhed theſe buildings; but left them imperfect according to Suetonius.

and was even wont to ridicule, the rules and preſcriptions of phyſicians, and ſuch as after the age of thirty wanted to be informed by them, what helped or hurt their conſtitutions. At length he was taken ill at Aſtura between Antium and Circei, as he was returning to Capreæ from the neighbourhood of Rome (C). However, he went forward, and reached Circei, where, to diſſemble his indiſpoſition, he not only aſſiſted at the military games exhibited there, but threw darts himſelf at a boar, and killed him. From Circei he advanced to Miſenum, and finding his ſtrength began to fail him, he ſettled in the villa near the promontory, which once belonged to the celebrated Lucullus. Already his ſtrength, already his ſpirits failed him; but his diſſimulation failed him not. To hide his declenſion now very viſible, he exerted the ſame vigour of mind, the ſame energy in his diſcourſe, and even affected ſometimes to be gay. In the mean time, the courſe of executions was not interrupted at Rome by the emperor's illneſs. Acutia, once the wife of Publius Vitellius, being charged with treaſon by Lælius Balbus, was condemned. Afterwards Albucilla, who had been married to Satrius Secundus, and was infamous for her amours and debaucheries, was accuſed of deviſing charms againſt the life of Tiberius. In the ſame charge were involved, as her accomplices and adulterers, Cneius Domitius, Vibius Marſus, and Lucius Arruntius, all three perſons diſtinguiſhed by their birth and employments. But as the minutes tranſmitted to the ſenate imported, that Macro had preſided in the examination of the witneſſes, and torture of the ſlaves, and the minutes were

Lucius Arruntius accuſed.

(C) About the end of the preceding year, Tiberius, leaving his iſland, approached Rome, and having ſtaid ſome time at Tuſculum, he came within ſix miles of the city, and thence beheld his metropolis floating, as it were, in blood. On his return to Campania, he was taken ill at Aſtura. Suetonius tells us, that he removed from the neighbourhood of Rome, being frightened with a kind of prodigy: for being wont to feed with his own hand a dragon, in which he took great pleaſure, he found it one morning killed and half devoured by a ſwarm of ants. Hereupon, being warned by the ſoothſayers to avoid the multitude, he haſtened back to Campania. We find no accounts of this nature in Tacitus, who only tells us, that Tiberius, after much ſhifting of places, ſettled in the end at the promontory of Miſenum in a villa, which once belonged to Lucullus.

were not accompanied by any letter from Tiberius againſt the accuſed, the fathers ſuſpected, that while he was ill, the accuſations were in great meaſure forged, perhaps without his privacy, by Macro, an irreconcileable enemy to Arruntius. However, that brave Roman choſe to die, and to his friends attempting to divert him from that reſolution, by repreſenting to him, that news of the emperor's death, which would deliver him from the preſent danger, was daily expected, he anſwered in the following manner. "The "ſame meaſures are not alike honourable to all men: I "have lived long enough, and have not wherewithal to re- "proach myſelf, ſave that I have ſubmitted to bear thus "far an old age expoſed to ſo many dangers, long hated "as I was by Sejanus, and am now by Macro, always ob- "noxious to ſome reigning miniſter, through no fault of mine, "but becauſe I am irreconcileable to the wicked. 'Tis true, I "may outlive, and eſcape, the few and laſt days of Tiberius: "but how ſhall I eſcape the young prince, his heir? If Tiberi- "us, at ſuch an age, and after ſo long experience, has been "entirely changed by the ſpirit of an uncontrouled power, "is it to be hoped, that Caligula, who is yet ſcarce out of "his childhood, unexperienced in affairs, and brought up "in the worſt of principles, will purſue a better courſe, "having Macro for his guide? that Macro, who, being "choſen to oppreſs Sejanus as the more wicked of the "two, has ſince afflicted the republic with more miſchiefs "and cruelties. I foreſee a ſervitude yet more dreadful, "and therefore will fly both from the preſent and impend- "ing calamities". Having uttered theſe words, as if he had been inſpired by the gods, he opened his veins, and bled to death [h]. Such was the end of Lucius Arruntius, a man of a moſt illuſtrious deſcent, of great fortune, and extraordinary accompliſhments, for which he was accounted by Auguſtus, as we have obſerved in the beginning of this reign, equal to the ſovereignty. Domitius, by pretending to prepare for his defence, and Marſus, by ſeeming reſolved to end his life by abſtinence, outlived Tiberius, and eſcaped the preſent danger. As for Albucilla, ſhe attempted to lay violent hands on herſelf; but the blow proving ineffectual, ſhe was by order of the ſenate dragged to priſon and there executed. baucheries, it was decreed, that Graſidius Sacerdos, formerly prætor, ſhould be baniſhed into an iſland; and that Pontius Fregellanus and Lælius Balbus, both ſenators ſhould be degraded. About the ſame time, Sextus Papinius, of a conſular family, probably the ſon of Sextus Papinius, who was conſul the foregoing year, ended his life by throwing himſelf headlong from a high-place, to avoid the impure ſolicitations of his own mother, who was thereupon accuſed, but only baniſhed Rome for ten years, till her younger ſon had paſſed the dangers of youth [i].

In the mean time, Tiberius having read in the journal of the ſenate, that ſome priſoners had been diſcharged, becauſe he had only writ that informations were lodged againſt them without mentioning witneſſes, tranſported with rage, reſolved to return at all adventures to Capreæ, and there, as in a place of ſafety, revenge the affront offered him; but the bad weather and his diſtemper kept him a-

[i] Idem. c. 49. [k] Suet. in Tib. 73.

(D) Tiberius, during his retirement at Rhodes, applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of judicial aſtrology under the direction of Thraſyllus whoſe ſkill in that art he proved by the following trial. He led him to an houſe built on the top of a ſteep rock by the ſea-ſide, and there minutely conſulted him about various events. Thraſyllus gave ſatisfactory anſwers to all his queſtions, aſſured him, that he ſhould be ſoon raiſed to the empire, and foretold many revolutions, which afterwards happened as they had been predicted. Tiberius, ſtruck with amazement, aſked him, whether he had calculated his own nativity, and could thence foreſee what was to befal him in the ſame year, nay, that very day? The reader is to know, that the way to the abovementioned houſe lay croſs ſolitary rocks and dreadful precipices; and that Tiberius, if he ſuſpected the predictions of the aſtrologer, whoſe art he meant to try, to be vain, uſed on his return to caſt him headlong into the ſea. This had been the fate of ſeveral, who, unſkilled in the art they profeſſed, had attempted to impoſe upon him with falſe predictions. Thraſyllus therefore, when the above-mentioned queſtion was put to him, ſurveying the poſition of the ſtars and calculating their aſpects, began at firſt to heſitate, then to tremble, and the more he meditated, the more he appeared diſmayed with wonder and dread; at laſt he cried out, elf, or with a design to deceive Tiberius, that he might not haſten the execution of thoſe who were in priſon. However that be, many were indebted to Thraſyllus's prediction for their lives [l]. Tiberius, relying upon this, purſued his former courſe of life, without ſo much as relinquiſhing his ſhameful debaucheries, or mentioning his diſtemper to any phyſician. However, Charicles, an eminent man in that profeſſion, who always attended him, as if he were departing upon ſome private affair, under the appearance of kiſſing his hand as he went out of the room, touched his pulſe. Tiberius, ſuſpecting the artifice, inſtantly ordered the entertainment to be ſerved up, perſuaded Charicles to ſit down again, and continued himſelf at table longer than uſual, as if he meant that honour only for a farewel to his friend, but in reality to feign health and hide his weakneſs. When the entertainment was over, he did not forget his old cuſtom; but ſtanding in the middle of the room with an officer by him, he called them all by their names, and took his leave of each of the gueſts in particular, as if he had been in perfect health. But for all this, Charicles aſſured Macro, that the emperor declined apace, and that he could not laſt two days longer. Hence the whole court was filled with cloſe conſultations, and expreſſes were ſent to the generals and armies [m].

Endeavours to hide his diſtemper.

Tiberius had no ſurviving children of his own; he had indeed a grandſon, the ſon of Druſus, named Tiberius Nero, and ſurnamed Gemellus, or the Twin, becauſe born at a birth with another, who died in his infancy. Caius, ſurnamed Caligula, was his grandſon too, but only by adoption, he being the ſon of his nephew Germanicus, whom out, that juſt then he was threatened with a danger very near fatal. At theſe words Tiberius embracing him, congratulated him upon his foreſight of dangers and his ſecurity from them; and thenceforth, eſteeming his predictions as ſo many oracles, held him in the rank of his moſt intimate friends (67). Tiberius himſelf is ſaid to have been ſkilled in aſtrology, but nevertheleſs died, if Dion Caſſius is to be credited (68), ten years ſooner than he expected; which diſcovers, to uſe the expreſſion of Tacitus, the ſhort bounds between the art and the falſhood of the art.

whom he had adopted by order of Auguſtus. Hence he was at a loſs to which of the two he ſhould bequeath the empire. The ſon of Druſus was nearer in blood, and far more dear to him, but too young to govern ſuch a mighty empire; being at this time but in the ſeventeenth year of his age. Caius was in the flower and vigour of youth, but greatly beloved by the people, which was a ſufficient motive for his grandfather to hate him. In this perplexity the emperor thought even of Claudius, who was his nephew and brother to Germanicus; but the weakneſs of his underſtanding prevented his choice: for he had been hitherto reckoned incapable of any public employment. To ſeek a ſucceſſor out of his own family was diſgracing, and in a manner inſulting, the name of the Cæſars and the memory of Auguſtus. For he had more at heart the grandeur of his race, than the welfare and ſecurity of the Roman ſtate. So that, his mind ſtill wavering and his ſtrength decaying, he left to the deciſion of fate a deliberation to which he was now unequal [n]. Thus Tacitus. But Dion Caſſius tells us, that he bequeathed the empire to Caius, whom he knew to be naturally cruel, arrogant, and tyrannical, hoping that his vices would efface the memory of his own wickedneſs, and that he would complete the deſtruction of the Roman nobility, being often heard to ſay, that Priam was a happy prince, who had the pleaſure to outlive all his ſubjects, and ſee his kingdom with his whole race periſh with him; and that in Caligula he had brought up a ſerpent for the people of Rome, and a Phaeton for the reſt of the world [o]. But with Dion Caſſius's leave, we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that ſuch horrible thoughts ſhould have ever entered into the mind even of Tiberius; and if they had, we may boldly affirm, that he was not ſo impolitic as ever to have uttered them. Suetonius aſſures us, that two years before his death he made his will, of which there were three copies, one under his own hand, the other written by one of his freedmen, but both to the ſame purpoſe, and witneſſed by perſons of no rank or diſtinction. By that will he left coheirs, Caius his grandſon by Germanicus, and Tiberius by Druſus, both in equal portions, and ſubſtituting them ſucceſſively [p]. This in the opinion of a modern critic of no mean character [q], did not ſo much regard the emperor's private eſtate, as the empire; for Dion Caſſius

Caſſius tells us in expreſs terms, that the prince left his empire by his laſt will to young Tiberius too, that he took care to make this laſt diſpoſition well known, and even cauſed it to be read by Macro in the ſenate[r]. Suetonius likewiſe in his life of Caligula writes, that the ſenate and people unanimouſly declared Caligula ſole emperor, contrary to the expreſs will of Tiberius, who had left him but his coheir with another of his grand-children, who was then under age, and ſtill in his prætexta[s]. Philo likewiſe the Jew aſſures us, that young Tiberius was left coheir of Caius, and his colleague in the ſovereignty; and adds, that Tiberius if he had lived a little longer, would have cut off Caius, and left the empire to his grandſon without either a partner or a rival[t]. Agrippa, who was afterwards king of Judæe, being come to wait on Tiberius, while he ſtill reſided in his iſland, the emperor recommended to him his grandſon Tiberius, and highly reſented his paying more court to Caius than to him; nay, he cauſed him ſix months after to be dragged to priſon, though he had received him on his arrival with the greateſt marks of friendſhip and affection, becauſe in a private converſation with Caius he had wiſhed young Tiberius might ſoon die, and ſurrender the empire to him[u]. Caius therefore, doubting of the inclination of Tiberius, left no ſtone unturned to ſecure the empire by other means. He even debaſed himſelf ſo far as to court the favour of Ennia Nœvia, the wife of Macro, with the promiſe of marriage, as ſoon as he attained the ſovereign power. His view in this was to engage in his intereſt her huſband, whoſe credit with the emperor was known to be great[w]. Tacitus and Dion Caſſius tell us, that after the death of Claudia, who had been eſpouſed to Caligula, Macro himſelf, to make his court to him, obliged his wife to ſacrifice her honour to his ambitious views, and to ſecure the young prince by a promiſe of marriage[x]. But Philo ſays, that Macro was altogether a ſtranger to the infamy of his wife, and ſuſpected nothing diſhonourable in the affection ſhe ſhewed for Caius. The ſame writer adds, that Tiberius, whom no prince ever ſurpaſſed in ſagacity and penetration, looking upon Caius as incapable of the government of ſuch a vaſt empire, and at the ſame time ſuſpecting him an enemy in his heart to the whole race of the Claudii, that is, to

to all relations on the father's ſide, and conſequently to young Tiberius, would have cut him off, inſtead of naming him for his ſucceſſor, had not Macro diverted him from this deſign, by excuſing the faults of the young prince, by aſcribing to modeſty his ſeeming want of parts, and aſſuring the emperor, that he had a great reſpect and affection for his grandſon Tiberius y. Macro's partiality for Caius was not unknown to Tiberius, who upbraided his miniſter with it, telling him, that he neglected the ſetting ſun, and courted the riſing. On ſeveral other occaſions he dropt certain words, which plainly ſhewed, that he foreſaw what would happen after his death (E). As one day Caius ridiculed

(E) Joſephus writes, that Tiberius, deſirous to know by ſome prognoſtic to which of his grand-children the gods reſerved the empire, told Evodus, one of his freedmen, that he had a mind to ſee Caius and young Tiberius early next morning. As he was perſuaded, no doubt from his ſkill in aſtrology, that he, who came firſt, ſhould ſucceed him, he charged Tiberius's governor to bring his grandſon to him next morning by break of day, ordering at the ſame time Evodus to introduce to him the young prince, who ſhould arrive firſt. Accordingly as ſoon as day appeared, the freedmen, purſuant to his orders, went to wait at the door of the emperor's chamber the arrival of the princes, not doubting, but Tiberius, upon the warning he had had, would get the ſtart of Caius. But it happened quite otherwiſe; Caius was already there, and immediately introduced by Evodus to the emperor, who in ſeeing him burſt into tears, but ſoon reſtrained them, to acquaint Caius that the gods reſerved the empire for him, and to recommend his grandſon, whom they debarred from the power and authority which was due to him by right of ſucceſſion. Caius made many fine promiſes, though he meant nothing leſs than to perform them; and the emperor, having named him for his ſucceſſor, died a few days after (69). According to this account, which in our opinion ſavours of the fable, Tiberius left the empire to Caius alone; according to Dion Caſſius and Suetonius, to Caius and Tiberius jointly; and according to Tacitus, to neither, but to the deciſion of fate, that is, to the perſon for whom fate or deſtiny reſerved it. The authority of Tacitus is of great weight with us, eſpecially in what he relates here, ſince all authors agree in deſcribing Tiberius as a fataliſt, or one who was perſuaded that all things were governed by fate.

(69) Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 8.

culed Sylla upon ſome occaſional diſcourſe, Tiberius told him, that he would have all the vices of Sylla, and none of his virtues. At another time, a debate ariſing between the two young princes, the emperor embraced with many tears his little grandſon; and addreſſing himſelf to Caius, who at this demonſtration of kindneſs betrayed great ſternneſs in his countenance, Thou, ſaid he, wilt one day murder him, and another will murder thee [z]. This he foretold, not from his ſkill in aſtrology, as Dion imagines [a], but from his ſagacity and thorough knowledge of mankind. His death foretold by Tiberius.

In the mean time, the emperor's ſtrength failing him more and more, on the ſixteenth of March ſo deep a ſwoon ſeized him, that he was believed to have finiſhed his courſe. Hereupon Caius, quitting in haſte the palace to take poſſeſſion of the empire, ſhewed himſelf abroad in the midſt of a great throng of perſons of all ranks, paying him their congratulations upon his acceſſion to the throne. But in the height of his joy, ſudden notice was brought him, that Tiberius had recovered his ſight and voice, and had called for ſome refreſhment to ſtrengthen his fainting ſpirits. This unexpected news ſtruck all with dread and horror; the croud about Caligula diſperſed in a trice, every one reſuming falſe ſorrow, or pretending ignorance, and the young prince himſelf, trembling, ſpeechleſs, and not able to ſtir from his place, expected there immediate death inſtead of the empire. Macro alone continued undiſturbed, and ordering the apartment to be cleared, cauſed the weak old man to be ſmothered with a weight of coverings under colour of keeping him warm [b]. Seneca, as quoted by Suetonius, tells us, that Tiberius, finding his end approached, pulled off his ring, and held it a conſiderable time in his hand, as if he deſigned to give it to ſome body; that he put it upon his finger again, and that after having continued a long time motionleſs with his left hand ſhut cloſe, all of a ſudden he called one of his attendants, and no one anſwering he roſe up; but his ſtrength failing him, he fell down by the bedſide, and died [c]. Others write, that Caius not only gave him a ſlow working poiſon, which conſumed him by degrees, but that having commanded his ring to be taken off of his finger, and obſerving Tiberius to make ſome reſiſtance, he immediately ſmothered him with a pillow; Is too haſty to take poſſeſſion of the empire. low; they add, that this action ſeemed ſo cruel to one of his freedmen, that he could not forbear crying out; which ſo provoked Caius, that he cauſed him to be immediately apprehended and crucified. This does not all ſeem incredible, ſays Suetonius, ſince there are authors, who affirm, that he bragged of having attempted to diſpatch the old emperor on another occaſion, publicly owning, that, to revenge the death of his mother and brothers, he went with a dagger in his hand into Tiberius's chamber, while he was aſleep; but being touched with compaſſion, he threw away the weapon, and retired, that Tiberius ſaw him, but thought it adviſeable to take no notice of what he had obſerved. This circumſtance inclines us to believe the whole account fabulous, and invented either by Caius himſelf, or by thoſe who relate it. He did not indeed want cruelty for ſuch an attempt, but courage and reſolution, if we may depend upon the character which Tacitus [d] and moſt writers give him. Tiberius died, according to Tacitus and Suetonius [e], on the ſixteenth, according to Dion Caſſius [f], on the twenty-ſixth of March; ſo that he reigned from the death of Auguſtus, twenty-two years, ſix months and twenty-eight days, or ten days more, as Dion will have it. He was at his death in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age, which he had entered four months, and nine, or at moſt nineteen, days before [g]. Though he had the preceding year highly obliged the city by a generous bounty on occaſion of a fire, yet the news of his death was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy, the populace running up and down the ſtreets in great crouds, and crying, Throw the tyrant into the Tiber, or beſeeching their mother earth and the infernal gods to vouchſafe him no place but among the impious: ſome threatened to drag his vile carcaſs to the Gemoniæ, and there expoſe it to the rage and fury of the multitude, provoked not only by his paſt cruelties, but by a new piece of inhumanity, even after his death. For whereas, by the decree we have ſpoken of above, it was provided, that no criminal whatſoever ſhould be executed till the tenth day after ſentence pronounced, that term happening to expire with reſpect to ſeveral perſons on the ſame day the news of Tiberius's death reached Rome, they earneſtly begged for a farther reprieve, not doubting, but Caius would grant them their lives and liberty. But as he was abſent, and no one elſe at Rome, to whom any petition in their behalf could be addreſſed, the keepers of the priſon ſtrangled them of their own accord, and expoſed their bodies to public view; which cruel action encreaſed the hatred of the people againſt Tiberius, as if his cruelty had out-lived him [k]. Several others, however, were ſaved; for the emperor dying before the term of their reprieve expired, they had time to apply to his ſucceſſor, who ſet them at liberty [l].

His body conveyed to Rome, and there burnt.

The body of the deceaſed emperor was by the ſoldiers, without doubt of the prætorian guards, carried from Miſenum to Rome, where it was burnt with the uſual ſolemnity, Caius, who had never abandoned the body, pronouncing the funeral oration, in which he ſpoke little of Tiberius, but greatly extolled Auguſtus and Germanicus, without forgetting himſelf. He had written to the ſenate before, acquainting them with the death of the emperor, and his acceſſion to the empire, and requiring them at the ſame time to decree thoſe honours to Tiberius which they had formerly beſtowed on Auguſtus. But the ſenate not yet acquainted with the humour of the new emperor, poſtponed the affair till his arrival, when he took no farther notice of what he had written; but cauſing the body to be brought into the city in the night-time expoſed it the next day, and then ordered it to be burnt without any extraordinary pomp or honours [m]. As for his character, every reader may draw it to himſelf after the detail we have given of the moſt remarkable actions of his life. However, to what we have already ſaid, we ſhall ſubjoin the words with which Tacitus cloſes the hiſtory of his reign. Tiberius, ſays he, was deſervedly eſteemed by all while he was a private man, or commanded under Auguſtus; with great cunning and addreſs he feigned virtue, while Germanicus and Druſus lived: he bore a mixt character of good and evil till the death of his mother; he did not diſguiſe his execrable cruelty, but concealed his lewdneſs, while he loved and feared Sejanus: at laſt he abandoned himſelf at once to all wickedneſs, being no longer reſtrained either by ſhame or fear, but following

[m] Tacit. c. 51.

(F) We ſhall ſubjoin here ſome obſervations on Tiberius, which we have found in the antients; but for brevity's ſake avoided inſerting in our text. He was, as Suetonius informs us, a great lover of liberal arts: he was an eloquent and ready ſpeaker, and in his writings imitated Meſſala Corvinus, a famous orator; but his too great niceneſs, or rather affectation, rendered his ſtyle perplexed and obſcure; whence he was eſteemed a better ſpeaker without, than upon, premeditation and ſtudy. He wrote a lyric poem, intitled, A complaint on the death of Lucius Cæſar, which was greatly eſteemed; and ſeveral Greek pieces in imitation of Euphorion, Rhianus, and Parthenius, poets whom he admired above the reſt, and whoſe ſtatues he cauſed to be dedicated in the public libraries amongſt thoſe of the moſt celebrated writers. He took great delight in the fables of the poets, with which he was thoroughly acquainted, and uſed to puzzle the grammarians with the following and ſuch-like queſtions; Who was Hecuba's mother? What was the name of Achilles amongſt the maids at the court of Lycomedes? What ſongs the Sirens were ſaid to ſing? &c. The Greek tongue he ſpoke with great readineſs and eaſe, but uſed it very ſeldom. In his ſpeeches to the ſenate he took care to avoid Greek words; inſomuch, that the Latin tongue ſupplying him with no word to expreſs monopoly, he begged leave to uſe a foreign one. Having read in a decree of the ſenate the word emblema, he deſired the ſenators to alter it, and either put a Latin word in its room, or expreſs the meaning of it by circumlocution (70). He betrayed even from his infancy manifeſt tokens of a cruel, ſavage, and untractable temper; whence Theodorus Gadareus, who taught him the firſt rudiments of learning, uſed to call him, A maſs of clay tempered with blood (71). Moſt of the antients, who ſpeak of him, obſerve, that though he could brook no oppoſition, yet he abhorred flattery, as ſuiting only with the ſpirit of ſlaves, and was even aſhamed of the mean and ſlaviſh ſubmiſſions of the ſenate. He never forgave free ſpeakers, never could endure men of a bold ſpirit, whom firſt or laſt he purſued to deſtruction: but at the ſame time he abominated flattery, when he knew it to be ſo; whence it was dangerous, ſays Tacitus, to practice no flattery, and dangerous to practice too much, adulatione, quæ perinde anceps ſi ſi nulla, & ubi nimia eſt: and elſewhere; libertatem metuebat, adulationem oderat. As he was a man of great penetration, and endowed with extraordinary talents both for civil and military employments, he would have made a great figure in the times of the republic, well ſupported the dignity of a ſenator, diſcharged with credit the firſt offices of ſtate, and in all likelihood died in renown, and left behind him a high reputation. But being, unhappily for himſelf and his country, inveſted with an uncontrouled power, he let looſe all his paſſions; ſo that he, who might have proved an excellent and uſeful member of a free ſtate, became a prince altogether mercileſs, nay, a deſtructive and inſupportable tyrant. What is not to be apprehended from power without controul? and who is to be truſted with it, when a man of ſuch great parts and ſo long experience, as Tiberius, was ſo entirely maſtered and intoxicated with it?

(G) Theſe were, Velleius Paterculus, of whoſe hiſtory the far greater part is loſt; what ſtill remains of it comprehends the antient hiſtory of the Greeks and that of the Romans, from the defeat of Perſes to the ſevententh year of Tiberius's reign. He is thought to have written with candor and impartiality till the times of the Cæſars, in whoſe favour he miſerably perverts truth, or utterly ſuppreſſes it. What he writes of Tiberius ought rather to be ſtyled a fulſom panegyric, than an hiſtory. Semper magnæ fortunæ comes eſt adulatio, ſays he; Flattery is a conſtant attendant upon greatneſs: and indeed, he is himſelf a remarkable inſtance of the truth of this ſaying, as muſt evidently appear to every impartial reader, in the peruſal of the account he has left us of Tiberius's reign He accuſes Germanicus of cowardice, while he repreſents others as conſummate heroes, who were no-ways to compare with that brave prince, either in courage or conduct. His chief hero, after Tiberius, was the favourite miniſter Sejanus, on whom he beſtows the higheſt encomiums, not foreſeeing the doom that hung over his head, and ſoon after overtook him. Some writers think, that Velleius himſelf fell with Sejanus, as a friend, if not an accomplice, of the traitor whom he ſo undeſervedly commended. He put the laſt hand to his work in the conſulſhip of M. Vinicius, to whom he inſcribed it; that is, in the ſeventeenth year of Tiberius's reign, as he himſelf informs us (72), and twenty-ſeven after he had been adopted by Auguſtus. He was of an equeſtrian family, come originally from Campania, and deſcended by the mother from the celebrated Decius Magius, who, being condemned by the ſenate of Capua to be delivered up to Hannibal, for his ſteady adherence to the Roman intereſt, was ſent away for Carthage, but driven by a ſtorm to the dominions of Ptolemy king of Egypt, who took him under his protection. His paternal grandfather was likewiſe a native of Campania, but raiſed to great preferments, firſt by Pompey the great, and afterwards by Brutus, under whom he ſerved. He himſelf ſerved nine years under Tiberius, firſt as military tribune in Thrace and Macedon, and afterwards in quality of commander of the legionary horſe in Germany. As to his civil employments, he was honoured with the quæſtorſhip, the prætorſhip, and, as ſome writers conjecture, with the conſulate; which is not improbable, ſince he was in great favour both with Tiberius and Sejanus (73).

Valerius Maximus, who left behind him a collection of the memorable actions and ſayings of the antients, wrote about the latter end of Tiberius's reign, after the fall of Sejanus, as is manifeſt from his own words, and from thoſe of the antients who quote him. His ſtyle, which has nothing of the purity of the age he is ſuppoſed to have lived in, has prompted ſome to imagine, that his writings are of a much later date. Theſe take it for granted, that all thoſe who wrote in the golden age, wrote well, which others deny. Voſſius takes the work, which paſſes under the name of Valerius Maximus, to be only an abridgment of what he wrote, done by one Julius Paris. In what age the ſuppoſed author of this epitome lived, we are no-where told; but to him is generally aſcribed the treatiſe of Roman names which is ſubjoined to the nine books of Valerius Maximus (74).

Strabo, whoſe ſeventeen books of geography are ſo much and ſo deſervedly admired by the learned, obſerves in his ſixteenth book, that the kingdom of Comagene had been but very lately reduced to a Roman province This happened according to the opinion of the beſt chronologers, the eighteenth year of the chriſtian æra, and the fifth of Tiberius's reign; ſo that we reaſonably ſuppoſe Strabo, who was then very old, to have ended both his work and his life before the death of Tiberius. He wrote other books, but none of them have reached us.

Dionyſius the geographer, who wrote a deſcription of the earth in Greek verſe, died according to Voſſius, in the reign of Tiberius. For that writer takes this to be the Dionyſius who was ſent into the eaſt by Auguſtus, as we read in Pliny (75), to (73) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. lat. l. i. c. 24. (74) Idem ibid. c. 24.

(75) Plin. l. vi. c. 27.

to ſurvey thoſe countries, and make an exact deſcription of them for the uſe of Caius Cæſar, who was to be ſent thither. The Dionyſius, whom Auguſtus employed, was a native of Corax, called alſo Alexandria and Antioch, and ſituated between the Tigris and Eulæus. He was the laſt, ſays Pliny, who wrote a deſcription of the whole earth. Scaliger will not allow the deſcription of the earth, which has reached us, to be the work of that Dionyſius, but of another, who flouriſhed under the emperor Severus. Salmaſius on the other hand aſcribes it to one of the ſame name, who wrote in the reign of M. Aurelius; and in his notes on the Auguſtan hiſtorians (76), promiſes to ſupport this opinion with unanſwerable arguments in a new edition, which he then deſigned, of Dionyſius. This promiſe he made in 1620. But in his notes upon Solinus publiſhed in 1629, ſpeaking occaſionally of Dionyſius the geographer, he ſays, that he lived under the emperor Severus, without taking the leaſt notice of his invincible arguments, or ſo much as deigning to acquaint us with the reaſons which prompted him to change his opinion (77). He ſpeaks of him in another place (78); but there endeavours only to prove, that he did not flouriſh in the reign of Auguſtus. Suidas mentions three geographers, all bearing the name of Dionyſius; one a native of Corinth, another of Miletus, and the third either of Rhodes or Samos (79). In ſuch variety of opinions, we will not take upon us to aſcertain the time, in which flouriſhed the author of the deſcription of the earth that has reached us: all we can ſay is, that Euſtathius, Voſſius, father Pagi, and cardinal Noris were certainly miſtaken in ſuppoſing him to have lived in the time of Auguſtus, ſince he mentions ſome events, as Salmaſius rightly obſerves (80), which happened in the reign of Domitian.

Phædrus, who tranſlated into Latin verſe the fables of Æſop, was, according to Voſſius (81), a native of Thrace, and one of Auguſtus's freedmen, and died in the reign of Tiberius.

Thraſyllus the aſtrologer, of whom we have ſpoken above, was well verſed in ſeveral other ſciences, eſpecially in Plato's philoſophy. Jonſſius takes him to be the author of a work quoted by ſome of the antients, on the genealogy of Plato (82). To him are likewiſe aſcribed ſome books of phyſic quoted by Pliny. The emperor Julian aſſures us, that Thraſyllus acquired more fame by the books he left behind him, than by his mighty credit with Tiberius (83). Jonſſius tells us, that he was put to death by Tiberius, in the ſixteenth year of the chriſtian æra, that is, in the ſecond year of Tiberius's reign (84). But it is manifeſt from Dion Caſſius, that Thraſyllus died by the courſe of nature in the thirty ſixth year of the chriſtian æra, that is, a year before Tiberius (85).

L. Feneſtella, the poet and hiſtorian, died towards the latter end of Tiberius's reign. He ſeems to have been greatly eſteemed by the antients (86); but ſome are of opinion, that none of his works have reached our times. The treatiſe of the Roman magiſtrates, which goes under his name, is of a later date, and generally aſcribed to Andrea Domenico Flocco, a native of Florence.

Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian and preceptor to Caius and Lucius Cæſars, died in the reign of Tiberius, extremely old (87). He wrote, according to Aulus Gellius (88), ſeveral books of memorable things, and a book of the ſignification of words, which that writer ſometimes quotes (89). We have ſtill ſome fragments of ſeveral of his works, quoted ſometimes by Macrobius, and frequently by Pliny. He wrote a book of Faſti, and a catalogue of all the Roman conſuls to his time, which was engraved on marble, and ſet up in the forum of Præneſte (90). Moſt writers take the fragments of the Faſti, which are ſtill to be ſeen in the capital at Rome, to be the ſame that were ſet up at Præneſte; but they can alledge nothing in proof of their opinion, except mere conjectures, ſince others, as well as Verrius, might have undertaken a work of the ſame nature. The Faſti Capitolini, beſides the names of the conſuls, mark the triumphs, ſeveral incidents relating to hiſtory, and alſo the years of Rome; but are always a year behind Varro, whom moſt authors follow. To thoſe we might add many other writers, who flouriſhed under Tiberius, according to Voſſius and Jonſſius; but, as their works are long ſince loſt, we ſhall not detain our readers with a detail, from which they can reap no profit.

As the reverend fathers, Catrou and Rouillè, have not yet carried their Roman hiſtory beyond this period, the death of Tiberius, we think ourſelves bound both in juſtice and gratitude to acknowledge in this place the aſſiſtance we have received from their labours. The copious materials, which they have collected with incredible pains from almoſt innumerable authors, have been we muſt own, a great help to us, though we have never made uſe of them without conſulting the originals, a caution, we are ſorry to ſay it, which we have found too often neceſſary.

ceſſary. But of their moſt material and remarkable miſtakes notice has been occaſionally taken in the courſe of the preſent hiſtory; and in this place we are only to return them thanks, which we do accordingly, for the aſſiſtance they have lent us. We might juſtly be taxed with ingratitude, if we did not at the ſame time diſcharge another obligation, and own ourſelves greatly indebted to a writer of our own nation; we mean the ingenious Mr. Hooke, whoſe excellent performance has proved more ſerviceable to us, than the numerous volumes of the jeſuits. As we are obliged, both by the nature of our undertaking and our engagement with the public to have immediate recourſe to the antient writers, it is our conſtant cuſtom to compare with them ſuch of the moderns of any repute as have handled the ſame ſubjects with us. Upon this collation, we muſt do Mr. Hooke the juſtice to own, that he has with a ſcrupulous exactneſs adhered all along to his authors; which is more than we can ſay of the Jeſuits, of monſieur Vertot, or monſieur Rollin, who, like moſt writers of their nation, ſeem to take delight in embelliſhing their narrations with circumſtances unknown to the antients, which, in other words, is adulterating truth with romance, and paſſing fables upon the readers for hiſtory; ſince there are but few who have either the leiſure or convenience of undeceiving themſelves by recurring to the originals. Thus much we have thought ourſelves obliged to ſay in commendation of a writer, who deſerves ſo well of the public and of us in particular, tho' the favourable reception, which his undertaking has already met with, may ſeem to have rendered our teſtimony in ſome degree uſeleſs.

(H) Caius, ſays Tacitus, was born in the camp, nurſed in the arms of the legions, and by them named Caligula, a military name from the boots, which, of the ſame faſhion with their own, in compliment to them and to win their affections, he frequently wore (20). The ſurname of Caligula, ſays Suetonius (21), was given him in the camp by the legions, becauſe he was brought up amongſt them in the habit of a common ſoldier; in virtue of which education, he was to ſuch a degree beloved by them, that upon a mutiny after the death of Auguſtus, his preſence appeaſed them, when in the height of their fury. Thus Tacitus and Suetonius agree as to the origin of the ſurname of Caligula; but they differ as to the place of his birth. Caius ordinary merit of his father Germanicus, and the injuries done to him and his family, news was no ſooner brought that he was advancing from Miſenum with the corſe of the deceaſed emperor, than perſons of all ranks and ages crouded out to meet him. At his entrance into the city he was received with new names of honour and all poſſible demonſtrations of real affection. The ſenate immediately aſſembled, and, the people thronging into the hall with the ſenators, he was by univerſal conſent declared emperor with full power, contrary to the expreſs will of Tiberius, who had left him coheir with his grandſon Tiberius, then under age and in his pretexta. The joy for his acceſſion to the imperial throne was not confined to the narrow bounds of Rome and Italy, but reached the moſt diſtant provinces; inſomuch, that in the ſpace of three months an hundred and ſixty thouſand victims were ſlain on that occaſion within the limits of the empire [n]. He had no ſooner paid his laſt duty to the remains of his grandfather, than he haſtened into the iſlands of Pandataria and Pontia, where he gathered with great reverence the bones and aſhes of his mother and brother

Cæſar, ſays Suetonius (22), was born the laſt day of Auguſt, his father and C. Fonteius Capito being conſuls, that is, the twelfth year of the common chriſtian æra. As to the place of his birth, continues the ſame writer, the diverſity of reports hath rendered it uncertain: Cn. Lentulus Getulicus writes, that he was born at Tibur, now Tivoli; Pliny in the country of the Treviri, in a town called Ambitarinum, at the confluence of the Rhine and the Moſelle; and, to confirm his opinion, he adds, that there are ſtill altars to be ſeen there with this inſcription; Ob Agrippinæ Puerperium, for the delivery of Agrippina: the following verſes likewiſe enforce the common opinion, that he was born in the place where the legions were at that time in their winter-quarters:

In caſtris natus, patriis nutritus in armis,
Jam deſignati principis omen erat.

brother Nero, brought them to Rome, and cauſed them to be depoſited with extraordinary pomp in the mauſoleum of Auguſtus [o]. The inſcriptions which he placed over them are

But I find amongſt the public records, that he was born at Antium. Pliny refutes Getulicus as one who did not ſcruple to depart from truth, that he might flatter a young and ambitious prince by aſſigning him for his birth-place, a town which was conſecrated to Hercules. This he could do the more boldly, as Agrippina had been delivered of a ſon at Tibur but a year before, whoſe name was likewiſe Caius Cæſar. As for Pliny, he is ſufficiently confuted by the computation of times: for thoſe who have written the hiſtory of Auguſtus aſſure us, that Caius was born before his father Germanicus was ſent into Gaul, after his conſulſhip was expired. Neither is the inſcription upon the altars of any weight, ſeeing Agrippina was delivered of two daughters in that country; and the word Puerperium may be underſtood of either ſex. Beſides, in former times, girls were called Pueræ, and boys Puelli. There is alſo ſtill extant an epiſtle from Auguſtus to his grand-daughter Agrippina, written not many months before his death concerning this Caius, for there was no other child then of this name, in theſe words: Yeſterday I ordered Talarius and Aſellus to bring little Caius hither, if it pleaſed the gods, on the ſeventeenth of May. I ſend with him one of my phyſicians, whom, as I have written to Germanicus, he may keep with him, if he thinks good. Farewel, my dear Agrippina; take care of your health, that you may be well when you meet your huſband. From this letter it is evident, that Caius was at this time in Italy; and he could not be born in a country, into which he was conveyed from Rome, when he was near two years old. This evidence confutes alſo the verſes, the more becauſe the author was never known. It therefore remains, that we acquieſce in the teſtimony of the public records; the rather becauſe Caius preferred Antium to all other places, nay, being weary of Rome, he is ſaid to have reſolved to remove his imperial ſeat thither. Thus far Suetonius (23), whoſe arguments, in the opinion of Lipſius, carry no great weight with them. Were Tacitus and Pliny ignorant of what was contained in the public acts? can we ſuppoſe, that ſuch an accurate writer as Tacitus would have poſitively affirmed, without conſulting the public records, that Caius was born in the camp? Germanicus, as it is agreed on all hands, was are ſtill to be ſeen [p]; and from the medals of Agrippina, which have reached us [q], it appears, that he diſtinguiſhed her with the title of Auguſta. All the decrees of the ſenate enacted againſt them, and againſt Druſus, who died at Rome, were annulled [r]; nay, a ſtately villa, on the ſea-ſide, where Agrippina had for ſome time been kept under confinement, was, levelled with the ground, that no monuments might remain of her misfortunes [s]. Public ſacrifices were at his motion appointed by the ſenate to be yearly offered to perpetuate their memory; ſolemn games in the circus, and chariot-races, were inſtituted in honour of

was ſent into Germany immediately after the ſlaughter of Varus and his legions, and continued there till his conſulſhip, when he left Germany and returned to Rome; but we are no-where told, that his wife Agrippina accompanied him in that journey. She was perhaps then big with Caius, remained on that account in Germany, and was there delivered of him, during her huſband's conſulſhip. There appears at leaſt in this no incongruity, no improbability. As to the public regiſters, perhaps another ſon, bearing the ſame name, was born to them at Antium; for they had in all nine children, of whom three died infants. The ſurname of Caligula, which was given to this Caius by the legions ſome time after his birth, was not, we imagine, added to his name in the regiſters: Suetonius therefore might have miſtaken another Caius for this. But he could not be born in a country, into which he was conveyed from Rome, when he was two years old. Why not? might not Agrippina have been delivered of Caius in Germany, then come to Rome, and afterwards return to Germany? we are ſurpriſed that Suetonius ſhould lay any ſtreſs on ſo weak an argument. Caius, 'tis true, preferred Antium to all other places, as Tiberius did Capreæ, and Auguſtus Tibur and Lanuvium; but no one ever pretended to infer from thence, that they were born in either of theſe places. Whoever was the author of the above-mentioned verſes, they were publiſhed upon Caius's acceſſion to the empire; and we can hardly perſuade ourſelves, that the place of his nativity was not then known at leaſt to every Roman. Upon the whole, we cannot help preferring to the authority of Suetonius that of Tacitus, ſupported by the teſtimonies of Pliny, Athenæus, and Sextus Victor (24).

of his mother, in which her image was to be carried amongſt thoſe of the gods; and the month of September was by a decree of the ſenate to be thenceforth called by the name of his father Germanicus. Having thus ſignalized his piety towards his father, his mother, and his brothers, he honoured his grandmother Antonia with the name of Auguſta, appointed her prieſteſs of Auguſtus, granted her all the privileges enjoyed by the veſtals, and all the marks of diſtinction which had ever been conferred upon Livia, either by Auguſtus or Tiberius [t]. The privileges of the veſtals he likewiſe granted to his ſiſters, Agrippina, Druſilla, and Livilla or Julia (I), and ordained that their names ſhould be added to his in all ſolemn oaths, with this clauſe; neither am I dearer to myſelf, nor are my children dearer to me, than Caius Cæſar and his ſiſters; and to all the public acts the following form was ordered to be prefixed; may it prove fortunate and happy to Caius Cæſar and his ſiſters [u]. All the papers, regiſters, and records, which Tiberius had left relating to the proceedings againſt his mother and brothers, he cauſed to be brought publicly into the forum, and there to be committed to the flames in his preſence, after having ſolemnly called the gods to witneſs, that he had never read, nor even opened them. This he did, as he then declared, that no room might be left for fear or apprehenſions in thoſe who had been the occaſion of the misfortunes which befel them [w]. However, as they were all afterwards to a man cut off under the imputation of various crimes, it was commonly believed, that he had burnt only the copies, and preſerved the originals [x]. The very day he made his entry into Rome, he was for ſetting at liberty Agrippa, the grandſon of king Herod, whom Tiberius had confined ſix months before. But his grandmother Antonia, though a great friend to Agrippa, adviſed him to ſuſpend for ſome time the effects of his

(I) Caius had, according to Suetonius, but three ſiſters, Agrippina, Druſilla, and Livilla; ſo that Livilla and Julia muſt be one and the ſame perſon. Julia was the youngeſt of Germanicus's daughters, born in the ſeventeenth year of the chriſtian æra and in the thirty-third married to Marcus Vinicius (25).

his good-nature, leſt he ſhould ſeem to inſult the memory of his grandfather [y]. However, he was releaſed a few days after, as were likewiſe all the other ſtate priſoners, and among the reſt L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom we have ſpoken above, after ſeven years cloſe confinement. Such as had been baniſhed by Tiberius were all recalled home, which occaſioned an univerſal joy in the city. But nothing gave greater ſatisfaction both to the nobility and people, than his ſolemnly declaring, that he would not ſuffer any one to be accuſed of treaſon, ſince under the appearance of that crime ſo many illuſtrious citizens, ſo many antient and noble families, had been involved in endleſs calamities. Of this his reſolution he gave ſoon after a remarkable inſtance; for a note being offered him tending to the diſcovery of a conſpiracy againſt his life, he rejected it, ſaying, I am not conſcious to myſelf of any action that can deſerve the hatred of any man, and therefore have no ears for informers [z]. Though the will of Tiberius had been declared null by the ſenate, yet he executed every article of it with great punctuality, except that which related to the deceaſed emperor's grandſon; the ſame regard he paid to the teſtament of Livia, which had been ſuppreſſed by Tiberius, cauſing their legacies to be diſcharged forthwith, and adding to them large ſums of his own to be divided among the Roman people and the ſoldiery [a]. In his firſt ſpeech to the ſenate he promiſed to govern with juſtice and moderation, to do nothing without their advice, and to follow their directions, as their child and pupil. Purſuant to his proteſtations, he cauſed the famous inſtitutions of Auguſtus to be revived and publiſhed, though they had been long neglected and diſuſed by Tiberius; he gave free juriſdiction to the magiſtrates, without reſerving any appeal to himſelf, and even attempted to reſtore the antient method of elections by the ſuffrages of the people. The ſenate were for declaring him conſul, as ſoon as the funeral ceremonies, performed in honour of his grandfather were over; but he could not be prevailed upon to accept that dignity, till Proculus and Nigrinus had ended their year, which expired in the month of July [b]. In the mean time, he applied himſelf with the conſuls and ſenate to the reformation of many abuſes, which had crept into the ſtate. He reviewed the Roman knights, and publicly took away the the rings and horſes of ſuch as he found guilty of ſome notorious crimes; ſmaller offences he thought ſufficiently puniſhed by paſſing over the names of the offenders, as he read the roll. He was for caſting the ſpintriæ, or inventors of abominable lewdneſs, into the ſea; but being diſſuaded from that ſeverity, he baniſhed them from Rome. He allowed every one to keep and peruſe the books of Titus Labienus, Cremutius Cordus, and Caſſius Severus, which in the reign of Tiberius had been by order of the ſenate prohibited and ſuppreſſed, ſaying, it nearly concerned him, that all the actions of Tiberius ſhould be tranſmitted to poſterity. He likewiſe remitted ſeveral impoſitions, which had been exacted with great ſeverity during the whole reign of his predeceſſor [c]. Thus did Caligula happily begin his reign; and of him it may be truly ſaid, that no prince came ever to a throne with greater advantages, or more to the ſatisfaction of his people.

In the month of July, Caius entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, and choſe for his collegue his uncle Claudius, then in the forty-ſixth year of his age; who till that time had continued in the equeſtrian order, being judged unequal to any public employment, on account of the weakneſs both of his body and mind [d]. We are told, that when he firſt entered the forum with the faſces, an eagle perched upon his ſhoulder, which was looked upon as a prognoſtic of his future grandeur [e]. The ſame day Caius, in a ſpeech which he made to the ſenate, ſpoke with great vehemence againſt the diſorders of the late adminiſtration, promiſed to avoid them as much as lay in his power, and ſolemnly proteſted, that he had nothing ſo much at heart, as to render the people happy, whom the gods had committed to his care. The ſenate decreed, that his ſpeech ſhould be publicly read every year, without all doubt to remind him of the promiſes he had made them, and lay him under ſome obligation of performing them [f]. On the laſt day of Auguſt, which was his birth-day, he entertained the people with the moſt magnificent ſhews that had ever been ſeen in Rome; and on this occaſion cuſhions were firſt laid on the ſeats of the ſenators, who till that time had ſat both in the ſenate and theatre on bare benches [g]. Thenceforth no day paſſed without ſome ſhew or other, the emperor taking great pleaſure in ſuch diverſions, and expending on ſuch occaſions immenſe menſe ſums. During his conſulſhip, he reſtored the kingdom of Comagene, which had been reduced to a Roman province eighteen years before, to Antiochus the ſon of that Antiochus who had been driven out by Tiberius, ordering at the ſame time an hundred millions of ſeſterces, that is, about a million of our money, to be paid to him by way of reſtitution for the revenues of his kingdom, which Rome had ſo long enjoyed without any juſt title [h]. Antiochus, out of gratitude to ſo generous a benefactor, gave two of his names to a town of Comagene, calling it Ceſarea Germanica, which were afterwards changed into that of Germanicia [i]. Of his generoſity to Agrippa we ſpoke in the hiſtory of the Jews; and therefore ſhall only obſerve here, that he beſtowed on him the tetrachy of his uncle Philip, with the title of king; but reſerved for himſelf the reſt of Judæa, whither he diſpatched this year Marcellus in quality of governor in the room of Pontius Pilate, whom Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria had ſent to Rome, to anſwer many grievous complaints of the Jewiſh people, whom he had oppreſſed in a moſt tyrannical manner [k].

And to others.

His generoſity to ſeveral private perſons was no leſs remarkable; for a fire happening in the firſt months of his reign, he made good the loſſes which every particular had ſuſtained. To a freedwoman, who had endured moſt exquiſite torments, without diſcovering the crime of a patron, he gave eighty thouſand ſeſterces. For theſe and other bounties a ſhield of gold with his image was decreed to him, which by order of the ſenate was to be carried annually on a certain day, by the colleges of prieſts, to the capitol, the ſenators following it, and the noblemens children of both ſexes ſinging hymns in praiſe of his virtues. Beſides, it was ordained, that the day of his acceſſion to the empire ſhould be called Palilia, as if Rome had been founded anew on that day [l]. Caius having held the conſulate two months and twelve days, that is, to the twelfth of September, reſigned the faſces to thoſe who had been appointed by Tiberius for the reſt of the year [m]; but their names we find no-where recorded.

It was probably about this time, that Caius wrote to Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, to conclude a peace with Artabanus king of the Parthians. Suetonius tells us in one

one place, that Vitellius uſed all manner of artifice to draw Artabanus to a conference [n]; and in another, that the Parthian king, who had always ſhewn the utmoſt contempt and an irreconcileable hatred to Tiberius, ſought of his own accord the friendſhip of Caius [o]. According to Dion Caſſius, that prince had already paſſed the Euphrates, and was upon the point of invading Syria, when Vitellius, coming unexpectedly upon him, obliged him to agree to a treaty [p]. Be that as it will, Artabanus and Vitellius came to an interview on a bridge which they cauſed to be laid over the Euphrates, each attended by a certain number of guards; and concluded a treaty, the conditions of which were very advantageous to the Romans [q]. The Parthian even condeſcended to give by way of hoſtage one of his own ſons [r], or at leaſt a noble youth of great diſtinction, named Darius [s], probably of the race of the Arſacidæ, whom he ſent ſome time after to Rome, with a Jew, by name Eleazar, ſeven cubits high [t]. When the treaty was concluded, Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, gave a magnificent entertainment to Artabanus and Vitellius, under a rich pavilion raiſed upon boats in the middle of the river [u]. Suetonius [w] and Dion Caſſius [x] tell us, that Artabanus paſſed the Euphrates, adored the eagles and enſigns of the legions, and kiſſed the images of Auguſtus and Caius Cæſar. Herod immediately diſpatched meſſengers to Rome with a minute account of what had paſſed, who arriving before the meſſengers of Vitellius, the emperor received the latter coldly, telling them, that Herod had already tranſmitted to him a detail of all that had been tranſacted on the Euphrates; which occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the tetrarch of Galilee and Vitellius [y].

He is taken ill.

AFTER Caius had thus happily reigned about eight months, he was ſeized with a violent fit of illneſs, occaſioned by his intemperance and debaucheries; for while Tiberius lived, he was mighty temperate in his diet; but upon his death he forſook his antient way of living, and gave himſelf entirely up to all manner of diſorders; which ſo affected his conſtitution, that towards the end of October he fell dangerouſly ill. As that was the time of the year, in

in which thoſe who traded to foreign countries returned home, news of the emperor's indiſpoſition was immediately carried to all the provinces of the empire, and everywhere received with the greateſt tokens of ſorrow imaginable [z]. At Rome his palace was conſtantly crouded with multitudes of people of all ranks enquiring about his health; many paſſed whole nights at his gate, and ſome, devoting their lives for his, promiſed to fight amongſt the gladiators for his ſafety, and ſet up bills of this their reſolution in the ſtreets. At length he recovered, and with his recovery reſtored happineſs to the whole empire: innumerable victims were ſlain, and ſacrifices offered in the moſt diſtant provinces ſubject to Rome, by way of thankſgiving to the gods for ſo ſignal a favour. But how blind is man in his imagination! how vain in his hope, and ignorant of what is moſt to his advantage! This prince ſo much beloved, and univerſally looked upon as the author of all public and private happineſs, either changed all on a ſudden his nature, or diſcovered that which he had ſome time artfully diſguiſed. Some writers think, that this diſtemper affected his brain; for ever after he was much troubled for want of ſleep, never reſting above three hours in a night, and that never quietly, but conſtantly frightened with ſtrange dreams and dreadful imaginations; ſo that he paſſed great part of the night, either ſitting up in his bed, or wandering about the galleries of his palace, longing for day. He was himſelf, ſays Suetonius [a], ſo ſenſible of the infirmity of his mind, that he once reſolved to retire in order to purge his brain. He was ſubject, when a child, to the falling ſickneſs; and in his youth, though patient of labour and hardſhips, ſubject to fainting fits. Others aſcribe this odd and unaccountable conduct to a philtre, or love-potion, which was afterwards given him by his wife Cæſonia, and impaired his underſtanding. But, whatever was the cauſe of this change, it is certain, that from the time of his malady to the hour of his death he acted more like a madman than a prince; ſo that for the reſt of his reign the reader is to expect nothing but an uninterrupted train of execrable vices, monſtrous extravagances, and ſuch ridiculous inconſiſtencies, as cannot well be related with that gravity and decency which becomes an hiſtorian. On his acceſſion to the throne, he would admit of no titles of honour;

nour; but ſoon after his recovery he aſſumed them all in one day, though Auguſtus had taken them ſeparately, and Tiberius had to the laſt declined ſeveral of them [b]. Theſe were probably the titles of Auguſtus, of emperor, of high pontiff, of perpetual tribune. From ſeveral medals which have reached our times [c], it appears, that he bore all thoſe titles before his ſecond conſulate; but that of father of his country he did not aſſume, till the third year of his triumphal power [d]. To the above-mentioned titles he added the following ſurnames, ſtyling himſelf, the moſt pious, the ſon of the camp, father of the armies, the moſt gracious, the moſt mighty, Cæſar [e]. This year, Tiberius the ſon of Druſus, being eighteen complete, took the manly robe; on which occaſion Caius, after many proteſtations of kindneſs and ſincere affection for the young prince, firſt adopted him, and then declared him prince of the Roman youth. But theſe honours the unfortunate Tiberius enjoyed a very ſhort time, Caius not being aſhamed to put him to death a few days after he had ſolemnly declared, that his life was as dear to him as his own, and that he would ever cheriſh him as his own child. Philo tells us, that he adopted him with no other view, but to acquire that abſolute power over him, which the Roman laws give to every parent over his children [f]. Be that as it will, he had no ſooner adopted him, than he charged ſome tribunes and centurions of his guards to acquaint the young prince, that he muſt with his own hand put an end to his life, thinking it unlawful for any inferior perſon to imbrue his hands in the blood of one of the imperial family. The innocent youth expected nothing leſs, and therefore was, as we may well imagine, ſtruck with ſurprize and amazement, when the officers denounced to him the emperor's orders. As he was of a mild temper, and had ever avoided aſſiſting at executions, and even at the combats of gladiators, he preſented his throat firſt to the officer who ſtood next to him, and then to all the reſt, begging them with many tears to execute the cruel order they had brought him. But as they all declined that office, purſuant to the emperor's orders, ſtrictly forbidding them to be any ways aiding and aſſiſting to his death, the young prince drew at length his ſword; but not knowing where to ſtrike, he begged they would at leaſt ſhew him where the wound wound might prove mortal, and ſoon put an end to his lif and miſery. So far they complied with his requeſt, and then the unfortunate youth ſtabbed himſelf in their preſence [g]. Caius, to excuſe this firſt act of cruelty, which was ſoon followed by many others, pretended, that Tiberius had, during his illneſs, wiſhed him dead [h]; and that, through fear of being poiſoned, he had taken an antidote, which when he diſcovered, he cried out, What! an antidote againſt Cæſar? But this pretended antidote was only a remedy he had taken for a cough, with which he had been long troubled [i]. Thus he rid himſelf of the only prince, to whom thoſe could apply, who might in proceſs of time be diſſatisfied with his government. As for his uncle Claudius, he looked upon him as a perſon utterly unfit for any office in the empire, or in private life, as he really was; and therefore ſaved him, as he openly declared, for a laughing-ſtock. Being thus by the death of Tiberius delivered from all reſtraint and controul, he gave a full looſe to his furious paſſions, and commenced an open enemy to mankind, a complete tyrant, or rather, as Suetonius ſtyles him [k], an outrageous monſter.

He abandons himſelf to all wickedneſs.

Soon after his recovery, he obliged all thoſe, who, during his malady, had devoted their lives for his, and promiſed to fight amongſt the gladiators, to fulfil their promiſe; and becauſe one was ſomewhat backward in the accompliſhment of his vow, he cauſed him to be adorned like a victim, and delivered to a company of rude and mercileſs boys, who, after abuſing him in a moſt cruel and inhuman manner, dragged him through the ſtreets, requiring the accompliſhment of his vow, and at laſt threw him down a precipice, and put an end to his life [l].

The death of his grandmother Antonia.

His grandmother Antonia, venerable for her age and no leſs illuſtrious for quality, for ſhe was the daughter of Marc Antony, the niece of Auguſtus, ſiſter-in-law of Tiberius, and mother of Druſus, having taken upon her to admoniſh him, he reſented that freedom to ſuch a degree, that he reduced her to the neceſſity of laying violent hands on herſelf [m]; whether by an expreſs order, or only by the unbecoming manner with which he treated her, we are not told. That illuſtrious princeſs having one day begged to ſpeak with him in private, he refuſed her that favour, and ordered Macro to be preſent the whole time time she continued with him. On another occasion, as she offered to advise him, he immediately interrupted her in a violent rage, bidding her remember, that he could do what he pleased with whom he pleased. With these indignities and affronts, 'tis most probable, he hastened her death. Some indeed have written, that he caused her to be poisoned [n], which, if true, Philo would never have passed over in silence. He bestowed no honours upon her after her death, and from one of the windows of his palace beheld the funeral pomp quite unconcerned [o]. Dion Cassius fixes the death of Silanus, the emperor's father-in-law, to this year; but, according to Philo, it happened after that of Macro, of which we shall speak, the following year. In this or the foregoing year, was born on the fifteenth of December the emperor Nero, and much about the same time Josephus the historian.
